The division between the two systems actually springs from the fact that Lenin's attempt to create socialism by force led to the complete, nightmarish degeneration of the entire undertaking and to the establishment of the system we now call totalitarian. The difference does not lie in the contract between "moderation" and "revolutionary spirit," or in the fact that they destroy private property and plan their economy ruthlessly while we do it differently, but in a basic difference in attitude toward the individual, toward human life.

SHAW SAW THE DIFFERENCE

Bernard Shaw was one of the first to understand this. After a visit to Russia, he rapturously wrote that "she has turned upside down the most important established and fixed standards." She had banished, as a superstitious prejudice, the utterly worthless, false idea of the supposedly sacred value of human life and the human personality, replacing it with a purely "utilitarian" approach to man. The right to life by no means belongs to every person, but only to those who can "justify" their existence to the state and its rulers. And the latter, Shaw explained with obvious approval, are chosen by nobody in Russia; they choose themselves, finding themselves the most worthy to be the power group.

When it appears that an individual cannot "justify" his existence to this power group of supermen, displeases them, is superfluous and useless to them, annoys, frightens, or upsets them, "he must be rooted out of society like a weed." And the judgment "must be swift."

Without the slightest revulsion, Shaw described how an agent of the Cheka comes to the doomed man, claps him on the shoulder and says: "This way, citizen." And the "weed" is rooted out.

"A considerable part of the secret of Russian communism's success," Shaw concluded, "is explained by the fact that, henceforth, every Russian knows that, if he doesn't make his life a paying proposition (from the point of view of the state, that is) he will lose it."

Shaw's article, printed in a British Communist organ in 1932, was later translated and published in Pravda. One Soviet journalist has recounted that Maxim Gorky, upon reading the manuscript, became terrified and "started to groan," but Stalin ordered it published without any editorial remarks. This is understandable. Shaw, who was not a nonconformist for nothing, clearly understood what "the immortality of the developing Stalinist revolution" consisted of, what it had "turned upside down," what was the basis for the dark gospel of Stalin. The Stalinist revolution, as it moves onward and develops dialectically, must lead to something similar to Orwell's ghastly Nineteen Eighty-four.

Some of the features of the other revolution can be seen in Scandinavia, America, France, and the British Commonwealth—sometimes only in fragmentary form or in blueprint, in various spheres and in variant forms. What underlies all of these variants is the attempt to develop the idea of the value of the individual. At first inculcated by religion but later secularizing itself, this idea has established itself as an incontrovertible categorical imperative. No one who repudiates it can call himself a democrat.

While revolution of the Stalinist type, overturning the entire social structure of nations, is, of course, social revolution, it is in its essence counterrevolutionary. Spiritually and politically, it is a throw-back to centuries ago, reversing the clearly charted direction of development. At the bottom of every act of the Kremlin and its minions abroad lies—both consciously and unconsciously—a monstrous view of man. This is the abyss dividing the two types of world-wide revolution.

Lenin considered the peaceful coexistence of capitalism and socialism impossible. He was mistaken, as the close harmony between not completely capitalist America and not completely Socialist Britain indicates. But what is truly difficult to imagine is the peaceful coexistence of Ahriman and Ormazd, good and evil, a system which exalts the individual and a system which denies the individual. With totalitarian despotism aspiring to world mastery, a clash between it and democracy is inevitable. One or the other antagonist must disappear. And the victor will not be he who is morally superior, but—to tell the sad truth—he who proves physically stronger.

Our French writer says: Let us carry out reforms and social revolution, and we shall triumph. But he shuts his eyes to the fact that the projected Atlantic armies cannot halt the enemy if, in their rear, on the territory of the democracies, the Communist fifth columns are permitted to operate freely. To supplement the Atlantic military pact, there must be an Atlantic political pact by which the democracies concertedly paralyze the Communist parties. Democracy that is not dying, that believes in itself, that wishes to live and to fight for its ideals, must eliminate the Communists before it is too late. In the interest of our self-preservation, the Communists must be deprived of the freedom to murder freedom. We must destroy the Trojan horse before it destroys us.

A Few Samples of Letters From Constituents re General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting just a few copies of letters received from constituents, all dealing with the firing of General MacArthur. The people are aroused and indignant.

DELAVAN, WIS., April 11, 1951.

LAWRENCE H. SMITH,
Congress of the United States,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR LAWRENCE SMITH: This small town today has the hush of deep and unspeakable grief. The knowledge that our one and only American hope, Gen. Douglas MacArthur has been fired, leaves us shocked, void of hope, of patriotism, of a future for our sons and their sons.

All the fine, the good things we have taught our children to be, stand for naught. We American mothers and fathers must now admit to them that courage, decency, education, and honesty are of little use in the America of today.

We must now teach them to use their wits, seek gold and power above all else, and always say "Yes" to the man higher up whether he be a Costello, an Alger Hiss, or a pajama-clad President.

My father wrote a song when I was small called Land of the Free. My brother and son were brought up on it. The chorus went like this:

"America, fair land of mine, home of the just and true,
All hail to thee, land of the free, the red, the white, the blue."

What has happened to this wonderful country?

May God help you in your office. May He help us all from this dark day forward.

Very sincerely.

KENOSHA, WIS., April 12, 1951.

Hon. LAWRENCE H. SMITH.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I must finally break my long silence. Are you going to keep still to the firing of our great and honorable General MacArthur, a general we admired so much for his work, his work in Japan in getting the wheels going again without much slaughtering? I will never forget the slaughtering of all the German generals that only had to do what their Government asked them to do.

Why must England and France come and tell the Americans what to do, and who is doing the bleeding in Korea? The French or English? The confidence in our Government is going to go if you, the Congress, don't do something about it. The boys are dying on the battlefields, and in Washington they steal and betray our country. What a crime. Why fight the dictators if we have one ourselves in Washington? Oh, if God only would clear out that rat hole.

Yours very truly.

JANESVILLE, WIS., April 11, 1951.

The Honorable LAWRENCE H. SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SMITH: The list of people signing this letter are all voters, and they represent mothers who have sons in Korea and Japan, sweethearts and sisters of boys in Korea and Japan, mothers of boys who will be called in the near future, and last but not least, women who have lost their sons and husbands in the Korean war.

We feel there are no adjectives strong enough to express our dismay and agitation at the dismissal of General MacArthur, a man who has always thought first of his country and not of politics.

We wish to protest his dismissal and ask that you, as a Representative of the people of Wisconsin, protest it and that you urge Congress to invite General MacArthur to appear before that body and give his views. It is time the American people had something to say about the Korean affair; the boys are dying, but still, according to our President, we are not at war. If that is so, then let's bring the boys back home, as life is anything but pleasant in Korea.

Our Congressmen and Senators have hearts, but if they do, how can they talk politics, play politics, and fritter away not only the minutes but the hours, while poor American boys die, and, as a crowning affront, dismiss the man upon whom they relied? It is time the State Department is cleaned up and if, as we read in the papers, the majority of Members of Congress do not approve of the way the State Department is handling matters, then let's do something about it. Now.

General MacArthur has served his country long and well, and we wish him to continue; we have confidence in him. We are relying upon you to help us put MacArthur back at the helm, and we believe our faith and trust in you is not misplaced.

Sincerely,

(Signed by 31 women.)

RACINE, WIS.,
April 12, 1951.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN SMITH: I am very much oppressed at the removal of General MacArthur from his command in Korea by a very incapable man like Mr. Truman. It has brought great tragedy to our country. I salute General MacArthur as the greatest military leader. I have always had great faith in him as a Christian leader working daily between his conscience and his God. I am looking forward to some truthful words from his lips which we do not get from the New Dealers in Washington. My greatest desire is for you to do your best for the impeachment of Acheson and Marshall along with Truman.

Very truly yours.

KENOSHA, WIS.,
April 15, 1951.

To Congressman LAWRENCE H. SMITH:

We, the undersigned American voters and taxpayers of the First District of Wisconsin, demand the reinstatement of MacArthur and impeachment of Truman and Acheson. Truman got us into the Korean war without first talking things over with the highest military officials.

He makes more fuss over a critic who does not like his daughter than he does over a war he started. He wants to send troops to Europe where there is no war instead of to Korea where they are badly needed.

We don't care what the British like or want. They are not running this country. They would have been lost if not for our help. They don't care about us, all they want is our money. Beggars can't be choosers.

In Truman's 6 years of office he never once fired a crook but our best general was removed and given a dirty rotten deal. We resent the manner in which it was done. It is a shame to lose a man of the ability of MacArthur.

I have a brother in Korea who has been wounded and my husband is in the Navy in Korean waters. Let Truman and Acheson take their places and send our men back.

We don't want a long, dragged-out war for the next 20 years. We want an end to all this and MacArthur had the right idea to end it for us.

Our only hope now lies in Congress. If the majority of Members of Congress betray their country then we are lost indeed.

Thank you.

KENOSHA, WIS., April 11, 1951.

Hon. LAWRENCE H. SMITH,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In keeping with my avowed policy of liberalism, I have waited before communicating with you until President Truman spoke tonight to see if he could convince me that he was acting correctly. After listening to him and following reaction around the world and in our own country, particularly that of the Communist Party here, I now feel more qualified and justified in writing.

To use the President's own terminology, I believe we should impeach the "——— ——— ———" for "asinine" actions and decisions.

Top level policy (?) has too long been formed by men like Acheson and Marshall whose judgment, particularly on far eastern affairs, has long since been repudiated. A thorough house cleaning is imperative.

The present question is not who will control who—military or civilian—but who is right and who is wrong.

Impeachment of Truman will not solve all our problems but the people's voice will have been heard and much benefit will result.

Yours very truly,

WALWORTH, WIS., April 12, 1951.

Hon. LAWRENCE H. SMITH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The persons in our Government have exposed themselves. Now is the time for us as Americans to stand and fight against these forces that are ruling our country, that are slowly undermining our security and jeopardizing our American way of life.

I feel that MacArthur should be reinstated and that those in Government positions should be exposed and replaced, including Dean Acheson and President Truman. This tragedy should not be overlooked, but it must be used as an opportunity for exposure and removal of all those who are Communists or those sympathetic to communistic ideas or any form of corrupt government.

Don't fail us in this hour of need. Let's have a shake-down in all Government offices.

Sincerely.

RACINE, WIS., April 11, 1951.

Representative LAWRENCE H. SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In view of the infamous action of Harry S. Truman in discharging General MacArthur, I urge and pray that you as our representative will take such action as will bring about the impeachment of Harry S. Truman and Dean Acheson.

If you could of been in Racine today and heard the voice of the people you would feel that any action taken by you would be sanctioned by your constituents.

Very truly.

MacArthur, the Christian Statesman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL CUNNINGHAM
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address by Dr. Dale Crowley, Washington's radio minister, over Stations WOL and WEAM, April 20, 1951:

MACARTHUR, THE CHRISTIAN STATESMAN

(Address by Dr. Dale Crowley, Washington's radio minister, over Stations WOL and WEAM, April 20, 1951)

"Righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people." (Proverbs 14:34.)

On getting a close-up of Gen. Douglas MacArthur, and being held spellbound by the matchless eloquence of his classic and challenging address before the joint meeting of Congress and to all America and the world by radio and television, I find myself increasingly proud to be an American. And since General MacArthur is one of the greatest living exponents of true Christianity, I am more grateful than ever to be numbered among the people called Christians.

For the stupendous tribute being paid this outstanding hero we are devoutly thankful, not merely because he is so eminently worthy of the same, but because General MacArthur is indeed the living symbol of the highest and best in American manhood and in sturdy Christian character. Through the years this soldier-statesman has occupied a lofty place in the esteem of his fellowmen. Today he occupies an even more exalted place in our esteem.

This fact I desire to emphasize: The qualities of character which make Douglas MacArthur the man that he is are Christian qualities. In his personality certain traits of character are prominently displayed. In the first place, we see the spirit of modesty and humility. Not once have we seen a spirit of boastfulness or braggadocio in this great man and, yet, there are few men on the world horizon today who would have as much to boast about in terms of sheer achievement as Douglas MacArthur. He is indeed a worthy exponent of the Christ whom he worships, who emphasized that the first mark of discipleship and of Christian leadership is that of humility.

Then, too, we think of the quality of Christian charity so prominent in the life of this distinguished citizen. Charity toward all men, even his persecutors. If there would be justification for a spirit of vindictiveness toward those who had wronged him, we think it would be in this case. But not one note of rancor or bitterness or harshness or abusivensss or unkindness proceeded from the lips of General MacArthur. There has been manifested a refreshing air of gentleness, a spirit of total charity and brotherliness, not only in his words, but in his very manner.

The spirit of compassion, also, shines out in the life of this man. One could almost feel his heartbeat of sympathy and love for the soldiers, sailors, and marines under his previous command, now left behind to carry on in Korea. In his love for the Korean people, also, General MacArthur expressed his deep feeling of sorrow and compassion. We were reminded of the statement concerning Jesus, of whom it was said "He was moved with compassion on them." In living touch with Christ, this beloved general possesses, in a very marked degree, this spirit of compassion.

Fidelity is another magnificent quality so pronounced in the life of this soldier-statesman—fidelity to duty. A true Christian will ever be faithful to the task at hand. To every assignment given General MacArthur through the years, he has set his hand to the plow, and his face toward the goal of accomplishing that task, however huge and however impossible those tasks have seemed to be. His faithfulness to his country in a service rendered at a time when he might have elected to retire to private life in comfort and ease, is indeed one of the crowning examples of loyalty to be written into the biography of this great citizen. And when we think of his faithfulness to the Japanese during his six epoch-making postwar years as their counselor-champion, our sense of appreciation of this man soars to new heights. "Be thou faithful unto death and I will give thee the crown of life." Truly General MacArthur, the Christian, has won the right to that crown.

Righteousness is the principle on which this towering citizen established his life. Many years ago he became an humble follower of Christ and since that time he has sought sincerely to follow only the course of right. He hates iniquity and hypocrisy. He believes that truth is the criterion, the standard by which all things must be tested. He deplores cheap political chicanery, dishonesty, and duplicity in dealings. General MacArthur is ever forthright, candid, sincere. This is indeed a rare quality nowadays; but it is a character trait belonging to those who walk and talk with God. As with individuals, so with nations, the inspired words of King Solomon may be repeated with renewed accent: "Righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people." May God in heaven restore to the leadership of America this much-needed moral and spiritual quality.

Other peerless qualities we could mention in the symmetrically developed character of this great American. Time fails us to comment on his matchless courage, his patience, his graciousness, his Christian dignity, and other traits. But what we are saying is that this great personality is what he is because, first of all, he is a Christian. We prefer to exalt Christ rather than to exalt the man, MacArthur. We desire to emphasize that Christ is the true standard of manhood. It is because General MacArthur is a Christian and because he believes the Bible and walks in the light of its precepts that he is the moral giant that he is.

We need, my friends, as never before in this country, the type of Christian statesmanship and leadership as that which is exemplified in the person of this five-star American general—Douglas MacArthur.

Amendment of Reorganization Act of 1949 To Permit Rejection of Presidential Reorganization Plans by a Simple Rather Than a Constitutional Majority

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE MEADER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. MEADER. Mr. Speaker, on March 15, 1951, I introduced H. R. 3261, to amend the Reorganization Act of 1949 so that reorganization plans could be rejected by either House of Congress by a simple majority vote rather than a constitutional majority.

A former member of this body, Clarence F. Lea, now director of governmental relations for the Transportation Association of America, has contacted me indicating his support, and that of his association, of the provisions of H. R. 3261. I believe the views of former Congressman Lea, and the resolution of the Transportation Association of America, should be called to the attention of the entire Congress in connection with its consideration of H. R. 3261.

For that reason, I have asked leave to insert in the RECORD Mr. Lea's letter to me of April 26, 1951, and the accompanying statement of the Transportation Association of America:

TRANSPORTATION
ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA,
Washington, D. C., April 26, 1951.

The Honorable GEORGE MEADER,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MEADER: Thanks for your note of the 11th.

I commend your presentation of your proposal to require only a constitutional majority for the disapproval of a proposed reorganization plan. The provisions of the Reorganization Act in effect count deceased Members, in case of vacancies, and absentees as voting in support of the Executive order. This, of course, is an absolutely untenable provision.

Our association has committed itself to support the repeal of this provision of the Reorganization Act.

Sincerely yours,

CLARENCE F. LEA.

ARGUMENT IN BEHALF OF THE PROPOSAL OF TRANSPORTATION ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA TO AMEND THE REORGANIZATION ACT OF 1949

The Hoover Commission made a commendable effort to perform a real service for the country. It proposed worth-while reforms to avoid duplication, increase efficiency, and streamline the many departments within the executive branch of the Government. The Reorganization Act of 1949 provided the implementing legislation.

On March 13, 1950, the President submitted 21 plans to Congress under the procedures set forth in this act. Under the terms thereof all 21 plans would automatically become effective in 60 days unless rejected by either one of the two Houses of Congress through veto of a majority of its authorized membership.

Before a branch of Congress can act on a reorganization proposal, it is necessary that a Senator or Congressman introduce a resolution to veto. Regardless of the subject matter of the plan, all such resolutions to veto are heard by the same committee of either the House or Senate—the Committee on Expenditures in Executive Departments. After hearings, this committee may or may not report the resolutions, either in the affirmative or negative. Then, still within the 60-day period, either the House or Senate must act or the plans become law.

The authorized membership of the House is 435. Therefore, a minimum of 218 Members must be present, and if a plan is to be rejected not less than this number must personally cast their votes for veto.

The authorized membership of the Senate is 96. It would be necessary that at least 49 Members be personally present and all voting to sustain a veto.

THE CONSTITUTION

Under section 5, article 1 of the Constitution, a majority of each House shall constitute a quorum to do business. A majority vote of the quorum present is sufficient to pass the most important laws enacted by Congress.

Under section 6 (A) of the Reorganization Act of 1949, a plan transmitted to Congress goes into effect by the very nonaction of that body, as above described. Under this provision, if 51 Members were present in the Senate and 48 of them voted to disapprove a plan, it would nevertheless be sustained. It would become the law of the land. Yet, if the content of a plan were presented as a bill, it would, under the Constitution, become law after approval by a majority vote (of a quorum) of each House—or would be defeated by a majority of the quorum present.

CONGRESS ABDICATES

Under the terms of the Reorganization Act of 1949, Congress not only denies its regular committees the jurisdiction over the problems for which they are established, but it abdicates the most fundamental of all powers—the duty, under the Constitution, to legislate by rule of the majority. The act invites greater centralization of power in the hands of the President, which is the path to totalitarian government.

ACTUAL EXAMPLE

On May 22, 1950, the Senate voted 37 to 36 in favor of a resolution to veto plan 9—relating to the Federal Power Commission. A quorum was present and a majority of one voted to disapprove the plan. Nevertheless it became law, because of the failure to secure 49 votes. Actually, there were 73 Members of the Senate present and voting.

In effect, the absentees—and deceased Members of Congress—are computed as if voting in favor of a Presidential recommendation—without any actual vote whatever on their part. If a Member of either House wishes to avoid taking issue with the President, all that he would have to do is to stay home or take a trip.

ANOTHER EXAMPLE

Plan 21 provided for the transfer of the Maritime Commission to the Department of Commerce—and for its reorganization. It was maneuvered through Congress because little defense of the Commission was possible, yet in principle and effect the plan was the same as plan 7 referring to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Because plan 21 was the most difficult to defeat, an appendix was attached thereto settling up an Under Secretray of Commerce to deal with all transportation—creating a new activity and new executive control of transportation. Of course, if this appendix had been attached to plan 7, which was defeated, we would not now be burdened with still another bureaucratic agency dipping into the supervision and control of transportation.

While the association has not yet reached its conclusions as to whether the promotional phases of transportation rightly belong in the executive branch, certainly if it found such to be in the public interest, it is questionable whether transportation—now the largest segment of the economy—should be subordinated to a division of some governmental department.

DANGEROUS CENTRALIZATION

Let us quote from a statement submitted by the Honorable Clarence F. Lea, director of government relations of this association, when he appeared before the Senate in opposition to Reorganization Plan 7, which was vetoed in May 1950, by a vote of 66 to 13.

"In 32 years of service in the House, under six different Presidents, I have observed a constantly increasing centralization of power in the Federal Government. One Executive after another has sought increased powers under claim of more effectually discharging his duties. In fact, this tendency of Congress to place accumulated powers under the control of the executive department is an evolution of 120 years. Today, the President of the United States has more power than any other executive in the world, with the sole exception of Stalin.

"I recognize that in the main this increasing accumulation of power has not been solicited by the executive departments for what they regarded as illegitimate purposes. It represents just a natural inclination of nearly all men to crave more power."

SUMMARY

Under the Reorganization Act of 1949, Congress abdicates its powers to legislate for and in behalf of the people of this country on matters of government organization.

The established committees of the House and Senate are bypassed with no opportunity for hearing before these groups which are constituted, under normal procedures, to deal with the subjects covered by reorganization plans.

In view of the association's experience in connection with the 21 plans submitted to Congress by the President in 1950, we submit that the Reorganization Act of 1949 is a grave threat to economic freedom and our democratic processes. Amendment of this act, as set forth in the resolution on page 4, should be given first consideration by all leaders and by the two political parties. In its present form, the act should never be tolerated in a popular form of government.

RESOLUTION OF THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF THE TRANSPORTATION ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA

The Hoover Commission, after long and painstaking study, submitted important recommendations designed to improve efficiency and economy in government. The board of directors of the Transportation Association of America commends and supports these aims.

Subsequent to that report, Congress enacted the Reorganization Act of 1949, abdicating to the Executive much of its affirmative responsibility for legislation, and setting up procedures which establish dangerous precedents in the democratic process.

The Transportation Association of America is concerned in these procedures because several of the reorganization plans already submitted, and the likelihood of others in the future, affect directly national policies of transportation and its regulation. The association is concerned also because numerous proposals being submitted to Congress bear little or no relationship to the Hoover Commission proposals.

The board of directors of the Transportation Association of America deplores the unfair procedures and dangerous precedents of the Reorganization Act of 1949, and declares that—

Whereas under the terms of this act, such Presidential plans, when submitted to Congress, automatically become law within 60 legislative days unless disapproved by a resolution supported by the votes of a majority of the authorized membership of either House of the Congress; and

Whereas this act fails to require the consideration of such plans by the committees of Congress which ordinarily have jurisdiction over the problems embraced in the proposals; and

Whereas such procedures require that absentees and deceased Members ot Congress, where there are vacancies, be counted as in favor of such Presidential plans, thereby circumventing the majority rule of democratic government; and

Whereas the board of directors deplores practices which permit the enactment of legislation by Executive decree: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the board of directors of the Transportation Association of America urges the Reorganization Act of 1949 be amended to provide that:

(a) Any Presidential plan shall be referred for consideration to the regular committees of Congress which have jurisdiction over the basic laws affected by the proposed changes; that such committees shall have the right to propose amendments thereto in accordance with the established practices of Congress;

(b) Full opportunity shall be offered to the public to understand the issues involved through regularly scheduled hearings by the several committees to which such reorganization plan or plans may be referred;

(c) The time limit of 60 legislative days shall be increased; and that

(d) The adoption or rejection of any Presidential plan shall be subject to established rules of Congress by which a majority vote of a quorum present shall govern.

Grain for India

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, I have been greatly disturbed concerning the grain-for-India bill, particularly some recent implications.

The recent speech of Premier Nehru, as reported in the New York Times of May 2, which I have made a part of my remarks, touched upon the question of help from this country in the form of grain and other foodstuffs to alleviate anticipated famine. The Indian Premier indicated very plainly that his country would not accept food from any country if it had "any political strings attached to it." While I do not understand what he means by "political strings," it is clear from the tone of his address, as well as from contemporary news articles from New Delhi, that Indian opinion regards certain conditions in the proposed relief bill as so obnoxious that the Government of India had decided not to rely any longer on 2,000,000 tons of United States grain and was recasting its food-importing policy.

According to this special article in the Times, direct from the Indian capital, a large section of parliamentary opinion favors rejection of American help if it materializes ultimately, although the government is not yet committed to a policy of outright rejection of United States help.

It would seem clear that India objects particularly to the conditions in the pending bill, which would require India to distribute American grain without discrimination as to caste, color, or creed, those provisions which require full and continuous publicity in India for American assistance and those which permit unrestricted inspection of distribution by officials of the United States Government.

Communist China, despite its present war commitments, has agreed to supply India with additional rice and grain. Negotiations are underway with the Soviet Union for 500,000 tons of wheat in exchange for shipments of jute from India.

I can well understand the position of the Indian Premier, who does not wish to bind his nation politically or render it subservient to nations which may furnish economic relief. But, from the American viewpoint, it would be desirable, I think, that we attach certain conditions to any assistance we render.

First, we should want to be assured of the friendliness of the nations we help and their willingness not to exhibit actual enmity in international relations, or bind themselves to the policies of hostile, or potentially hostile, countries.

Secondly, we should insist upon careful official inspection to insure proper and equitable distribution and appropriate publicity respecting the origin of the food shipments. In the past, the Soviet has made a practice of relabeling shipments of food and other commodities from the United States of America and then distributing them in various countries giving the people to understand that they are benefactions from the Soviet Union.

Thirdly, we should always keep in mind our own needs for essential foodstuffs and necessities, as well as existing requirements of the Korean war, the Atlantic Pact military program, and ECA for shipping and transportation.

Fourthly, and this point should be first, we must always keep before us the principle of extending meritorious and emergent help and assistance to impoverished, suffering and afflicted peoples whenever we can, responsive to the Christian doctrine of furnishing charity and succor within our own means and capacity.

It may well be that grain to India at this time, while commendable from the humanitarian viewpoint, would lay down a precedent upon which other afflicted or economically weak nations might well rely. It should be recognized by the Congress, as it is by the American people, and as the dictates of prudence and common sense so amply justify, that this Nation, great and powerful as it is, cannot, under any circumstances, assume the burden of feeding the whole world or any considerable part of it. There are definite limits to our humanitarianism and our charity and we of the Congress must make sure that, in our understandable and most commendable zeal to help other nations, we are not, by our lavish gifts and benefactions, weakening our own Nation and economy. Such action would conform to the Soviet master blueprint.

If I were to support the Indian grain bill, in any respect, I should, for the above stated reasons, do so with utmost reluctance and certainly under safeguards and conditions already written into the bill. However, Premier Nehru's speech has certainly done much to clarify my viewpoint because I certainly do not intend to vote for any measure that will put my country in the position of forcing charity and relief upon nations which would label generosity as intrusion and implied bribery and cause resentment and misunderstanding abroad.

If these nations wish to take up the Soviet cry of imperialism and reaction and dictatorship against the United States, it is their privilege but I have no intention of condoning or yielding to such an attitude and I certainly will insist upon voting in the Chamber to uphold the prestige, self-respect, greatness, and security of our own beloved Nation.

[From the New York Times of May 2, 1951]

NEHRU BARS FOOD WITH ANY "STRINGS"—SAYS INDIA WILL NOT BARTER FREEDOM OF ACTION—UNITED STATES BILL IS CAUSING RESENTMENT

NEW DELHI, India, May 1.—Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru declared today that India, though grateful for help, would not accept food from any country if it had "any political strings attached to it."

Reviewing the food situation in a nationwide broadcast, he added: "We would be unworthy of the high responsibilities with which we have been charged if we bartered away in the slightest degree our country's self-respect or freedom of action even for something which we need so badly."

Indian opinion strongly supports Nehru's view. Every important newspaper published today official and parliamentary reactions to the speech by Mr. Nehru on Sunday in which he expressed a similar view.

FOOD POLICY BEING RESHAPED

According to the newspapers, the general reaction was that the conditions in the United States Senate bill on aid to India were so obnoxious that the Government of India had decided not to rely any longer on 2,000,000 tons of United States grain and that the food importing policy was being recast. A large section of parliamentary opinion, according to reports, favored rejection of American help even if it materialized ultimately.

An official of the Food Ministry said these reports were rather speculative and that Government was not committed to any policy of outright rejection of United States help.

Strong exception has been taken to three conditions in the Senate bill. These would require India to distribute supplies obtained locally or imported without discrimination as to caste, color, or creed, give full and continuous publicity in India for American assistance and permit unrestricted observation of distribution by Americans.

Officials here expressed the view that all three conditions in the Senate bill were being voluntarily observed, but that writing them into an agreement was objectionable. Meanwhile the food problem has been placed on a "war footing" and is being dealt with by a special Cabinet subcommittee that meets every day.

AIMS AT SELF-SUFFICIENCY

In his broadcast the Prime Minister warned his countrymen of the "dangerous consequences inherent in constant dependence upon outside help for food."

"We have sought help from abroad and we shall continue to do so under pressure of necessity," he said.

"But we can never function with the freedom that we desire if we are always dependent in this matter on others. It is only when we obtain self-sufficiency in food that we can progress and develop our politics."

Famine as it is understood by the people does not exist to any wide extent at this stage, he said, adding, "but the specter of famine certainly hovers over the land." He said he emphasized the need for intensification of internal procurement measures and for starting urgently a number of public works to increase the purchasing power of the poor.

Communist China has agreed to supply India immediately with 50,000 tons more of rice, according to information received from Peiping, an official of the Food Ministry said today. This is the second agreement concluded with China within the last 4 days. Last week it was announced that Peiping had agreed to supply 50,000 tons of milo sorghum grain.

At the same time the Chinese Government has made arrangements to ship the 100,000 tons of grain as speedily as possible and officials here expect consignment by early July—when the crucial period for Sihar starts. Both transactions, officials said, form part of a deal with China for 1,000,000 tons of food grains for which negotiations are being carried on in Peiping.

The Indian Government will shortly resume negotiations with the Soviet Embassy here for 500,000 tons of wheat offered by Moscow in exchange for jute.

Marines Plugged Gap in Allied Line

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Times for May 2, 1951:

MARINES PLUGGED GAP IN ALLIED LINE—RESERVE UNIT RUSHED INTO THE BREACH STAVED OFF DISASTER WHEN CHINESE STRUCK

KOREA, April 27.—Now it can be told that the Marines staved off disaster when the Chinese ripped a 10-mile gap in the Allied line.

A United States Infantry division held on one side of the gap while the Marines held on the other. And the British Twenty-seventh Brigade absorbed the frontal impact of the break-through drive, and halted it.

But when the Communists unleashed their offensive, it was the Marines who were rushed up.

When the Chinese aimed the Sunday punch of their April 22 offensive at the middle of the Allied line the South Korean Sixth Division collapsed. Through the gap south of Kumwha the Chinese poured units of three full-strength corps toward Kapyong and the Seoul-Chunchon Highway.

THREAT TO BIG PART OF ARMY

Had they reached it they could have sliced southwestward toward Seoul and cut off a big part of the United States Eighth Army or forced it into a hasty and costly retreat. But they failed.

The marines, with the South Koreans on their left, were advancing slowly northwest of Hwachon when the Chinese struck. The South Korean cave-in left the marines with their left flank flapping in the wind.

The first battalion of the First Regiment, which was in reserve, was routed out of sleeping bags in the middle of the night and sped by trucks up the bumpy roads to stem the Chinese onrush.

The first of the first of the first, as the men of the battalion call themselves, pulled up to Horseshoe Ridge late Monday. The advance elements of the Chinese hit before the marines were in position. A little way back down the road the "red devils" of the artillery set up shop.

The Communists struck straight up Horseshoe Ridge, but were beaten back. Then they swirled around the flanks and cut off the battalion. All night the enemy machine guns on higher positions around the ridge raked the hill. Mortars dropped like rain. Sometimes the Chinese wedged into the marine positions. When they did, they died there from marine grenades and pistols and bayonets.

FIRE AT RANGE OF 5 YARDS

After a lull the Chinese attacked again.

"Ready on the left, ready on the right, range 5 yards, commence firing" a marine shouted.

Failing to break through, the Chinese dropped into trenches a few yards in front of the marine positions and threw grenades. The "red devils" fired their 105's point blank at Chinese reinforcements moving up.

Finally the first battalion got orders to break out. The marines loaded their dead and wounded in the jeeps and trailers, and started out. The battalion permitted the Fifth and Seventh Regiments to pull back to safety. Then the first and the two other battalions of the First Regiment took up protective positions to the south along the Chunchon-Hwachon road.

While they were blunting the main drive, the two other regiments fought gradual withdrawals under constant pressure. Later in the week, the marines withdrew toward Chunchon because of the threat to the west end of the line, and to break off contact with the Chinese in order to set up a new defense line.

Repudiate Yalta and Potsdam

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by William Henry Chamberlin from Human Events:

REPUDIATE YALTA AND POTSDAM
(By William Henry Chamberlin)

The private arrangements between the leaders of the Big Three powers are the nearest equivalent of a peace settlement after the Second World War. These arrangements were concluded between Stalin, Roosevelt, and Churchill at Tehran and Yalta, between Stalin, Truman, and Attlee at Potsdam. And no major peace settlement in recorded history has broken down so completely so fast.

Any American who would advocate today that this country carry out the agreements of Yalta and Potsdam would reveal himself as either a sympathizer with the Kremlin or an incurable ignoramus in foreign affairs. Almost every important decision at these conferences now stands revealed as a major national security risk. We find ourselves in the position, at once tragic and ridiculous, of trying to escape from the trap which we helped to set for ourselves by acquiescing in a peace settlement that was both a denial of all the ideals for which the war was professedly being fought and an abandonment of some very vital considerations of American national security.

There have been many cases when nations endeavored, with more or less success, to escape from the consequences of defeat. The United States for several years now has been presenting a less familiar spectacle: a nation trying to escape from the consequences of a military victory so badly botched and bungled politically that it has been little less disastrous than a defeat. It is a saddening proof of the power of the standardized cliché thinking and unwillingness to consider questions on their factual merits that the legend of Franklin D. Roosevelt as a wise, farsighted statesman should persist, in the face of the visible collapse of the peace settlement on which he staked his political reputation.

It is interesting to consider what our prospects would be in the global struggle, hot and cold, with the Kremlin, if the specific provisions and the spirit of the Yalta-Potsdam agreements continued to dominate our foreign policy. The United Nations, of course, would be completely stymied by the veto power conceded to its charter members.

We should be committed to maintaining the disarmament of Germany and Japan, thereby destroying any chance of creating effective counterweights to Soviet power in Europe and in Asia. We should be obliged to keep the German economy in an unprecedented strait-jacket, with the alternatives of starvation for some and dire poverty for almost all Germans or huge subsidies from America to maintain a tolerable living standard, in view of the restrictions which Potsdam prescribed for German industry and trade.

We should be required to return fugitives to the Soviet Union, thereby ending any possibility of a political and psychological warfare aimed at driving a wedge between the Soviet peoples and their Communist rulers. We should be committed to trying to overthrow the Franco regime in Spain, while accepting as permanent allies the more sanguinary Communist dictatorships in Eastern Europe.

II

The Yalta Conference between Roosevelt, Stalin, and Churchill took place in this Soviet Crimean resort from February 2 to February 11, 1945. It represented the high-water mark in the Roosevelt administration's policy of trying to get along with Stalin by giving him everything he asked for and throwing in a few additional concessions for good measure. Alger Hiss, the only member of the American delegation at Yalta who received punishment after participating in the signing of an instrument that is at the root of many of America's present difficulties, must have been satisfied with the results of Yalta.

For the chief of these results was the confirmation of Stalin's domination both of Eastern Europe and of east Asia. Held without the presence of any Polish representative, this conference sanctioned a grotesque mutilation of Poland's natural boundaries. Almost half of Poland's prewar territory and about one-third of the Polish population were transferred to the Soviet Union. Supposedly as compensation Poland was promised substantial additions of German territory, inhabited by a population that was ethnically solidly German.

Although the communiqué which was issued after the end of the Yalta meeting was full of pious professions of respect for the Atlantic Charter, the ideal of national self-determination which is implicit in the first three clauses of the Charter was trampled underfoot. There was no semblance of a free plebiscite of the people concerned about the transfer of Polish territory to the Soviet Union, of German territory to Poland. These unprincipled annexations were accompanied by a mass uprooting of people from their homes—an act of singular inhumanity which will poison the atmosphere of Europe for an indefinite future.

The betrayal of Poland at Yalta was matched by the betrayal of China. Without consulting or even informing any representative of the Chinese Nationalist Government, Roosevelt fatuously bribed Stalin to intervene in the war against Japan by promising that the Soviet Union should receive the Kurile Islands, South Sakhalin, Outer Mongolia, and, most important of all, a preferred position in Manchuria, richest and most industrialized area of China. The Soviet Government was given the naval base of Port Arthur at the southern tip of Manchuria, a right of joint operation of the Manchurian railways, and a special position in the trade of the largest Manchurian port, Dairen. The Russian imperialist position which existed before the Russo-Japanese War was restored.

It was no accident that Manchuria, overrun and occupied by Soviet troops, became the assembly point and main military base for the Chinese Communist conquest of China. One can hardly measure the ultimate prospective cost of this development in American lives and resources.

Yalta authorized the dismemberment of Germany, the use of German slave labor as reparations, and made the United States party to a twentieth-century fugitive-slave act. It was agreed that the United States should undertake to repatriate Soviet citizens in its zone of occupation. For some time this ignoble agreement was carried out and Soviet political refugees were handed back to death and concentration camps.

III

The Potsdam Conference, held from July 17 until August 2, 1945, was a sequel to Yalta in its contempt for the Atlantic Charter and its abandonment of the American interest in an economically stable and viable Europe. It authorized "the transfer to Germany of German populations or elements thereof remaining in Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Hungary." This placed a final seal of approval on an operation comparable with the worst Nazi atrocities in its cruelty and its far-reaching disastrous social and economic consequences.

This was the driving from their homes, without compensation or any opportunity to remove their property, of some 14,000,000 Germans and people of German ethnic origin. About two-thirds of these unfortunate human beings lived in the German provinces east of the Oder-Neisse frontier line. The others were people of German stock whose ancestors had, for the most part, lived for centuries in the Sudetenland region of Czechoslovakia, in Poland, Hungary, and other countries of eastern and southeastern Europe.

The mass deportations were carried out so brutally that most students of the subject believe that as many as 2,000,000 human beings perished in the process, and, as every visitor to postwar Germany knows, the presence of many millions of embittered, destitute, uprooted people creates a political, economic, and social problem of the first magnitude.

Besides sanctioning these ruthless deportations, the Potsdam Conference drew up an elaborate blueprint for the economic vivisection of Germany. It called for the complete prohibition of many industries in Germany and prescribed arbitrary sharp restrictions on the output of others essential both to the reconstruction of Europe and to Germany's capacity to earn its national livelihood. It authorized the dismantling of many German industrial plants.

While the Potsdam Declaration did not embody all the vengeful folly of the Morgenthau plan, it did create many roadblocks for German recovery, which only started after the decisions of Potsdam in the western zone were scrapped or drastically modified.

IV

There would be several advantages if the Senate, or both Houses of Congress, would pass a resolution formally repudiating both the Yalta and the Potsdam Agreements. There would be every justification for such a step because the Soviet Government has consistently disregarded the pledges (in these declarations) which it found inconvenient to keep.

The Yalta communiqué, for instance, promised "free and unfettered elections in Poland," and it was agreed at Potsdam that Germany should be treated as an economic unit and that democratic parties should be encouraged. But the only national election held in Poland, in 1947, was a fraudulent farce, in the opinion of all the foreign correspondents who witnessed it, except the representatives of Tass, the official Soviet news agency, and the now defunct PM. The Soviet zone from the beginning was sealed off from the rest of Germany and democratic parties have long been completely suppressed there.

Both Yalta and Potsdam were horrible examples of irresponsible secret diplomacy. Formal repudiation of both these instruments, with their immoral and inexpedient provisions, would be an assurance against any relapse into a policy of appeasement. It would be a tardy atonement to the pro-western Poles. It would give the Germans a much stronger reason for siding decisively with the west by showing that America does not accept the morality or the legality or the finality of the Oder-Neisse frontier. It would be a useful move in the necessary effort to escape from a victory so appallingly misused as to be almost indistinguishable, in some of its consequences, from defeat.

Fulton Lewis, Jr.'s, Recent Nation-Wide Radio Poll

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD H. VELDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Speaker, the following is a tabulation of answers to the 16 questions on Fulton Lewis, Jr.'s, recent Nation-wide radio poll. These answers were received in my office by telegram, letters, and postcards from my constituents in the Eighteenth Congressional District of Illinois. I am happy to present this tabulation as a part of the RECORD:

1. As of today, would you vote for Harry Truman for President? Yes, 4; no, 1,274.

2. Should President Truman be allowed to continue to receive the $50,000 tax-exempt salary recently voted him by Congress? Yes, 22; no, 1,257.

3. Do you believe that Congress should continue investigations such as the one into RFC loans and the Kefauver crime hearings and extend those investigations into other activities of the Government? Yes, 1,268; no, 12.

4. Are you in favor of keeping Dean Acheson as Secretary of State? Yes, 11; no, 1,264.

5. Do you favor the United Nations being in final control of United States troops in Korea or elsewhere? Yes, 56; no, 1,229.

6. Should Chiang Kai-shek be permitted to send his Nationalist armies against the Chinese Communists? Yes, 1,261; no, 19.

7. Do you feel confident that Europe will fight to the end against communism? Yes, 55; no, 1,222.

8. Do you approve of the proposed continuation of economic, along with military, aid to North Atlantic Pact nations? Yes, 161; no, 1,131.

9. Would you favor a requirement that nations receiving military or economic aid from us must agree to stop trading with Russia, Communist China, or any other iron-curtain country? Yes, 1,258; no, 20.

10. Do you believe President Truman's statement that all Communists and Communist sympathizers have been weeded out of the Government? Yes, 3; no, 1,271.

11. Are you in favor of a permanent peacetime program of universal military training? Yes, 465; no, 805.

12. Do you believe President Truman is making a sincere effort to cut out unnecessary Government spending? Yes, 6; no, 1,272.

13. Should wages be controlled along with prices? Yes, 1,191; no, 92.

14. Should the Government prevent strikes in time of war emergency? Yes, 1,219; no, 58.

15. Are you in favor of calling General MacArthur home for a report to Congress on the far eastern situation? Yes, 1,256; no, 81.

16. Are you in favor of impeaching President Truman? Yes, 1,258; no, 20.

Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to note that my constituents generally are shown to be inherently opposed to the policies of the Truman administration. While this possibly is not an entirely true picture of the sentiments of the people in my congressional district, it does show the thinking of an average constituency at the present time.

So many American citizens have asked for impeachment proceedings to be brought against President Truman and Dean Acheson that I feel obligated to make a few remarks regarding this question.

First, we must consider that impeachment proceedings would be very difficult to accomplish, if not impossible, due to the political composition of the present Congress.

Secondly, if impeachment proceedings were possible against either President Truman or Secretary of State Dean Acheson, would the state of the Nation be improved by bringing such proceedings? I think not. Even though executive officers are removed from office, we have been shown that the same old deal remains in existence. In some cases where New Dealers have been removed from office, we have gotten more leftish individuals to replace them.

It appears to me that the only way we will ever effect a return to the high standard of government established and promulgated by our forefathers is through each and every citizen exercising his or her right to vote.

Now is the time for every eligible voter in the United States to firmly resolve to use that precious right of suffrage at each opportunity which presents itself in the future.

NATO in Cross-Currents in the Mediterranean

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Anne O'Hare McCormick from today's New York Times:

ABROAD—NATO IN CROSS-CURRENTS OF THE MEDITERRANEAN

(By Anne O'Hare McCormick)

The question of Mediterranean defense—who shall command it, how far it will extend—has become a matter of great concern and controversy among the members of the Atlantic coalition. When Foreign Minister Schuman was in this country with President Auriol he complained to Secretary Acheson that France had been left out of British-American discussions of an area in which the French have a paramount interest. The United States, we were politely reminded, should be well aware of the stake of France in the Mediterranean since we depend on her territories in north Africa for air bases.

The British and Americans, in their turn, are arguing about whether the supreme command in the Mediterranean should be given to a Briton or an American. After the uproar over the appointment of an American to the Atlantic command it was thought that the southern post would go to a British admiral. But a great many other claims and considerations must be weighed before the choice is made. The nations living in the Mediterranean—France, Italy, Greece, Turkey, Yugoslavia, not to mention Spain—are factors in a problem even more complex than the North Atlantic organization.

UNANSWERED QUESTIONS

The decision on the Mediterranean command hangs on many unanswered questions: Shall the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, which already takes in two Mediterranean powers, France and Italy, be extended to the whole area? Or shall it be supplemented by a Mediterranean Pact, linked to NATO by an over-all strategic plan? Yugoslavia wants aid, and in addition to grants for military materials is about to have her budget deficit underwritten by the United States, Britain, and France. But Tito is dead set against joining any alliance. Turkey and Greece, on the contrary, strongly desire to be admitted into NATO. They know they have armies stronger than those of many western nations to contribute to the defense of Europe, and they are dissatisfied to have no voice in strategic decisions they are expected to carry out.

One thing is beyond question: "No war with Russia could be won," says the London Economist, "without the Western Powers controlling the Mediterranean." As soon as the strategists began to plan on a practical basis it was inevitable that they should recognize that defense on the Elbe or the Rhine is another Maginot line unless a strong guard is placed on the Mediterranean flank.

At present Turkey, Greece, and Yugoslavia have the strongest forces in being this side of the iron curtain. The Turks argue, with reason, that Russia would not invade their country merely to subdue Turkey or control the Dardanelles. The strait, they point out, is merely an entrance to another sea as closed and landlocked as the Black Sea. Thus, since an attack on Turkey would be an overt move in the war for the world, the Turks must be regarded as front-line soldiers and treated as part of the general defense force. Both Turkey and Greece are convinced they should be in NATO, and the opposition to their inclusion they attribute to Western Powers who fear they will receive less military aid if the arms are spread too thin.

These fears, if they exist, touch the heart of the western dilemma. Foreign critics of our racing productivity in arms protest that it is eating up raw materials to the detriment of the production systems of our allies. Critics at home of our "extravagant" build-up of NATO demand more men, supplies, and arms for the Asiatic front. Both sets of critics want the impossible—more delivered at different places, with less dislocation of the normal economy.

But if the United States is speeding production, perhaps too regardless of the economic consequences to other nations, it is because there is not enough military equipment to go around and the front is too long to be covered by any available force. To distribute guns and planes and tanks as widely and quickly as possible, they have to be produced as rapidly as possible.

A POSSIBLE SOLUTION

The best way to create a global defense against a global danger is to organize all free peoples into a common front against Soviet aggression. This is what the United Nations tries to do, but cannot do effectively while the aggressor is a member. The alternative is a regional defense system like NATO, which is already so important that its first problem is whether to limit or widen its scope. The question raised by the powers in the eastern Mediterranean—powers directly on the line of march and actually better prepared to fight than their western neighbors—is hard to answer. It is evident that the defense of Europe depends on the Mediterranean as well as the Atlantic States. But what of the weak and imperiled nations of the Middle East? Would they have to be included, too?

One solution of the immediate problem would be to set up two Mediterranean commands and to form a Mediterranean pact closely associated with the Atlantic Pact under an over-all board of strategy. It goes without saying, in any case, that the tough and willing soldiers of Greece and Turkey should receive their full share of arms and that their leaders should participate in planning on the top level. As the difficulties and complexities of integrating a multinational defense effort emerge into the light of day we begin to see that NATO is only the core of an economic, political, geographical, and moral structure of measureless dimensions.

A Call to Patriots

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD H. VELDE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

A CALL TO PATRIOTS

Americanism.

People who have forgotten what real Americanism is have rediscovered it with an almost holy frenzy since the return of Gen. Douglas MacArthur to this country.

For General MacArthur speaks in the style of the old-time orators; he speaks in the American way, with a genuine and sincere Americanism as the basis of his talks.

Since the inception of the New Deal in 1932 and its subsequent and continuing interest in foreign affairs, Americans have, by and large, forgotten what a proud thing it is to be an American.

We have all of us become, to a greater or lesser extent, internationalists. Our thinking has been tinctured with considerations of England, and Russia, and France, and China, and Italy, and Germany. How will Argentina react? What will Tito think? Will this irritate the Kremlin?

Now comes a man onto the stage of American life with the strides of a giant, and he brings Americanism back to us. He who has been away from this Nation for 14 years comes home and gives us elementary lessons in American patriotism. He tells us things we never should have forgotten. He explains for us the American point of view—a point of view that we have had colored with the dim and uncertain light of internationalism for lo, these many years.

General MacArthur is so obviously right that we, the people, are surprised that we did not see the world the clear way he sees it, for so many years. For he looks at it simply, as an American.

These are Americans fighting and dying in Korea, he reminds us. The other nations with token forces are willing to let the Korean war continue its indecisive way—but who is paying the heavy penalty, the terrible price? Americans are. We are paying in the lives of our young men, in crushing tax burdens, in a disrupted civilian economy.

Americans, decide what is best for America—and then let your Government know that that is what you want done. This is the message brought home by General MacArthur.

He has reminded us that thinking of America first is not treason to the rest of the world. He has reminded us that as Americans we have a glorious heritage of freedom and independence which we must retain. He has reminded us that when Americans are dying in a war being fought by American men and with American dollars, it is up to America to decide how that war shall be terminated.

He has reminded us that our first duty is to our country, our country—not the rest of the world.

He shouldn't have had to remind us of these things. We should have remembered them and kept them alive and shining in our national life.

But as a result of General MacArthur's return, as a result of his recalling us to our native Americanism, there has been a tremendous reawakening of the American spirit; of the American tradition; of the American ideal; of Americanism.

General MacArthur has done his country the greatest service within his power. He has awakened it to its own glory.

Sinclair Weeks Sees MacArthur in "Sacrifice Bunt" for United States Good

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I submit herewith an article by Sinclair Weeks which appeared in the Boston Sunday Herald of April 15, 1951:

SINCLAIR WEEKS SEES MACARTHUR IN "SACRIFICE BUNT" FOR UNITED STATES GOOD

(By W. E. Playfair)

President Truman's action in "firing" General MacArthur has given Russian communism a big boost—for the moment.

But the removal by the President of the man who knows the most about the Far East problems may have collateral benefits in that it may force the development of a policy with respect to Asia "that makes some sense." It may thus have a boomerang effect on Truman.

This is the opinion of former United States Senator Sinclair Weeks, who makes the suggestion that MacArthur may have made a "sacrifice bunt" for the good of the Nation.

CALCULATED RISK

"I believe it possible," he says, "that the General, wiser than most men, particularly insofar as the Far East is concerned, may very well have taken a calculated risk to the end that this country and the American boys fighting and dying in Korea might still have a chance."

"As far as the actual removal of MacArthur is concerned," Weeks says, "no one questions the right of the President of the United States to remove a general officer from his command. But it seems to me that people who stop here miss the point.

"As president of a business organization I can discharge half my vice presidents, but if I take such action capriciously I am not doing the company, its owners, or employees any good. And my hasty, ill-considered action must be taken into account when any judgment is formed as to my own capacity. So we must look at President Truman's action with respect to all its implications.

"When you consider the power vested in the Commander in Chief, you have to admit that possibly MacArthur, having strong views and deep-seated convictions on the Far East problem, might have done better to hand in his resignation, and come home to express these. Presumably he will do that now, anyway.

"But, in the meantime, great damage has been done to American prestige and the boys on the firing line in Korea have not been and are not now being, well served.

SEES NO COMPARISON

"Some people have, and I think thoughtlessly, compared the removal of MacArthur with that of McClellan by Lincoln. There is no comparison. MacArthur was in no sense a field general. To be sure, he was charged with responsibility for the Korean operation, but in essence he was a great pro-consul, the administrator of the former Japanese Empire, concerned with matters of high policy and over-all strategy, concerned most of all with arresting the progress of communism in Asia.

"And what a job he has done. We have spent billions to build up Europe to stop the advance of communism in the west. MacArthur had only a fraction of that amount, yet he arrested communism in Japan, and he would have done so in China had his views been taken into consideration."

At no time in history, Weeks says, has a commander faced a task such as has confronted MacArthur and his field commanders, Walker and Ridgway, in Korea.

REDS UNIMPEDED

"When before," he asks, "have any military operations been conducted in such a manner that your enemy has been given free play to bring up men, material, ammunition, and supplies without any sort of interference until he had crossed a certain line?

"How many American boys have been killed or wounded because the Truman-Acheson leadership has forced them to fight a powerful enemy with one hand tied behind their backs?

"And how much longer are we to carry on the fiction that we are not at war with Communist China? The 9,000 dead, 60,000 wounded, and the 250,000 Americans still fighting in Korea—these are on-the-ground witnesses. Who do they think they are fighting if not Communist China, and they are fighting with two strikes on them and in a manner in which no troops were ever before asked to do battle."

SOCIALISTS AT WORK

I have suggested that the Russian Communists must be very happy over this incident. MacArthur's official body was hardly cold before our Socialist friends in Great Britain proposed that Communist Russia be brought in to help negotiate the peace treaty with Japan, and proposed that Formosa be handed over to Mao—while 13,000 of their fellow countrymen are fighting in Korea.

"How must the British soldier feel standing up to the hordes of Chinese Communists thrown at him and witnessing the spectacle of his government playing on the side of the enemy?"

Weeks does not agree with MacArthur's detractors, who charge that he deliberately disobeyed orders. His view is that MacArthur obeyed orders "but put on them his own interpretation as to their effect." If the entire incident results "at long last" in a constructive approach to the Far East problem, it may be a blessing in disguise.

"Meantime," Weeks says, "I deplore any political approach to this incident, this tragic result of the mishandling of a situation which never should have been allowed to come to such a stage. This is of truly national concern and of very vital interest to every American, regardless of party."

A. Lincoln and H. Truman—Two Views on Bossing Courts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KATHARINE ST. GEORGE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an interesting article by Mr. Leslie Gould, comparing President Lincoln's high respect for the dignity of the courts with President Truman's flouting of them.

Comparisons are always odious, and this comparison is odious to our present Chief Executive.

[From the New York Journal-American of April 30, 1951]

A. LINCOLN AND H. TRUMAN—TWO VIEWS ON BOSSING COURTS

(By Leslie Gould)

Here's the way two Presidents of the United States have acted when asked to exert the power of their office to overrule decisions of the courts. Abraham Lincoln and Harry Truman.

Lincoln's views were expressed in a letter involving a court decision on California land titles. He wrote on June 1, 1863:

"I must repeat now in writing what I have told Mr. (George Fox) Kelly (agent for California settlers) verbally, that the courts, and not the President, must decide questions of land titles.

"There may be some questions in regard to preemptions, which, by law, are to be decided through the Department, with appeal to me, and when such a case shall come regularly to me, I shall hear it. But I must now say, once and for all, that mere vague assertions that the decisions of the courts are fraudulent, with appeals to me to reverse them, cannot be entertained.

"A. LINCOLN."

Now, we come down to the present and Harry Truman. The courts have ruled stock control of the former Dollar Line, turned over to the Maritime Commission at the time of a $7,500,000 loan, was only pledged and should be returned to the former owners—the Stanley Dollar interests—since the loan has been repaid with interest.

The Supreme Court has refused to review this decision, which in effect affirms the lower court position—that the stock belongs to Stanley Dollar.

Instead of accepting this decision of the courts Harry Truman wrote his Secretary of Commerce, Charles Sawyer:

"Accordingly, you are directed to continue to hold this stock on behalf of the United States. All appropriate action should be taken to assert and maintain the Government's rights as owner of this stock.

"Very sincerely yours,

"HARRY TRUMAN."

For defying the court, as directed by the President, Secretary Sawyer, some of his subordinates and attorneys in the Justice Department are facing contempt citations.

Charles Eberstadt, who specializes in old and rare books with his brother, Lindley, sent this reporter the Lincoln quotations, saying:

"The answer of Abraham Lincoln to this question (a President's right to overrule the courts) is so forthright and truly American in spirit that I am happy to give you permission to print it in full if you should wish to do so."

Interior Department Appropriation Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WATKINS M. ABBITT

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. ABBITT. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday, May 1, when I was addressing this body in regard to the Gary amendment which strikes out the appropriation to build a transmission power line between Buggs Island Dam and Langley Field, I quoted certain statements made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARY] when he addressed this body on April 24. Inadvertently, there was left out of the RECORD one statement which was made by the gentleman from Virginia. The statement is on page 4400 of the RECORD of April 24, 1951, and is as follows:

Mr. GARY. Well, I made a proposition right here on the floor that has never been made and that is that the company will accept the cheapest contract that is in existence in the entire United States that has been approved by the United States Government.

This statement was made during Mr. GARY's discussion of his amendment and was an assurance to the Members of this body that VEPCO would wheel power from Buggs Island Dam in accordance with his statement above and I knew that the Members would want to know this before voting on this bill and I want to have this statement of Mr. GARY's called to their attention again before voting on the bill now up for consideration.

Keep Our Party System As Is

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I should like to include a speech I delivered over radio station WHAS, Louisville, Ky., last Sunday night:

KEEP OUR PARTY SYSTEM AS IS

I am very grateful for this opportunity to discuss a most timely question. Ever since the beginning of our country's history, the problem of political parties has been with us. George Washington disliked the entire idea. He believed that partisanship was dangerous. There have been others who shared his views. But the political system grew up in our country because it is a vital part of any free republic. We must have strong political parties because we must have a vigorous opposition in any free society. The only way to crystallize this kind of opposition is through well-organized criticism. The constant knowledge that national leadership is always subject to change prevents tyranny and protects freedom.

I am sure that all Americas agree to these fundamentals. But ever since 1948 there has been a great deal of talk about realining our political system. When the Dixiecrats took their walk out of the Democratic Party, there were loud cries of fear. Many folks believed that this defection would lead to the possibility of electing a minority President, at that time or in the future. We have had many third-party movements before. In fact, we have had elections with many more than three parties on the ballot in a large number of States. But by and large, there have been only two parties of importance since the first election in our history.

If we go about the process of realining our political parties, it would probably be along the line of a so-called conservative and a so-called liberal division. Nothing would be worse for the country. In the first place, we would be involved in an unrealistic and meaningless quarrel over definitions. Who are liberals? Who are conservatives? Are the left-wingers who want our Government to take over and run everything liberals? They like to call themselves by this name, but there are many of us who regard every extension of Government authority into private fields as an approach to the same forms of tyrannical government that our ancestors came here to escape. And what do we mean by conservative? There are people in both political parties who regard themselves as seeking to conserve the American tradition. Others label the same folks by other names, and not all of them are friendly.

As our political parties are established today, there is room inside each of them for disagreement. I regard this disagreement as healthy. It is true that now and then we grow confused because we do not share completely the views of our fellow Republicans or our fellow Democrats, but it is a healthy form of intellectual confusion. Inside the Democratic Party there are men whose ideas vary tremendously on everything from civil rights to foreign policy. We have similar variations in the Republican Party. But it is just this kind of flexibility within the political organization that makes it possible for our Government to govern.

If we had completely opposite points of view, whenever we had a change of administration, we would be staging a revolution. Nothing would be more disastrous. In the long run, a realinement of our parties would lead inevitably to the same kind of splinter parties that have made stable government almost impossible in France. For there would be hundreds of thousands of Americans who could not find their views represented by either a right-wing or a left-wing group. They would not be able to resist the temptation to form shaded organizations to speak for themselves. Today they find it possible to join within the Republican or Democratic Parties in an effort to influence the decisions of these major organizations. I believe that this is good for the country.

We have seen how this works in practice. Basically, each political party is a temporary coalition of many different viewpoints. In 1948, the Republican Party named as its candidate the man regarded as most capable of welding their coalition into a victorious unit. The Democrats, torn by conflicts inside their organization, did the same. We lost; they won. But in each case it was a blending of opinions. Not everyone was satisfied with the choice at either convention. But the choices were in each case a compromise of many conflicting viewpoints.

This represents our form of political organization and our form of government at its best. The two-party system as we know it is a flexible, workable device. Far from being a liability, its ability to absorb many viewpoints is an asset.

When we look back over the history of our country, we see that time after time, the political parties have adopted views which would have been regarded as unthinkable only a generation earlier. This kind of adaptability would be retarded by any effort to reshape the parties.

At this stage in world affairs, I say, "Don't start rocking the boat." If we think there is confusion now, imagine what would happen if we began to play games with our political organizations.

We have had the world's most effective Government because responsibility has been easy to fix in a two-party system. If we begin to monkey with the machinery, we run the risk of dumping the passengers into the drink.

Let's keep the Democratic mule and the Republican elephant. They may be stubborn; they may never forget; but they've pulled us out of many a world crisis. I'm for keeping them in harness. They sometimes get out of the traces, but they're good and strong and they're pulling our way.

Medal of Freedom Award

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, Claire Phillips, the second woman in the United States to be awarded a Medal of Freedom, is a resident of my congressional district. She is now visiting Washington for the first time to attend the premiere of the picture based on her experiences in World War II and upon her book, Manila Espionage.

I include as a part of these remarks an article which appeared in the Evening Star, May 1, discussing Mrs. Phillips' record of outstanding achievements in behalf of our country during World War II. The article follows:

WOMAN, ONCE DOOMED AS SPY, SPENT $50,000 IN PRISON AID

Claire Phillips, World War II American spy, hopes Congress and the Supreme Court will reimburse her for $50,000 she spent in medicine and food for American prisoners in the Philippines. Meantime, she has been selling cosmetics door to door to make a living.

The former spy, who used her theatrical background to good advantage to get information from high Japanese officials in Manila, was rescued by American forces after she had been condemned to death.

When she arrived in Washington yesterday, she had her first reunion with Lt. Col. Charles C. Young, who carried Mrs. Phillips, too weak to walk, out of the Japanese prison in Manila.

At that time Colonel Young was with the First Brigade Cavalry Division. He now is Chairman of the Board of Review in the Judge Advocate General's office.

Mrs. Phillips posed as an Italian national and operated a night club patronized by Japanese officers. She sent information out to guerrilla and American forces, and smuggled food and medicine to American prisoners.

This is her first visit to Washington, and she said she plans to appeal personally to Congress for reimbursement for the money she spent. She has written a book, Manila Espionage. The premiere of a movie based on her experiences is scheduled at Keith's Theater May 16.

Mrs. Phillips is a native of Portland, Oreg. She is the second woman in the United States to be awarded the Medal of Freedom, presented for her spy work in the Philippines. Mrs. Anna Rosenberg, Assistant Defense Secretary, was the first.

Cheap Farm Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE J. McCARTHY
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. Speaker, the Rules Committee is currently considering a rule for H. R. 3293—the migratory agricultural labor bill—the House will be called upon to consider this legislation soon. This problem of migratory farm workers is the most pressing domestic social problem in the United States. I urge the Members of the House to secure copies of the recently published report of the President's Commission on Migratory Labor by calling the White House and also to read this editorial from the Washington Post of today:

CHEAP FARM LABOR

The Senate is now about ready, after 3 days of debate, to come to a vote on Senator ELLENDER's bill for the recruitment and admission to the United States of Mexican agricultural workers. The bill was framed and studied by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry before the recently issued report of the President's Commission on Migratory Labor became available. It ignores, or flouts, the most important recommendations of that Commission. Indeed, Senator ELLENDER's bill, if enacted, would serve merely to perpetuate shocking conditions in the agriculture of the Southwest that do grave injury to American and to Mexican farm laborers alike. Senators CHAVEZ, HUMPHREY, and LEHMAN have rendered valuable service in exposing the evils and inadequacies of this legislation. We hope that the amendments they have urged will prevail.

Senator CHAVEZ's action on the measure merits special commendation. Many of the big growers in his home State of New Mexico want to see it enacted without any changes—because they want the Mexican peons who can be brought in under contract to harvest crops and then sent back where they came from. The justification for bringing them in is that an adequate supply of American farm workers is not available. But the fact is, as the President's Commission made clear, that there are plenty of domestic workers available if the growers would only give them decent wages and decent working conditions. The importation of poverty-stricken Mexican peons in years past has operated to drive down farm wages and to reduce a million American farm workers to a state of homeless, rootless migrancy.

The Mexican Government now insists—altogether properly, in our judgment—that certain minimum conditions be met by the growers for the care of contract workers brought in from Mexico. Equivalent conditions, and priority in consideration, should be given to domestic workers. In addition to this, responsibility for determining whether foreign workers are actually needed should be vested directly in the Secretary of Labor and not left to the discretion of State and regional directors of employment security; the latter are simply too susceptible to the pressure of the big growers. And, finally, there ought to be a stringent prohibition against the employment of so-called wetbacks—Mexicans who came into the country illegally. Without such safeguards, the Ellender bill would serve, as Senator CHAVEZ charged, to "bring back the things which Lincoln did away with" and to "bring about peonage in my State and in certain other areas of the United States."

The demand that such safeguards be included in the bill implies no hostility to Mexican immigrants and no desire to keep American growers from obtaining all the labor they need. But the misery of the Mexicans must no longer be exploited to the disadvantage of themselves and of hungry workers on this side of the border.

America's International Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT M. COLE
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. COLE of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Hon. Alf M. Landon before the South Central Business Association, Inc., Kansas City, Mo., April 24, 1951:

Amidst the tumult and shouting on the Potomac, the outpouring of the spirit that General MacArthur has inspired from the mountains to the seas, the powerful presentation he made of a specific determined policy for America, the unescapable fact remains that the decision is not in our hands alone.

The first step in the solution of the problems confronting us is the selling of our partners in the United Nations—and now particularly Great Britain—on the full dimensions of the issues involved. We are in a situation where the action, if it is strong, must be concerted.

In the First World War, Woodrow Wilson had a definite end in view in developing the League of Nations.

Ultimately his objective was destroyed because Great Britain believed it was still possible to go it alone and to maintain the British Empire by her traditional balance-of-power diplomacy—when she no longer had the power to exert the balance.

The outstanding example of that was Great Britain's neutral position when Japan seized Manchuria in 1931. The League of Nations branded Japan an aggressor. President Hoover was willing to support the League by joining in imposing economic sanctions. Great Britain refused to join up in any attempt to give validity to the first great challenge to collective security in maintaining peace in the world. As a result the League of Nations failed to follow up its resolution branding Japan as the aggressor by imposing economic sanctions and thereby laid the ground work for World War II.

History is repeating itself with the British Foreign Minister Morrison's statement urging unconditional surrender to the Red Chinese after the United Nations had branded them as the aggressor. Only this time instead of the Japanese killing Chinese in Manchuria the Red Chinese are killing American soldiers in Korea.

As long as Foreign Minister Morrison's statement stands uncorrected by Prime Minister Attlee, the British Government is in the position of giving aid and comfort to our enemies to continue the fight in the belief that in the end they can win.

By his statement the Foreign Minister has made a negotiated peace more difficult. Instead of enhancing the prospect of peace, Minister Morrison has enhanced the spread of war.

I can't believe that Minister Morrison reflects the true views of the British people in proposing unconditional surrender in Korea. After all, because the Foreign Minister went haywire, we ought not to brand a whole people as stupid. I believe the worst thing that could happen to the free peoples of the world would be a complete split between England and America.

Certainly the English—who have had one tragic experience with the results of appeasement in 1931—on the record will realize the dangers inherent in such a policy.

In World War II, Franklin Roosevelt did not have a well-defined end in view. As a result the only victor was Russia.

I see very little evidence of thinking ahead of the Korean war. No one knows what our foreign policy is—except it is to marshal the free peoples of the world in stopping aggression wherever that occurs. But the national administration is not doing a good job of selling that policy either at home or abroad.

The United Nations' army in Korea—composed almost entirely of Americans—under the military genius of General MacArthur—has twice fought its way back to the thirty-eighth parallel.

While that army—outnumbered 4 or 5 to 1—was winning victory after victory on the field of battle—our State Department was losing round after round to the Kremlin.

I applauded the President's courage in deciding to stop the Red aggression in Korea.

Although I pointed out that he had practically invited the Communist invasion by his previous statements and those of the Secretary of State that Korea was beyond our defense perimeter.

As I have repeatedly said, I believe he was right in reversing himself in stopping the evil of aggression where it broke out again. I believe that with vigorous and prompt support from the United Nations it will save the world from a third world war. But we must have that support.

British Foreign Minister Morrison's proposal for unconditional surrender to the Red Chinese completely and fundamentally changes the international situation—if that is to be the policy of Great Britain. That has to be cleared up forthwith. It is not enough for our State Department to announce our disagreement with the British. We must know if Minister Morrison has stated their future policy.

We are at the present time going it too much alone. We are being stabbed in the back by our fearful friends desiring a temporary profit at our expense.

We are confronted with the serious fact that other members of the United Nations—besides England—are too much in sympathy with the Red Chinese.

We are confronted with the tragic fact that our supposedly allies in the United Nations are making profits hand over fist supplying the Communist satellites with rubber, steel, and petroleum, while accepting from America economic and military gifts.

They are playing the old game of both ends against the middle and we are in the middle.

The United Nations refuses to act on the economic sanctions resolution thus making its action branding the Red Chinese as the aggressor a mere gesture—as did the League of Nations in the case of Japan in 1931.

But that does not mean that the United Nations should be abandoned as a complete failure.

It means that we have a problem there in public relations. It is the same problem in its essence that the President has with his fellow citizens—or a governor has with the people of this State—or the leaders of the countries making up the United Nations have with the peoples of their countries—most of whom, after all, are in a more exposed position than we are.

The United Nations in theory was in the nature of a partnership to maintain peace. The fact that it is not working out that way does not mean we should break up the partnership.

It does mean that we have got to do a better job in public relations.

I said last July:

"The President might well consider setting up a bipartisan policy advisory committee—with real Republican representation from the Congress—to draft a statement of our over-all, long-range foreign policy. The trouble is that a large part of the world does not understand what we are trying to do—and that is equally true of American citizens."

We have assumed the role the Soviet spokesmen were playing in the United Nations was obstruction.

It is time to wake up that it is more than that. Partly because of the skill of the Soviet representatives in the United Nations and partly because of the ineptness of our Secretary of State and our representatives in the United Nations, the Soviet has gained a sympathetic ear in many free countries—among people not yet lined up—to its fantastic plea that America is the real aggressor by interfering in a civil war in Korea.

I know of only one way to judge a man in any line of endeavor and that is by the results.

No one can deny that under Secretary of State Acheson's political leadership, the Soviet has been steadily gaining in support from non-Communist sources for its grotesque arguments that America does not want a diplomatic settlement in Korea or elsewhere—but is working for a show-down with Russia in world war III.

America has consistently lost in the diplomatic area under the inept leadership of Secretary of State Acheson.

To the peoples of the world, the firing of General MacArthur had a greater range of significance than it did to the American people.

The world put two interpretations on General MacArthur's dismissal.

1. It meant that we were going to concentrate all our strength in defense of Europe.

2. It remained for British Foreign Minister Morrison to "let the cat out of the bag." He interpreted the President's sudden move as meaning at last we were ready to publicly accept the British policy of unconditional surrender in Korea.

Coming in the midst of the furor following General MacArthur's dismissal, Foreign Minister Morrison's proposal was most disturbing. He said that peace should be made in Korea based on the admission of the Red Chinese to the United Nations—that the Red Chinese participate in the writing of the peace treaty with Japan—and that we turn Formosa over to the Red Chinese. Our State Department disavowed the Foreign Minister's sensational proposal. But that does not go far enough or deep enough. If Minister Morrison's statement stands, it would be unrealistic to ignore its dangerous implications.

Heretofore England has refused to endorse our decision to defend Formosa. But she has carefully avoided an open split with America over that issue.

But now there is an open break between the American and English Governments.

Despite the immense sacrifices we are making, the unescapable fact is the political situation is progressively worsening.

All this makes the dissension over troops to Europe just a beginning of the great debate over our foreign policies instead of the end.

We must realize that, like it or not, America's international policy will, in the end, be determined by the support or nonsupport their receive from other countries. For the first time in all our experience we have got to "sell" not only our policies but ourselves to other peoples. That is a new situation for America. The quicker we all understand it, the better it will be for us.

To understand our situation involves some knowledge of the theories which the Stalinists use in determining their foreign policies.

In the first place they are following the ideas and policies of Lenin and the Communist International on tactics for world conquest.

When Lenin realized that he could not overcome without force the resistance to bolshevism in Western Europe, he turned attention to the Far East and the colonial countries of the Near East and Africa.

He decided that the free countries could best be undermined by attacking their weakest link—the colonies—by exploiting the racial and national aspirations of peoples.

He believed that once the rulers of the Kremlin succeeded in gaining control of the millions who inhabit Asia, the world would be ripe for conquest.

The rulers of Russia have closely followed that international policy.

The conquest of China by the Communists is, therefore, a factor of the greatest magnitude to all the peoples of the world.

We share responsibility, as do other countries, for the success of the Stalinists in China.

Our failures in Asia have piled up and threaten us now because those responsible for American policies were ignorant of, or ignored, the universal nature of communism, and minimized the outlook and objectives of the Kremlin rulers.

The Kremlin rejects the ethical and legal codes we believe in. The rulers of the Soviet repeatedly have said that war between their system and the free peoples of the world is inevitable.

The rulers of the Kremlin, therefore, have kept Russia on a war footing ever since they seized power.

In other words, the Stalinists think they know where they are headed; while in the United Nations there is disunity, friction, and no singleness of purpose.

The Stalinists boast that that situation tips the scale in favor of their eventual victory.

To accept the inevitable failure of the United Nations is to accept the Stalinists' views. If we do that, it would be like walking off the field and allowing the game to go by default.

The free peoples of the world are too much inclined to accept the Stalinists propaganda that in their camp alone is unity and singleness of purpose.

As a matter of fact, the Stalinists fundamentally are more divided than the free peoples of the world. The annual "purges"—a soft word for murder and assassination—are the proof of the greatest opposition to the rulers of the Kremlin within their satellite countries, and even Russia itself.

The rulers of the Kremlin may know where they are headed. But they are having great difficulty in persuading a lot of the people in their areas to follow them.

Disunity among the free peoples of the world does not begin to approach such magnitude that it must be suppressed by slave camps and the assassin—which are the bases of Stalin-the-cruel rule.

I repeat what I have said elsewhere—that by reason of the great difficulties both of material and disunity, Stalin is not in a position to wage an all-out world war against a united free peoples of the world headed by such a formidable foe as the United States of America. It is too much of a gamble at this time. They hope to cash in on their efforts to weaken the opposition by division.

The policy of communism is built on gaining by fishing in muddy waters.

The Stalinists are past masters in the art of economic and psychological warfare.

Stalin hopes to win by attrition. But also he hopes to make us pick the field of decision now. Then he can make his plans accordingly.

I believe it is a great mistake to give too much emphasis to either Asia or Europe as the seat of the vital fight—when it's global. Of course, as of today, it is Asia, for the simple reason that is where the first armed aggression on a large scale has occurred since the organization of the United Nations.

I do not believe the pending full-scale investigation by the congressional committees of our military policies should mean that even in executive sessions—which are never secret—the general staff officers should be expected to telegraph—as it were—their punch to the enemy by revealing all their military plans.

In conclusion, I quote once more from my July speech:

"Cooperation for the sake of the Nation is a two-way street. As our national leader, the President should initiate it. In this critical world situation he should call the Republican leaders in for consultation, not after a policy is decided but as a cogent factor in its decision."

I do not believe the President is doing a good job of setting the right example. I believe there is too much ham acting by both Republican and Democratic leaders.

We need desperately by those in high authority just plain common patriotism—the kind of patriotism of our boys in Korea.

You can call that trite and sappy if you want to. This—if ever—is a time when genuine, unselfish, farsighted leadership is desperately needed.

The American people yearn for a resurgence of the faith of their fathers in government—by men of integrity and principle who, like MacArthur, are willing to be thrown on the junkpile for their convictions.

Bombing of Manchurian Air Bases Has Always Been Contemplated in the Event of Use of Enemy Air Power From Those Bases

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert an article entitled "China Bomb 'Trigger' Set—JCS To Act if Necessary," from the Christian Science Monitor of April 26, 1951, which makes clear that the bombing of Manchurian air bases "always has been contemplated under several possible contingencies, one of which would be the use of enemy air power from those bases against United Nations ground troops":

CHINA BOMB "TRIGGER" SET—JCS TO ACT IF NECESSARY

WASHINGTON.—Gen. Douglas MacArthur's dismissal does not rule out the bombing of enemy air bases in Manchuria under several possible contingencies which might develop in Korea.

On the contrary, the bombing of such bases always has been contemplated under several possible contingencies one of which would be the use of enemy air power from those bases against United Nations ground troops.

There are other possible circumstances which would cause the United States to change "the ground rules" now operating by tacit agreement of both sides in the Korean War. Under those tacit rules the UN air forces do not bomb beyond the Yalu River and the Chinese do not bomb Allied troop concentration, Allied supply lines, or Allied air bases.

ENEMY MUST CHOOSE

That the door is open to such a change in the ground rules is something the Government here, particularly the military high command, wants everyone to understand fully. That is the reason why President Truman was asked to read at his April 26 press conference a paragraph taken from his own radio speech of April 11. The paragraph reads:

"The Communist side must now choose its course of action. The Communist rulers may press the attack against us. They may take further action which will spread the conflict. They have that choice, and with it the awful responsibility for what may follow. The Communists also have the choice of a peaceful settlement which could lead to a general relaxation of tensions in the Far East. The decision is theirs, because the forces of the United Nations will strive to limit the conflict if possible."

The most important phrase in the above paragraph is "if possible."

So long as it is "possible" the United States Government has no intention of taking any steps which would expand the war in Korea. But there could come a time when a number of different events would combine to make it no longer "possible" for this Government to exercise the restraint which it has shown to date.

READY TO RETALIATE

It is axiomatic, and has been so all along, that enemy bombing of our bases in Korea, Japan, and Okinawa would bring immediate retaliation against Chinese air bases in Manchuria. The same goes for the safety of our troops. Until the present there has been no significant enemy air attack on our ground forces. If at any moment the enemy does use his air power against our ground forces, the retaliation would follow automatically.

One of the causes of friction with General MacArthur was that the general was not given the power of discretion to decide at what moment the ground rules had changed. Washington always insisted on keeping the trigger here. It would be pulled under certain conditions, but the Pentagon reserved the right to do the pulling.

The general had asked for authority to make such decisions himself in February. It is known now that on February 28 the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff gave him detailed instructions governing his actions which specifically reserved to Washington the power of final decision on any extension of hostilities. He was told precisely what type of defensive action he would take under every conceivable set of circumstances. After taking such defensive action, he was to report to Washington. The JCS then would tell him what to do.

LIMIT TO RESTRAINT

The phrase "if possible" is bounded by circumstances other than just enemy air action against our forces in Korea. The details are secret. The Pentagon has no intention of telling the enemy the conditions under which certain measures might be taken. But it can be surmised that one of the limits on American restraint is time.

There is a major offensive under way now against our troops. This is the third time the Chinese Communists have put large forces into battle in Korea. This is the third time that the United States has met Chinese Communist intervention without striking back at China directly. The purpose of restraint is to avoid expanding the war. But there comes a time when the repetition of such enemy action becomes intolerable.

The American Government could not possibly resist the pressure of public opinion for retaliation if the process were to continue indefinitely. The Chinese Communists should understand that this third major offensive of theirs is probably the last that will take place under the present ground rules. At the end of this one there must either be a peaceful settlement of the Korean problem or the scope of the war will of necessity expand.

A Saint on Capitol Hill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN A. McGUIRE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to insert in the RECORD an extremely interesting and learned article bearing the provocative title "A Saint on Capitol Hill." This article was written by Brother Leonard Farina and was published in the Lamp, November 1950.

Brother Leonard is now studying at the Catholic University and is a member of the Society of the Atonement. The article follows:

A SAINT ON CAPITOL HILL?

(By Leonard Farina, S. A.)

In Statuary Hall of the Nation's Capitol there stands a bronze statue of a Franciscan friar, Junipero Serra. Of all the excellent monuments in that impressive hall, there is none more eloquent than that of the fiery little apostle of California. The sculptor, Ettore Cadorin, captured the all-consuming spirit of the missionary in this bronze life-size work. In one quick glance, Serra's life and works are exposed. Firmly grasped in his right hand, raised as in peaceful benediction, is a rough wooden cross, his guide and his light; gently cradled in his left hand is a miniature of the Mission San Carlos Borromeo, his headquarters and final resting place. To both Catholics and non-Catholics it comes as a surprise to discover the statue of a religious there amidst flaming orators, dignified statesmen, and brilliant military men. It is almost out of place; yet, it is not.

Statuary Hall was created by the act of July 2, 1864. A place was set aside, the old Hall of Representatives, wherein each and all States were invited to place "Statues in marble or bronze, not exceeding two in number for each State, of deceased persons who have been citizens thereof, and illustrious for their historic renown or for distingushed civic or military service such as each State may deem worthy of national commemoration."

California had not taken any action on this until in 1927 the legislature of the State set up a commission to select the two Californians to be thus honored. It was no surprise when Junipero Serra was nominated. He had always been respected and esteemed as the pioneer of Californian history. The centennial of his death was observed as a legal holiday. Memorials had been erected in his honor throughout the State; a heroic-size one in Golden Gate Park and another at Monterey, this by Mrs. Leland Stanford. There was no doubt of his historic renown. El Camino Real, marked today with the mission bells which sang of Christ, readily testifies to this fact.

It was on July 16, 1769, when the victory of freedom was coming to a close along the Atlantic seaboard, that the 55-year-old friar established the first mission, San Diego de Alcala. In the 15 years that followed, of the 21 Franciscan missions, which have become as sun-bleached adobe gems in the green coronet of the California countryside, Serra himself established 9 of them. Their Spanish names are like a lyrical litany of favorite saints. There is San Diego de Alcala, founded on July 16, 1769. San Carlos Borromeo de Carmelo, Junipero's headquarters and the mission closest to his heart, was erected on June 3, 1770. On July 14, 1771, in an oak-covered valley of the Santa Lucia Mountains, Padre Junipero blessed the large cross which was to be the beginning of the Mission San Antonio de Padua. The fourth station was set near the Rio de Santa Ana on September 8, 1771, and was was dedicated to San Gabriel Arcangel. A year later San Luis Obispo de Tolosa was established in the Valley of the Bears. Then came two more in 1776: San Francisco de Assisi on October 9; San Juan Capistrano on November 1. Santa Clara de Assisi, the now famous college of Santa Ana occupies the site, was founded on January 12, 1777. The last mission of the administration of Serra was that of San Buenaventura on March 31, 1782. It was left to his confreres to complete the remaining 11 stepping stones of Christ the King in His journey to the Indians.

One minor problem before Serra's statue could be placed in Statuary Hall in accordance with the act of July 2, 1864, was that of citizenship. Born in the tiny village of Petra on the picturesque Island of Majorca on November 24, 1713, and baptised on the same day Miguel Jose—the young Serra in accordance with Franciscan custom changed his name upon the day of profession of vows, September 15, 1734, to Junipero—was Spanish through and through. He had come to California with a military expedition in the name of the King of Spain and his missions were sponsored by his Spanish brethren. At best, he was only an adopted citizen of the State. A similar problem had faced the State of Wisconsin when they wished to place a memorial to Pere Marquette in Statuary Hall and it required an act of Congress to solve both, legally both priests were considered citizens of the States they had unwittingly helped build.

Long before his death on August 28, 1784, at the Mission San Carlos Borromeo, a short distance south of the city, overlooking the beautiful Rio Carnelo, Serra was regarded as a saint. Fray Junipero's love for the Indians burst forth from his love of Christ and like his Master, the lowly and miserable were his precious ones. He had little care for his physical person, but was only eager to spread the word of Christ as he had been commissioned to do. Weary and burdened with age, after performing the prodigious task of administering the sacrament of confirmation to 5,307 persons, special faculties being granted for that purpose, Serra had to fight against the encroachment of the civil authorities upon the rights of the church. Undaunted, he continued his fight until the very day of his death.

While California was in the midst of the celebration of the sesquicentennial of his death, Father Augustine Hobrecht, O. F. M., was named vice postulator for the cause of the humble friar. He was succeeded by Father Eric O'Brien, O. F. M., who completed the opening phase of the investigation and armed with 7,500 documents, most faded and in Spanish, in August 1950, went to Rome, there to continue the work for the long hoped for and prayed for canonization of Fray Junipero Serra, "Apostle of California."

Thus it is, while Serra spent himself in toil for His sake, he helped to clear the ground for a great State; while California reveres him as a fervent pioneer, perhaps they have placed the statue of a saint on Capitol Hill.

Leva's Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SIDNEY R. YATES
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial:

LEVA'S SERVICE

Assistant Secretary of Defense Marx Leva has exhibited a rare combination of enthusiasm, patience, and skill which will be a challenge to his successor. Mr. Leva, who left the Government yesterday to enter private law practice, was in a sense the engineer of unification. A close friend and adviser of the late Secretary Forrestal, he became special assistant to the Secretary of Defense when Mr. Forrestal assumed that responsibility in 1947. In his capacity as general counsel of the Defense Department, Mr. Leva framed the first unified legislative program, and it was under his expert guidance that the necessary strengthening of the Unification Act was accomplished in 1949. He continued to give meaning to unification during his service as Assistant Secretary, first under Secretary Johnson and then under Secretary Marshall, and it was this high caliber of work which the junior chamber of commerce recognized when it named him the outstanding young man in Government for 1949. In the words of one of his Pentagon associates, "He is going to leave a big hole in this building."

Segregation in the Armed Services

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, dealing further with developments in respect of the Executive order of the President, the directive of the Secretary of Defense, and the directives of the respective armed services for equality of opportunity and treatment, there is appended hereto a report received from the Assistant Secretary of Defense on advances in the utilization of Negro manpower in the Army. The appended report follows an inspection made at Fort Dix, N. J., on March 2, 1951, by me in company with Hon. CHARLES R. HOWELL in whose district Fort Dix is located. We found—and so advised—that the integration of white and Negro troops for training which had recently taken place at Fort Dix had had excellent morale effects and had not involved any of the difficulties and problems which it had always been claimed would arise from such integration:

SUMMARY OF ADVANCES IN THE UTILIZATION OF NEGRO MANPOWER IN THE ARMY

GENERAL

Since the close of World War II the Army has continuously and vigorously implemented principles of equality of opportunity and treatment for Negro personnel. It has endeavored conscientiously to carry forward the principles laid down by the President of the United States and the Secretary of Defense for the efficient utilization of all military manpower. Policies have been reviewed and modified as experience warranted, with a view to developing a broader base of trained personnel, both officer and enlisted, than existed in the past. The information contained herein is intended to represent a résumé of progressive advances made as a result of experiences pointing toward greater efficiency of the Army.

SUMMARY OF ADVANCES

Recreational facilities

(a) Clubs and messes: The Army has adopted policies which assure the full use of any club, mess, or recreational facility located in public buildings to all eligible military personnel without regard to race. This applies to all recreational facilities including officer and enlisted clubs.

(b) Post exchanges: Exchanges and branch exchanges may no longer be designated for the exclusive use of any particular race. While exchanges and branches may be allotted to some specific areas or units, personnel are not restricted to their use but may use any other exchange or branch on the post.

(c) Theaters: Negro personnel are permitted the use of any theater on the post. Army motion picture theaters may be allocated to serve certain areas or units but no theater or performance in any theater is denied any group or individual because of race.

(d) Transportation: Busses, trucks, or other transportation owned and operated by the Government or by a governmental instrumentality are available to all military personnel regardless of race. Restriction of personnel to certain sections of such transportation because of race is not permitted either on or off the post regardless of local customs.

Enlistment and reenlistment without restrictions

Enlistments and reenlistments: Qualified Negroes may now enlist in the Regular Army under requirements equally applicable to all races without restrictive quota limitations. Individuals satisfactorily completing a period of enlistment may reenlist under procedures applicable to all eligible personnel regardless of race.

Equal opportunities for promotion without regard to race

Enlisted: Negro enlisted men hold a percentage of non-commissioned-officer ranks which compares most favorably with the over-all grade spread of Army command enlisted personnel. Among Negro personnel on December 31, 1950, approximately 1.8 percent were master sergeants, 3 percent were sergeants, first class, 8.1 percent were sergeants, and 19.2 percent were corporals.

Officers: The selection of Regular and non-Regular Army officers for promotion has operated without racial consideration. Prior to June 1950 there was only one Negro colonel in the Army. Today there are four. In addition, 17.5 percent of all Negro majors and 10.5 percent of all Negro captains on active duty have been selected for promotion to the next higher grade since September 1950.

Selection to attend schools without racial consideration

Enlisted: From the basis of restrictive quotas allotted to a limited number of schools, the Army has gradually opened up every segment of its military schooling system to Negroes. It has abolished racial quotas for school selection and prescribed selection of qualified personnel without regard to race or color. In early 1948 it commenced the selection of qualified Negroes for attendance at Army school courses, producing skills in which Negroes had not previously been utilized. Today of all enlisted students receiving military schooling, Negroes represent approximately 8 percent. This compares with 3.4 percent of a year ago.

Officers: Enrollment of Negro officers in schools has steadily increased. For example, Negro enrollment in comparison with total enrollments was 1.9 percent in 1947, 2.26 percent in 1948, 3 percent in 1949, and approximately 4 percent in 1950.

Training divisions and schools operate on an integrated basis

Training Divisions: In 1949 Negro enlistees were assigned to segregated units at Fort Dix, N. J., and at Fort Knox, Ky. In little more than 1 year the Army has completely changed this picture so that today the training divisions located at Fort Jackson, S. C., Camp Breckinridge, Ky., Ft. Riley, Kans., Ft. Ord, Calif., Camp Chaffee, Ark., Fort Leonard Wood, Mo., and Camp Roberts, Calif., are operated on an integrated basis where Negro personnel work, eat, and are quartered together with white personnel. The training divisions at Fort Dix, N. J., and Fort Knox, Ky., are in the process of a change-over from partial segregation to nonsegregation. This change is presently nearing completion.

Schools: The training, housing, and messing of all enlisted and officer personnel in attendance at Army schools are accomplished without regard to race or color.

Negro units are organic parts of larger white units

In January 1947 the Army assigned an infantry regiment, a field artillery battalion, an engineer combat company and a medical collecting company, each comprised of Negro enlisted personnel, as organic elements of the Twenty-fifth Infantry Division. This was the first step toward integrating Negro units with larger white units. Unit integration has vastly increased and today Negro units are organic elements of the following larger white units:

Second Infantry Division: An infantry battalion, a medical platoon, and a medium artillery battalion.

Third Infantry Division: An infantry battalion, an armored artillery battalion, a heavy tank battalion, and a medium artillery battalion.

Fourth Infantry Division: An infantry battalion, and an AAA AW battalion.

Twenty-fifth Infantry Division: An infantry regiment, a medium artillery battalion, and an engineer combat company.

Eleventh Airborne Division: A medium tank battalion, an airborne infantry battalion, and a medical platoon.

Eighty-second Airborne Division: An airborne infantry battalion, an airborne AAA battalion, and a medium artillery battalion.

Second Armored Division: A heavy tank battalion, an armored artillery battalion, and an engineer bridge company.

First Armored Division: An armored artillery battalion, an armored infantry battalion, and an engineer bridge company.

Third Armored Cavalry Regiment: An armored cavalry battalion.

Negro National Guardsmen are not removed from units

Negro members of National Guard units ordered into active military service from States with laws precluding segregation in the State militia are not removed from the units in which they have enlisted and trained, unless they possess specialities urgently required in other Army units. Similarly white personnel in such units are retained therein.

"All of Us Know the Aggressors in the Kremlin Would Glory in a Depression in the United States, Then They Could Lure the Unemployed With Fantastic Promises—Inflation Can Precipitate a Depression, Therefore, It Must Be Defeated"—Dr. John R. Steelman

OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, once again the National Broadcasting Co. in its program Battle Report, Washington, turns its cameras upon Dr. John R. Steelman, the assistant to the President, and such of his "guests" with whom he made arrangements to make televised reports to the American people.

Among those whom Dr. Steelman brought to the television screen was the Honorable Dean Rusk, of the United States Department of State, who discussed, frankly and candidly, some of the problems present in the Korean situation, as seen from the viewpoint of those charged with the administration of the Department of State.

Mr. Speaker, Dean Rusk was very factual in his approach to the question. While admitting there are several methods of attack which might be followed in order to bring the Korean war to a close, at the same time he pointed out the hazards that would attend the pursuit of some of the methods that have heretofore been indicated.

In his talk, Dean Rusk said, in part:

Those who make the decision to extend hostilities beyond Korea would be completely irresponsible if they did not take into full account the element of general war, with all the destruction and loss of life which would be involved.

A second easy thing to think about is an immediate withdrawal from Korea. That, too, would lead to disaster. Korea is not the only object of the appetities and ambitions of Communists' conspiracy. We could not solve anything by abandoning Korea. Who would be the next victim? And the next? And the next? Have we so soon forgotten Adolf Hitler? Each bite was to be the last. Do you remember the trail which led from Manchuria and Ethiopia to Pearl Harbor? To abandon Korea would be to abandon the United States.

In closing his statement on the television last Sunday, Dean Rusk said:

We do not serve our cause if, in this great democracy, we destroy our unity and undermine our strength, or if we lack the patience and the maturity we shall need as we move to meet the tests ahead.

The brillant talk made by Maj. Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor on the military training program certainly gave one a tremendous fund of knowledge with respect to the training that is afforded all members of the Armed Forces in order to successfully contest with the enemy in the field—bring victory to our standards while incurring a minimum exposure to hazard on the part of those who are fighting for our cause.

This, the thirty-third Battle Report, Washington, was particularly marked, as Dr. Steelman stated, by the picture painted by Mr. Robert McCormick, one of NBC's ace commentaries, who had just returned from Europe.

Mr. McCormick's narration was pictorialized by the marvelous photographs taken by the Jones brothers, and brought a living picture of conditions in Italy to the television screen with great fidelity, which made one feel he had looked upon the actual scenes himself.

Mr. McCormick's description of the spring military maneuvers in Italy gives concrete evidence that it will profit the free nations of the world to have Italy on their side in any possible struggle against the communistic hordes. He told, incidentally, of the Italian Air Force, of their armored tanks, and particularly of the manpower as expressed by the work of the Alpini battalion supported by their mountain artillery batteries.

Mr. Speaker, altogether it was as lively, enlightening, and as educational a program as was ever presented. Again, in order to bring the thirty-third Battle Report, Washington, to the attention of every Member of this House, under unanimous consent of my colleagues to extend my remarks, I insert the same in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The thirty-third Battle Report, Washington, as produced by Ted Ayers, was as follows:

President Harry S. Truman: "The change in the commands of the Far East means no change whatever in the policy of the United States. We will carry on the fight in Korea with vigor and determination in an effort to bring the war to a speedy and successful conclusion."

Mr. MCCORMICK. Washington, where President Truman this past week sent out the orders that relieved General MacArthur of his military command, and Korea, where despite the change, the same troops battle against the same enemy in the same way.

Today, Battle Report brings you our sixth exclusive teledocumentary on Europe, the voice of General Ridgway, a report from the G–3 of our Army, and a top-official statement from the State Department on our policy in Korea. But first, the Assistant to the President, Dr. John R. Steelman.

Dr. STEELMAN. Good afternoon, ladies and gentlemen, during the past week, the controversy about the change in the military command in the Far East has been blazoned in headlines all over the world. Denunciations have been bitter. Praise has been lavish. There have been charges and countercharges. But, in spite of all the clamor, there is one point upon which every man, woman and child in the United States is in agreement. We do not want war. We seek a world of peace in which men everywhere are free to seek happiness in their own way.

But, the task of building such a world cannot be done by government alone. It is a task in which every one of us must share.

As an example, let us consider the battle against inflation. All of us know that the aggressors in the Kremlin would glory in a depression in the United States so they lure the unemployed with fantastic promises. And, inflation can precipitate a depression. Therefore, it must be defeated.

Every one of us has a well-defined job in this battle. All of us are consumers. We have the final decision on prices. If the consumer says "No" there can be no sale. He keeps his money and by so doing he helps to reduce prices and thus to increase the purchasing power of his dollar. This is not the time for keeping up with the Joneses.

This afternoon we have with us the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs, Mr. Dean Rusk. In the light of the developments during the past week, Mr. Rusk's report will be of vital interest. Maj. Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor, so-called G–3 of the Army, has recorded the story of how our forces all over the world are kept supplied with the tools of war.

Last week we brought you what was undoubtedly the latest film report on the Italian Nation to be seen in this country. Documented by NBC cameramen, the Jones brothers, and narrated by Robert McCormick, who made a special trip to Europe and has just returned, it reported to you on the Italian people, economy, and government. Today we continue that teledocumentary. We present now part 11 of Battle Report, Italy, an exclusive report on Italy's armed forces, again narrated by one who has seen it all with his own eyes, Robert McCormick.

Mr. MCCORMICK. "Restricted," that's the word for this dock area in the bay at Naples. For it is here that American ships unload weapons from the United States to strengthen the Italian armed forces. Yes; though Italy's over-all armed might is limited by treaty with the postwar Allies (including Russia), it is, nevertheless, getting this help from us up to the treaty limit as a partner in our North Atlantic Treaty Organization and cofighter in our fight against communism. This is the steamship Charlotte Lykes, out of New Orleans, with a cargo of 40 millimeter AA guns for the Italian Army. And on hand with Italian officers to see it unloaded are representatives of our Military Assistance Advisory Group—MAAF, as it it known in Naples—the American organization charged with helping the Italians to put this equipment to proper use. I invite you now to trace, as I did, how such United States military aid runs like a power-giving bloodstream through the Italian armed forces.

At the Italian air forces base at Naples, we saw 18 United States F–51 fighter planes turned over to the Italian air force. On hand to inspect the planes (and seen here chatting with the Italian commanding officer) was Col. Zeth McKee, of our own Air Force, one of several MAAG air force officers now on duty in Italy. Commander of an F–51 group himself in the war, McKee helps the pilots don their chutes, gives them a few knowing last-minute instructions, and then, wishing them luck, stands back to watch them take off in the new American planes that spell a mightier Italian air force.

Not only the Italian air force but also the Italian Navy is being buttressed with American help. Here at Tarranto we saw a navy ship being rebuilt with United States equipment—these seamen are installing fire-control devices. This month, to add to the strength of their fleet, three American destroyers sailed into this same harbor.

At the Ministry of Defense in Rome, United States officers sit frequently with Italian officers to discuss how best Italy might be rearmed to defend herself and the free world.

This is the first time such a conference was ever open to newsmen or the camera, and we of Battle Report were impressed with the frank discussion of all problems. The spirit we found at work here was strictly "let's do it."

One of the most heartening evidences that it will pay to have Italy on our side in any future encounter came when we visited Italy's famed Bersaglieri in the midst of their spring training program. Brigadier General Berti, who commands the brigade we saw, explains the problem of the day to United States Army Col. Phillip Pope, a MAAG officer on an inspection trip. Once squared away, the mock battle begins.

F–51's, born of United States aid, roar over the field to strafe "enemy" positions. Then, as the Bersaglieri open up far to the rear with American artillery, we saw them give a convincing demonstration of the meaning of their name—"sharpshooter"—as well as their unique tactics, for the Bersaglieri function as a mobile infantry and are famous for moving on the run in or out of formation.

These are General Sherman M–4 tanks, all from America. To give the battle realism, the tanks are "buttoned up" with their crews protected inside. Guns fire air bursts over them as they advance to simulate enemy fire. Behind the tanks advance the armored artillery firing, followed by Bersaglieri foot troops.

About that distinctive headgear: I asked about that; in fact tried to get one with no success. It's a type of priest's hat—black, with a black cock's plumage on top. No one knew very much about its exact origin. But they did tell me that the first unit of the Bersaglieri was formed in the Piedmont region in 1836 under the Savoy regime. War may have changed radically since 1846, but you may be sure that the Bersaglieri are prepared to give as good account of themselves today, in 1951, as they were famous for over a hundred years ago.

More maneuvers. This time, an Italian artillery regiment we found at Bracciano in north Italy. This one is using all United States equipment, including these huge United States-made 115-millimeter guns.

We sent them these "spotter" planes, too. They are being introduced for the first time to the Italian Army, for liaison and observation work. Here they're on a spotting mission for the Italian artillery. The "spotters" have done their duty, the artillery opens up with everything they have, "just like United States of America."

But it was high up in the Alps where we got our biggest thrill. Yes, filming the world-famous Alpini, the troops that fight on skis. The Alpini were organized in 1872 for the mountain defense of the Italian Alpine frontier. And you can take it from me, they're still leaving tracks in the snow that spell top-notch power. No common soldiers, these. To get men who know the mountains, these troops are recruited from the hardy frontiersmen of the mountainous areas. Tradition says these are the sons of fathers who were Alpinis before them.

An Alpini battalion is generally supported by a mountain artillery battery. Under our military-assistance program, they're being provided with our modern infantry weapons and taught how to use them. Yes; here in the scenic mountains of northern Italy near Odessa we saw, I think, the Italian Army at its best. The crack Alpini—spirit and moral high—among the finest of the world's mountain troops.

Before we left Italy we sought a professional appraisal of how well our military-aid program is arming that country against our common enemy. We found it when we turned our cameras on Brig. Gen. Norman H. Schwarzkopf, Director of MAAG in Italy, and Gen. Efisio Marras, Chief of Staff for the defense of Italy. We leave our last words on Italy to them.

General MARRAS. General, I express again our gratitude to the American people and I thank you personally—you, General—for your cooperation and our gratitude for our officers for what you do for our army.

General SCHWARZKOPF. General, you mentioned that another ship is unloading. This will be additional equipment for the Alpini and Bersaglieri and the Arietta brigade. I'm very glad to see this equipment coming in. Thank you for your friendly expressions, General. We find it a great pleasure to work with you and I feel that the work that we are doing here is cementing again the friendship between Italy and America. I hope that our assistance in this military-aid program will do a great deal to bring Italy up to the point it deserves and desires in the family of nations.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Seven months ago, Lt. Gen. Matthew B. Ridgway, who succeeds General MacArthur, appeared here with us in this studio on Battle Report. Fortunately, we have a recording of the talk he made then—words that are even more important now than they ever were. As he assumes his new command, we bring you once again—against the background of the conflict in Korea—the voice of General Ridgway.

Lieutenant General RIDGWAY. This period of our history is critical—critical, not just for days or months—critical not as we have been accustomed to view crisis—a situation, however, acute, to which by sudden emotional upsurges we can rise, and by sudden bursts of extraordinary energy, surmount. This is not that sort of crisis. It is one which may long continue, presenting us through the years, as it presents us at this moment, with problems of decision as basic and far-reaching in nature as any a free society has yet encountered. We do not know how long we shall be compelled to live as Soviet enemy No. 1, marked for attack by war or subversion at times of his choosing. We do know now—Korea ripped one mask aside—that there will be no quick and easy solution, no short-cut to our objective.

Mr. MCCORMICK. General Ridgway on the choice that faces us all.

Lieutenant General RIDGWAY. We need superior numbers and types of weapons as we never needed them before. We can't have them and unlimited luxuries too. We must choose between differing values. We need men and women in our ranks. We cannot have them, and an undisturbed economy too. We must make that choice through the years ahead.

Mr. MCCORMICK. General Ridgway, on the need of the men he led in battle in Korea, for support from home.

Lieutenant General RIDGWAY. They see (our troops), as they pray you see, that only so can we hope to attain the goal for which we fight—an honorable and lasting peace.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Thus, the words of General Ridgway. And as he prepares to turn his troops over to Lt. Gen. James A. Van Fleet, the war goes on. In the west-central sector the Hantan River is bridged; two full Chinese divisions, which had been opposing its crossing by American and Turkish troops, suddenly pull out. And the battle grows even more furious in the air as our troops on the ground continue to advance slowly behind tremendous fire power. To rigorous training like this, you can give thanks for every mile of our advance in Korea. Charged with the over-all responsibility of seeing to this training is a man to whom responsibility is certainly no stranger. Commanding general in World War II of the One Hundred and First Airborne, which he led in the invasion of France—the DSC for his heroism there—he later became our military commander in critical Berlin. He serves now as Assistant Chief of Staff, G–3. Ladies and gentlemen, Maj. Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor.

Maj. Gen. M. D. TAYLOR. I would like to say a few words about the military training program which is being conducted throughout the country. If I had a title for what I am about to say, I think it would be "More sweat—less blood." The surest way to be impressed with the seriousness of the military training, I believe, is to talk to some of the trainees whom you find in our camps and stations. I think that a few words with them would assure you how seriously they regard this business of preparing for war.

These young soldiers can tell you better than I can of the long hours spent on the target range, on the combat course, and the marches across country, for the purpose of conditioning their bodies. To them this is a deadly serious school, because they know that before too long they may be called upon to deliver on the battlefield. I don't have to say that war is a complex business and becoming more so year by year. As we give bigger and better machines and equipment to our troops, it requires better men to manipulate them successfully.

It is the tremendous importance of the human factor in warfare that makes it so necessary that our modern training be tough and realistic. We must begin with the individual soldier and make him a competent member of the fighting team. Then we must weld him into the smaller unit, the squad, the platoon, the company, those units which really bring victory or defeat. Finally, we must then fix the smaller units and put them into the regiment and divisions where we have the entire team of weapons which reaches from the large cannon to the emblem of the infantrymen. Now we know also that psychological aspects of preparation for battle are fully as important as the mechanical. It is another thing to create a man who can carry that weapon into action and continue through the hazards of the campaign. I would say that the objective of our training from a psychological view is to make the individual soldier feel in battle that he has been there before. If our training brings our military units into their first action without the feeling of strangeness which engenders panic, then we are sure that we will soon have a battle-hard unit. I have seen many detachments in their first engagement and it is always easy to spot the unit that is adequately trained. The men fall into position readily without hurry but with a briskness which indicates the confidence they have in themselves and in their comrades. Our weapons fall into action without delay and soon the formidable battery which they are able to create through their fire is leveled against the enemy. It is just like football teams. You do not see, however, the long hours of work, the weeks of sweat that have preceded that successful engagement. So I would say that we must have more sweat on the training fields to have less blood on the battlefields.

Mr. McCORMICK. While the biggest jet battles in air combat history took over the Korean news headlines this week end, the patient foot soldier pushed persistently ahead. Enemy resistance along the entire front ranged from light to heavy. In Yongpyong flame throwers were brought into play to flush the Communists from their bunker-type emplacements. On the central front light gains were reported. And all was comparatively quiet on the eastern front, where the Republic of Korea troops are holding the line. And so until we turn our cameras upon the Nation again next week for another "teledocumentary," including a special report on our jet patrol over the east-west frontier in Europe, this, then, against the background of Battle Front, Korea, is Robert McCormick putting a period on your thirty-third Battle Report, Washington.

Disloyalty in the State Department

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a broadcast by Frank Kirkpatrick from Station WMAW on April 10, 1951, regarding an investigation into disloyalty in the State Department.

There being no objection, the broadcast was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AS I SEE IT

(By Frank Kirkpatrick)

On the front page of your newspaper tonight is the story that one of Senator Tydings' innocent people has been suspended from duty under the loyalty procedure of the Navy Department. His name is Brunauer.

You will recall that Senator Tydings headed a committee last year which was supposed to investigate the loyalty of State Department employees. Mrs. Brunauer is employed in the State Department and before that was an official of the American Association of University Women. Both Mrs. Brunauer and her husband loudly cried to Tydings that they were being smeared by JOE MCCARTHY.

And, in this connection, I just cannot get excited over the fact that somebody printed a composite photograph of Senator Tydings and Earl Browder. And I'm beginning to wonder why so many editorial tears are being shed in Milwaukee over Tydings and the cookies he whitewashed. Maybe tonight would be a good time for us to take a look at the record of the Tydings investigation. Here's a page that looks interesting.

In the witness chair is the former Director of Investigations of the Office of Strategic Services of the Army. He is telling about how he entered the offices of the notorious Amerasia magazine and found the evidence against an espionage agent. Keep in mind that this was early 1945, during the war, and before we knew there was an atomic bomb. I quote Mr. Bielaski's sworn testimony.

"Mr. BIELASKI. I went on back to the two rear rooms—the one on the right was the office of Phillip Jaffe.

"All over the top of his desk were documents that had been photocopied and were drying. There must have been—oh, I will say roughly 15 or 20 documents.

"About the time I started to look at these things, Oleson came in. He had been assigned to the library, which is a large room, and he said, 'I think you had better come in the library. I have something to show you in here.'

"So, I went in the library. Their table, as big as this, was covered with documents [and] an envelope in the middle of the table was there, and written across the top of it cater-cornered was the name 'John Hersey.'

"Senator TYDINGS. John——

"Mr. BIELASKI. H-e-r-s-e-y. The author, I presume.

"Senator TYDINGS. At least the name is right.

"Mr. BIELASKI. The names are identical, and it was not an envelope, to my mind, that was addressed to him, but as you might write your name on an envelope belonging to you.

"The envelope was open on the table, and there were quite a few of these documents that had John Hersey's name written on them, too.

"I was, of course, noplussed after seeing all this stuff. Oleson said to me, 'You haven't seen anything yet. Let me show you what's in the envelope.'

"So, he opened the envelope and pulled out about, I would say, a dozen or 15 documents. When I started to look at them, he said, 'Wait a minute—you are looking at the wrong place; look in between them'; and here in between these documents we found six typewritten documents—and all six of them were marked 'top secret.' Before I went back I looked these documents over in the Hersey envelope and of the six, I remember only two, remembering the meaning of the titles and one of which I have a general recollection. The first one that I recall was a document, as I say, marked 'top secret,' which dealt with the units of the Japanese Navy, subsequent to the Battle of Leyte——

"Senator TYDINGS (interrupting). And it showed the disposition——

"Mr. BIELASKI. It showed them by name and the ports where they were hiding and if they were disabled—that was the general tenor of it. The other documents——

"Senator TYDINGS (interrupting). Was that in the brown envelope in the center of the table?

"Mr. BIELASKI. That was in the envelope, mixed in between these other documents.

"Senator MCMAHON. Do you know what Hersey was doing at that time?

"Mr. BIELASKI. I do not.

"Senator MCMAHON. You don't know what occupation he had?

"Mr. BIELASKI. No. I know what he had shortly after that. He went on a trip to the Far East, but I don't know where he went.

"The second document was one which was headed, to the best of my knowledge, the bombing program, or strategic bombing program for Japan; and, it said in effect that the targets would be the principal industrial cities of Japan.

"The third document which I remember, and of which I do not remember as much as I wish I did, had to do with a new bomb, which I thought at the time was merely a piece of ordnance. I recall that it was marked "A" bomb, but was merely a capital A with quotation marks on each side, and it didn't say atomic, and as I had no knowledge of the atomic bomb, it meant very little to me and didn't mean anything to me until several months later.

"Senator GREENE. What was the nature of the memorandum about the A bomb?

"Mr. BIELASKI. That I don't know, sir. I have racked my memory time and again to produce more. I don't know whether it was a progress report or a plan report or what. I remember my reaction to it because it seemed to me just a bomb, an A bomb as compared to a B bomb or a C bomb or a D bomb.

"About that time we happened to pull the office door back and I discovered behind that door a very large bellows suitcase. I had the lockman immediately open that, and that was stuffed so full of documents that we just dropped everything. I have tried to estimate since, with the help of the men who were with me, how many documents we saw there, and at luncheon the other day we agreed it was a conservative number to say there were 400. I didn't believe that anybody would believe me if I made a written report on what we saw and what we did, so I decided to take enough with me to show them what we had found, and then there would be no possibility of their denying it.

"We had documents there from every department of the Government except the FBI. Every document I saw was stamped with the mail receipt stamp of the Department of State. All those that I saw, also, were marked with a paragraph. I cannot read it exactly to you, but it was to the effect that 'The possession of these documents by an unauthorized person constituted a violation of the Espionage Act,' and it quoted the paragraph and so forth of the act.

"Senator MCMAHON. Mr. Bielaski, as I get it now, these documents, many of them originated in different departments of the Government, but they had been received at the State Department?"

"Mr. BIELASKI. Yes, sir."

That's the end of my quotes of the testimony of an investigation which Senator Tydings and Senator McMahon and Senator Green said did not show any evidence of disloyalty in the State Department. And, since Senator LODGE has been put on the United Nations delegation, he, too, seems to have recovered from any indignation he once felt.

And John Service, who was involved in this Amerasia case and who confessed to giving documents to Jaffe, the confessed espionage agent, he has been promoted and is today a foreign officer in the State Department.

And, now, do you remember the name John Hersey in Mr. Bielaski's testimony? Are you curious as to what has happened to him? Well, I don't know what happened to him, but last Saturday night I was reading a current story on President Truman. It is the kind of story that any reporter in America would give his right eye to get permission to write. It is the kind of story that involves going for walks with the President, going swimming with the President, talking confidentially with the President—it is the kind of story that seldom can be written about a President until after he is dead, because in allowing the story to be written, the President has to show favoritism to the man who writes it.

And the man who goes walking and swimming with the President—and who is favored to write this story? His name? John Hersey.

And the three little monkeys who speak no evil, see no evil, and hear no evil about Communists, reign supreme.

Premise of Our Global Strategy: Strong Allies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. WILLIAM BENTON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the illuminating piece by Mr. James Reston in last Sunday's New York Times, entitled "Premise of Our Global Strategy: Strong Allies." May I suggest that this premise is largely overlooked by General MacArthur in his presentation of his own viewpoint to the American people?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PREMISE OF OUR GLOBAL STRATEGY: STRONG ALLIES—ADMINISTRATION IS BOUND TO CONSIDER FACTS WHICH MACARTHUR IGNORES

(By James Reston)

WASHINGTON, April 21.—The big questions raised by General MacArthur's speech in Congress are not whether we want what the general wants but whether we are prepared to risk what he is prepared to risk and whether we are prepared to risk it alone.

Almost everybody wants the advantages of total victory over the Chinese Communists without the disadvantages of total war, but is this possible or even probable?

General MacArthur thinks it is. He believes that if we bomb the enemy's supply bases in Manchuria, impose a sharp naval blockade of the China coast, use Chiang Kai-shek's manpower in the struggle, and send major reinforcements of our own to Korea, we can knock Communist China out of the war without too much risk of the Soviet Union coming in.

This part of the argument is a question of judgment, or rather of guesswork, about how the Russians would react. General MacArthur was wrong about what the Chinese Communists would do, but in this case he may be entirely right. It might be possible merely to launch this policy and get away with it. It could be that, if the Russians were told explicitly that we were going to end the Korean War, and that if they intervened we would hit them with everything we had, they would stay out.

RISK IS REJECTED

The administration concedes that this is possible. It puts the odds at about fifty-fifty on the success of such a policy, but it does not think these odds are good enough, for if the bet goes wrong the result is the third world war.

The Government here is not ready for any such risk. Despite all the talk about mobilization and rearmament the United States has barely been able to meet the requirements of the limited war in Korea; it is just beginning to get enough manpower to relieve some of the Army foot soldiers there. Our own "privileged sanctuary" in Japan, to say nothing of this "sanctuary" of the privileged, is still wide open to attack, and the four divisions promised for Europe are still not ready.

If the Russians cooperated, of course, everything might be all right. They might not retaliate. They might recognize our blockade of China and not try to run their ships through it; they might not retaliate by bombing our souces of supply in Japan or the United States, and in that event the MacArthur thesis would be a triumph, like Inchon. The trouble is that if it failed it would be a disaster far worse than the miscalculation of last November.

The feeling here is that no one government has the right to take such a risk in such circumstances, even in the name of its own people, let alone in the name of a whole coalition of nations.

OTHER NATIONS CONSIDERED

As long as there is any reasonable question about any policy of ours leading to a third world war that would hit many other nations as well as our own, officials here have been bound to ask themselves, first, whether we were prepared to take the gamble ourselves, and second, whether our allies were prepared to gamble with us.

In the case of the MacArthur thesis, the answer has been "no" in both cases. The Joint Chiefs of Staff are undoubtedly willing to increase the risk in Korea a little, and some officers in the Pentagon undoubtedly approve the MacArthur thesis 100 percent. But the Government as a whole rejects it, and our Allies will not even discuss anything more than economic sanctions, and probably won't agree to much of that.

Thus if the forthcoming debate is to avoid what General MacArthur called the "pitfalls of unrealism" it must deal with the hard fact that if we follow the MacArthur policy we shall have to do it before this Government thinks we are ready, and we shall have to do it without the approval, and probably without the support of our allies.

There is no effective way to fight an all-out war against the Soviet Union without the approval and support of our allies. There is no way to retain the support of Japan, or to complete the defense of the Pacific, or to align ourselves with the rising peoples of Asia and its islands without these allies.

UNITED NATIONS IGNORED

The general himself illustrated these facts, though he managed to get all the way through his speech without ever mentioning the United Nations. He spoke warmly of the cooperation of the Japanese people, but how long would that cooperation last if the Japanese thought we were seriously considering a policy which would bring about retaliatory bombing of the Japanese islands?

The General wants a peace treaty for Japan. He wants us to retain permanent military installations there, but we cannot implement a peace treaty for Japan without the cooperation of Britain, Australia, and New Zealand, and we cannot maintain effective military installations in Japan against a hostile population.

Nobody knows better than the Japanese how few soldiers we have in their islands today, or how vulnerable our present Japanese installations are to attack from the Russian bases in Sakhalin. In these circumstances would the Japanese favor a policy of extending the war to Manchuria before we are even in a position to defend our own planes on the Japanese air strips, let alone the Japanese people?

Similarly, the General wants us to maintain a global policy. "To consider the problems of one sector oblivious to the problems of another is to court disaster for the whole," he told the Congress.

To maintain a global policy, however, it is necessary for us to have bases in north Africa, in France, in Britain, and in various other places around the globe. In fact, even to protect the ocean approaches to the United States, it is necessary to have bases in such places as Iceland, Greenland, and the Azores, which do not belong to us.

LACK OF EXPLANATION

General MacArthur did not explain how these things were to be done without the cooperation of a large number of allies. He did not tell the Congress how it was possible to use our strategic air power against the Soviet Union without the help of these allies, yet he developed a thesis which he knew to be unacceptable, not only to his own Government, but to the entire allied coalition.

Moreover, his strategy for fighting the Chinese Communists was strangely at variance with his analysis of the political and social developments of the Orient. Prime Minister Nehru of India would agree almost entirely with what the General said about the profound nationalistic feelings of the Asian peoples, and so would the British Foreign Office, but they could not possibly be farther apart from him on how to deal with this new nationalism.

There is widespread approval of General MacArthur's statement that the Chinese Communists are not mere puppets of Moscow, but are playing along for the time being for their own selfish purpose. But most people who think Peiping is not a satellite of Moscow, as General MacArthur clearly indicated it was not, believe that the thing to do is to limit the war against Peiping as much as possible. The general, however, argued that on the one hand there was a vital new force of nationalism afoot in Asia, and that we had to adjust our policies to this important fact, but he said this in a speech designed to bring about a major air and naval war against the very power that is the most obvious symbol of that new oriental nationalism.

MINIMUM OF GROUND TROOPS

Finally, the general implied that we must try to develop our defenses with a minimum of ground troops and expense—and in his speech before the DAR, he added a minimum of regulation, too. But how are we to keep our ground troops and our defense budget at a minimum without the cooperative defense effort of the French, the British, the Canadians, and the other members of the North Atlantic Treaty?

All our present strategic calculations are based upon their contributions, not only of bases, but of many more trained and equipped men than we are planning to throw into the pool. Their contributions are certainly not going to be made, however, in support of policies which they do not approve.

The fact that General MacArthur is opposed by his own Government and the governments of the whole free world does not, of course, prove that he is wrong.

The definition of objectives is easy but reaching decisions on the means, when the fate of the Republic and the whole free world is at stake, is something else again.

Maybe the country wants to send major reinforcements to Korea, as the general has requested. Maybe it really is fed up with the untidiness of this half war, and would rather risk the total clash. But the price of the battle has to be weighed as well as the rewards of victory.

For just as the general could not answer when his troops asked him why surrender military advantages to the enemy in Korea, so the Government will have to answer for the consequences of its acts.

The government that extends the war and produces a world-wide clash is in a much more serious position that the government that moves cautiously in concert with its allies. For if the Government is wrong now in its limited-war policy, it must merely answer to General MacArthur and its other critics at home. But if it adopts the MacArthur policy and fails, then it must answer to the whole world and to history.

Dismissal of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a broadcast by Frank Kirkpatrick, on April 16, 1951, regarding the dismissal of General MacArthur.

There being no objection, the broadcast was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AS I SEE IT

Good evening.

Let's talk about the issues back of the dismissal of General MacArthur. To fully understand the far-eastern situation you need to look at a map of Asia. As you look at the islands which make up the Japanese Empire, you will see that the peninsula of Korea is like a spearhead pointed at Japan. To the north is the island of Sakhalin. To the south is another large island called Formosa. And a little southeast of Formosa are the Philippine Islands.

Japan, as a nation, fought China late in the nineteenth century to protect herself against the dangers of attack from Korea, or from Formosa. She acquired these territories. She was still threatened by the island of Sakhalin and threatened by Russia, through Russia's control of certain ports in China. So, in 1905 Japan fought and defeated Russia. Japan got the ports and she got the south half of the island of Sakhalin. If you will look at a map you will see why Japan had to do this, because if unfriendly powers held Sakhalin, Korea, and Formosa, Japan would have enemies on every side of her, except the east.

When we defeated Japan in 1945, General MacArthur was made the administrator of 84,000,000 of people. One of his jobs was the reformation of Japan, but another of his jobs was to defend Japan, since we had disarmed her, leaving her unable to defend herself. Even a school boy looking at a map would understand that our policy must be to make Japan into a nation friendly to America, so that our Pacific defense line would lie across the Pacific, not on our own west coast. And that was MacArthur's job. How successfully he has done this job was shown yesterday when 2,000,000 of Japanese stood in tears while their conqueror took off to answer to a ward heeler from Kansas City.

MacArthur's job had been made difficult for him even before he took over. Sahkalin on the north secretly had been given to Russia at Yalta. Manchuria, for all practical purposes, was also given to Russia at Yalta, and so were the Chinese ports of Darien and Port Arthur. That weakening of our defense line was done even before we defeated Japan.

Now, keep in mind that our State Department destroyed a friendly government in China and aided the coming to power of the Communists. In early 1950, this was our situation in the Far East: We had Russia occupying all of Sakhalin; we had a Russian satellite government, armed by Russia and directed by Russians, occupying the northern part of Korea. To the west of Japan the Red Chinese, our enemies, held the mainland. Also to the west, holding the ports of Darien and Port Arthur, were the Russians. To the south of Japan, the island of Formosa was occupied by the friendly forces of the National Chinese Government.

So, the State Department, following its policy of betraying American interests to create a Communist world, announced that South Korea could fall to the Communist North Koreans. The State Department would approve no arms for South Korea and even when Congress voted aid, the State Department held up the shipment of the supplies. Chiang Kai-shek, on Formosa, was fighting the Red Chinese on the mainland; but he was also having to fight the State Department. Acheson formally objected to the blockade which Chiang Kai-shek was enforcing against the mainland of Red China; and the Secretary of State made it clear that we would not defend Korea and that we would not help in the defense of Formosa. Perhaps I can recall this to you locally by suggesting that you may remember an editorial of the Milwaukee Journal. In discussing this the Journal sarcastically asked the people of Milwaukee if they wanted to go to war for Formosa.

Then, following the Communist line, the State Department, the spring of 1950, began propagandizing the American people to sell us the idea of seating Red China in the United Nations and in the Security Council.

As Assistant Secretary of State, McDermott, put it to me and I quote him, "Yes, it is our policy to seat the Red Chinese, but we cannot announce it until the American people are ready for it."

To military men, however, the actions of our State Department were most serious. They realized that this meant the complete destruction of our Pacific defense line. If Korea and Formosa fell it meant that we could not hold Japan, and an unarmed Japan could not defend herself. So, in quick succession we would lose Korea, then Formosa, probably the Philippines next, and, last of all, Japan. This would destroy our Pacific defense line and give the Communists an additional 125,000,000 people. Most important it would give the Communists the great industrial plant and manpower of Japan.

Standing in the way of the Reds and their State Department collaborators was only one man—Douglas MacArthur.

In June 1950, Defense Secretary Louis Johnson and some of our military men visited the Far East. They returned on June 24. They went to the White House to make their report and it is generally understood that they convinced the President of the dangers to America in the policy of the State Department. The American people were not told what took place at this meeting; but the Communists knew what happened, as the Communists have known every detail of what happens in our Government and particularly the White House since 1945. So, the Communists moved to take by force what they had expected to get by default. This was too raw for even the President. He thereupon ordered a token defense of South Korea. But, he was careful to tie the hands of the commander in chief of our forces in the Far East, General MacArthur. And to reassure the Red Chinese he sent an American fleet to protect the Reds from the anti-Communist Chinese on Formosa. Since then, the State Department has sought a new formula to surrender our defense line, a formula by which it can keep faith with the Reds.

Louis Johnson, our Secretary of Defense, was fired, and hatchet man Marshall took over.

Then, our State Department manufactured a lot of excitement about Europe. This has worked before. Our minds were kept on the Berlin blockade while the rug was pulled from under Chiang Kai-shek. Don't forget that.

It has continued to be State Department policy to give Korea and Formosa—and eventually Japan—to the Reds.

It was and still is State Department policy to seat Red China in the Security Council.

It was and is State Department and Russian policy to give control of the Security Council to the Communists. There are just five permanent seats in the Council: Russia holds one; France, which is more than 50 percent Communist controlled, holds one; Britain, which has a Communist for Minister of War, holds one; China holds one; and we hold the fifth. Add it up, and figure what happens when the Red Chinese are seated.

But the State Department and the Communists have had one man who has foreseen and blocked several of their moves. That man is MacArthur.

MacArthur knows that the boogyman of a powerful Red China is just State Department hokum. He knows that if Chiang Kai-shek is given aid; that, together, we can finish off this Far East mess—with the probability that the anti-Communist Chinese can regain control of their country.

So, the State Department early this year tried to put together an appeasing peace. You surely remember. Mr. Truman repeated most of the terms just the other night. But this was rejected by the Reds. At the time I did not understand why the Reds refused to accept as a gift from Mr. Acheson what they were fighting to gain. Now, I understand—like Hitler, their terms become harsher. Their new price includes the man they most fear in all the world—Douglas MacArthur.

I repeat what I've said before. This is not an issue of a general versus a President. It is not an issue of more war or less. It is not an issue of Republican versus Democrat as the President tried to make it Saturday night. The issue is the security of America versus its betrayers.

Good night.

Jewett, Ohio, Welcomes New Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE L. HAYS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, one of the progressive villages in my district is Jewett in Harrison County, Ohio. Some weeks ago I met with the Jewett Chamber of Commerce to discuss with them the possibility of obtaining industries to locate in this village. I am inserting with these remarks a short outline of some of the advantages the village of Jewett could offer to industries which might desire to locate there:

The Jewett Chamber of Commerce wishes to advise industries that we have available sites suitable for industrial location.

Jewett is well serviced by the main lines of both the Pennsylvania and the Nickel Plate Railroads. We are located on State Routes 9 and 151, and within 4 miles of United States Route 22.

There is available an unlimited supply of coal. Electrical power is supplied by the Ohio Power Co. Gas is supplied by the Natural Gas Co. of West Virginia. We have also an excellent supply of good water.

Jewett also has available excellent fire protection facilities, fine churches, and a superior school system. We have a large community park with a baseball diamond, tennis courts, and a community building for public meetings.

There is also available a reservoir of unskilled labor both male and female within the immediate vicinity.

Interested parties please contact George Telfer, industrial development committee, Jewett Chamber of Commerce.

United States Policy in Asia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a broadcast by Frank Kirkpatrick on April 15, 1951, regarding United States policy in Asia.

There being no objection, the broadcast was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Good afternoon, since last Wednesday morning, most of us have not thought or talked about anything except the tragic situation which has been exposed by the dismissal of General MacArthur. And, of course, I have talked on this subject during the past week. There have been many requests that I repeat Friday's night's broadcast for persons who did not hear it. So, here it is:

I refer again to the MacArthur dismissal. This is not a conflict between a great, but subordinate, military man and the President of the United States. This is a conflict between a great servant of the American people who happens to be a soldier, and a conspiracy within our Government to help advance world communism.

If the American people fail to recognize this, and fail to understand the shocking truth of what their Government has been and is being used for, their present anger will be expended on superficialities. Make no mistake, this involves the dismissal of a general who stood in the way of surrender of our Pacific defense line—a dismissal demanded by the Soviets and their British collaborators, as evidence that Acheson and Truman can deliver their pledged aid for world communism. Already, today, the British have demanded that the Red Chinese move into Japan.

Tragically, one of the great sources of our national strength is also our greatest weakness—that is, our supreme faith in our two-party system.

For generations our political dissatisfactions have found expression in throwing out one party and putting another in power. We have done this periodically with the complete confidence—amounting to smugness—of a people who know that both parties are basically American, differing only in superficial details as to how to approach a given problem. We have correctly been indifferent to the occasional third-party movements. But, this supreme confidence in our two-party system has blinded us to the possible dangers of an infiltration of one or both of those parties. And, much of our press on which we depend for news is so organized that it is largely an unwitting instrument for continuing the fiction that we have only Republicans and Democrats.

The fact is that there are men in positions of influence in both our major parties whose aim is the use of those parties to accomplish world communism. For the most part these political Trojan horses have operated in the Democratic Party, because it has been the party in power; and because it has shown a greater willingness to accept plausible arguments for both real and fake social reforms. But, the Republican Party has not been without its wolves in sheeps' clothing. In fact, Wendell Wilkie was pretty well captured by the same kind of people who control Truman.

If this is true, we must be on our guard against letting anyone fool us into thinking this MacArthur episode is a partisan political fight. Both Republicans and Democrats must understand exactly what this action means, and the Democrats, particularly, should understand the issue. If the Democrats fail to do so, their great party can be wrecked; or, what would be worse, completely captured and used as the instrument to keep pro-Soviets in power.

Whether you usually vote Democratic or Republican is immaterial; you must know that what I am saying is true. Your reason will tell you it is true. Don't accept my opinion, and don't accept others' opinion either; but look at the factual record and apply your ordinary common sense.

Here are the high spots of that record:

1. The people and the governments of China have been our great Asiatic friends for a hundred years.

2. This friendship was and is so strong that even a pro-Communist State Department official, writing from China in 1944, was forced to say: "No government can survive in China without the blessing of the United States."

3. Earl Browder, the one-time Communist leader in the United States, testified under oath last summer that State Department policy and the Communist Party policy on China became the same in 1942 and that he—Earl Browder—was called to the State Department and given the message confirming this change, to transmit to the Red Chinese that this would be future policy.

4. The American people were not told about this change in policy however; and even our Ambassador to China was not so informed. Patrick Hurley, the United States Ambassador, was allowed to keep up the fiction of cooperation with the legal government of China, but his pro-Soviet staff had their own secret orders.

5. At Yalta, in February 1945, Mr. Hiss, Mr. Acheson, and Mr. Stettinius, with Mr. Roosevelt, secretly sold out the Chinese Government to the Communists. They betrayed Poland at the same time; and this betrayal was made public, because Stalin wanted Poland right away. But Stalin did not move on China until he was sure Japan had been knocked out. So, the betrayal of China was kept secret. The part of the Yalta agreement which betrayed China was kept secret for 2 years.

6. Up to this point, Mr. Truman was not responsible for betraying China. But, don't think Mr. Truman didn't know about the policy of betraying China to the Reds. Maybe he didn't know about Yalta, but he did know the rest, because Patrick Hurley told him so. When Hurley resigned on November 26, 1945, his resignation contained these warning and prophetic words—I quote: "We finished the war in the Far East furnishing lend-lease supplies and using all our reputation to undermine democracy and bolster imperialism and communism. Our professional diplomats continuously advised the Communists that my efforts in preventing the collapse of the National Government did not represent the policy of the United States. These same professionals openly advised the Communists' armed party to decline unification * * * unless the Chinese Communists were given control. The weakness of the American foreign policy has backed us into two world wars. There is a third world war in the making. * * * The war that is now in the making is not even intended to defend or establish democratic ideals. * * * A considerable section of our State Department is endeavoring to support communism generally, as well as specifically, in China. * * * Make no mistake, Mr. President, America's economic strength has been used all over the world to defeat American policies and interest."

That was said to Mr. Truman in November 1945, by a man who could not conceivably have any political or personal reason for speaking anything but the truth. And, the men he named as betrayers of this country are still in our State Department.

7. What did Mr. Truman do? On December 15, 1945, less than 3 weeks after he had been given the facts by Ambassador Hurley, Truman issued a statement on policy toward China, practically ordering the National Government to take in the Communists. And, to make sure the Government of China understood him, he said, "United States support will not extend to United States military intervention to influence the course of any Chinese internal strife."

8. Not content with telling the President of China to bring the Chinese Reds into his Government, Truman sent Gen. George Marshall to China to bring the Red Chinese into power. When Chiang Kai-shek resisted and told Marshall that he was betraying China to the Reds, Marshall stopped all aid to China—and on December 18, 1946, President Truman made it clear to the Red world that it could take over. Said appeaser Truman, "No weapons which could be used in fighting a civil war were made available."

9. Thereafter, Mr. Truman was repeatedly warned of the dangers he had brought to America by his China policy, so, on July 9, 1947, Mr. Truman sent Lieutenant General Wedemeyer to China to make an appraisal of the situation. He instructed General Wedemeyer to recommend to him what action he, President Truman, should take.

Wedemeyer was not sent by General MacArthur. He was not sent by the Republicans in the Congress. General Wedemeyer was a man selected and sent to China by President Truman. Now, let's see what President Truman's own emissary had to say to him after his survey.

Wedemeyer reported, among other things, "The bulk of the Chinese are not disposed to communism and they are not concerned with ideologies. * * * Although the Japanese offered increasingly favorable surrender terms during the course of the war, China elected to remain steadfast with her allies. * * * (This fact should be considered in any criticism of the Government of China.) * * * Indirectly, the United States facilitated the Soviet program in the Far East by agreeing at the Yalta Conference to Russian reentry into Manchuria and later by withholding aid from the National Government. * * * Prompt action is necessary to prevent Manchuria from becoming a Soviet satellite. * * * Gradually, it has become apparent that there remains a world power presenting even greater dangers to world peace than did the Nazi militarists and the Japanese jingoists. * * * It may be said that the American mediation effort (that is, Marshall's mission) has been to the advantage of the Chinese Communists and conversely to the disadvantage of the National Government. * * * At this time a policy of no assistance to China would be equivalent to cutting the ground from under the feet of the Chinese Government. Removal of American assistance without removal of Soviet assistance would certainly lay the country open to eventual Communist domination. It would have repercussions in other parts of Asia, would lower American prestige in the Far East and make easier the spread of Soviet influence and Soviet political expansion—not only in Asia, but in other areas of the world.

That report was made to the President on the 19th of September 1947, by his own observant adviser. And what happened to this report? It was forbidden to be made public. And who forbade it to be made public? George Marshall, Acheson's stooge Secretary of Defense, testified under oath late last year, "I ordered it suppressed."

10. But Mr. Truman had still other warnings of what would happen. On November 9, 1948, the President of China pointed out to the President that China had signed a treaty with Russia on the advice of the United States and that Soviet aid given to the Chinese Communists was wrecking his country. Within the same week the Ambassador to China, Mr. Stuart, sent to the State Department a warning from the President of China, which said in part, "In case China should be subjugated by the Communists the third world war would surely follow, and mankind would once again be precipitated into a tragic disaster."

But within the same week General Marshall now became the Secretary of State, with Acheson and Jessup as his advisers, said that to help China would be, and I quote his exact words, "To embark upon a quixotic venture."

Thereafter it was announced by Acheson, in early 1950, that we would not defend those parts of our Pacific defense line made up of the Korean Peninsula and Formosa. But our military leaders saw that this also meant the eventual abandonment of Japan and the Philippines to the Reds and our withdrawal to Hawaii and our Pacific coast. Less than 12 hours before the attack on South Korea last June these military men evidently convinced the President of this fact. This secret leaked out, and the North Koreans marched. The rest is history.

There are the highlights of the record of the creation of Red China—not as I see it, but as it is. Red China is a creation of Hiss, Acheson, Stettinius, Marshall, and Truman. And when their creation and their betrayals threatened to destroy America's defense line of Japan, Korea, Formosa, and the Philippines, MacArthur stood firm against further betrayals. Thereupon the Reds in and out of Government demanded his head. Mr. Truman delivered—because, in my opinion, he was pledged to deliver.

Good afternoon.

Replacement of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address on the subject The MacArthur Week, by George E. Sokolsky, broadcast on April 22, 1951, over the facilities of the American Broadcasting Co.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The President technically disgraced Gen. Douglas MacArthur. He dismissed a general in the field in the course of battle. He dismissed the general suddenly, in the dark of night. He dismissed him without hearing or trial. He dismissed him for insubordination.

Then a phenomenon occurred which requires keen study and analysis. Let me put it to you this way:

We speak of this country as a democracy which, of course, politically it is not. It is a representative republic, in which the people control their Government through five elected officials, the President, the Vice President, two United States Senators, and one Member of the House of Representatives. To these are given specific duties, obligations, responsibilities, and authorities by the Constitution. What is not designated to them is reserved to the States and the people thereof. Limitations upon government are clearly stated in the Constitution.

In a true democracy, the people directly set the policies of government; in a representative republic the people control the government indirectly by stated elections.

Various steps have heretofore been recommended to make our system of government more democratic, such as the referendum and recall. Some of these have been tried locally, but they have in no manner altered the basic character of our representative government.

Therefore the MacArthur Week, starting at 1 a. m. on Wednesday morning, April 11, and lasting until about 5 p. m. on Friday, April 20, represents an important political phenomenon. It is democracy at work.

I shall take you through this process step by step:

On Wednesday, when the public rose to read their newspapers, they read that the President had suddenly and with finality dismissed Gen. Douglas MacArthur.

The politicians of both parties felt that it was too bad. The Republicans were more angry that the President had dismissed General MacArthur in disgrace than that he had been recalled. The Democrats formed ranks because they realized that the President had pulled a boner, that he had acted the boor.

All this had nothing to do with whether General MacArthur was right or wrong, whether he had been insubordinate or had obeyed the instructions of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, whether his program for Asia would or would not extend the war.

It was a normal response of decent human beings to a crude procedure against a man who had devoted 52 years of his 71 to the service of his country.

So the people acted. The President, every Senator, every Congressman, every newspaper editor, every columnist and commentator suddenly found himself snowed under a mass of letters and telegrams on the subject of MacArthur.

This was a spontaneous, unorganized popular response. For instance, I was awakened to the news during the night; throughout the morning of Wednesday my telephone was tied up to answer the simple question: "What can we do?" I began to receive checks—which we are, of course, returning—from persons who wanted to contribute to a fund to honor MacArthur. There was no committee, no organization, no leadership; there was only action by the people.

Even by Wednesday night it was clear that the people were in some manner overruling the Government.

Many politicians believed that it would pass over quickly; that it would be a single shout and die down.

The demand by Thursday had grown into a terrific ground swell and it centered on MacArthur appearing before a joint meeting of the Congress to state his case.

This the Democrats, under pressure from the President, rejected. Their first compromise was that he would appear before a senatorial committee in secret session. This Representative JOE MARTIN, of Massachusetts, who took the lead in the matter in Congress, rejected as not good enough.

By Thursday the ground swell was so great that it was no longer a question of MacArthur's disgrace, it was rather a question of defending the President and the Democratic Party.

President Truman immediately took to the radio to defend his course—that is, on Wednesday night—but he could not stem the tide.

It was then that the Republicans and Democrats tangled over the question of the forum that would be afforded the general. MacArthur himself was no part of this quarrel. He maintained a dignified aloofness. The Democrats then offered a meeting in the Library of Congress, which JOE MARTIN rejected as not good enough. He threatened to hire a stadium for a forum.

Thursday, Friday, Saturday, the people spoke as they had never before done in this country. The popular emotion was a response to many things: to the Communists and homosexuals in the State Department, to the shame of our cities as evidenced by the Kefauver committee, to the mink coats and deep freezes, to the corruption in the RFC, to the Fulbright committee's investigations, to the President's letters, and to the President's intimate friends, to the coterie of Missouri fixers that surround him.

In a way, these questions overshadowed the MacArthur dismissal. But nothing overshadowed the fact that more than 10,000 Americans had been killed in the stalemated Korean War.

On Sunday, General MacArthur left Japan on the Bataan with his wife and son. It was reminiscent of his departure from Bataan in an open boat, with his wife and son. The Japanese wept at his departure. Even the Emperor broke all precedents and called on MacArthur to bid him farewell. America responded with an unmistakable demand for a hero's welcome. The rest, you have witnessed.

This should be understood by the delegates to the United Nations, by the Russians, and the British, and the Indians: The stupendous reception given to General MacArthur by the American people is democracy at work in this country.

The American people overruled their Government. President Truman could dismiss General MacArthur; he could not disgrace General MacArthur. The citizens demonstrated that in this country the authority of government rests with the people; that it is for the people to decide who is to be honored and who is to be disgraced. And they decided.

There is a further point to be made concerning all this:

We have for many years now become accustomed to regarding the President as more than he is in our system of government. This was due to three causes:

1. The personal charm of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

2. The despair of the depression and the fright of the war.

3. A propaganda build-up, which has cost the American taxpayer an enormous amount of money, designed to publicize favorably the Executive and reduce the authority of the congressional branch of Government.

The effect of it has been that we have been getting government by experts, working in secrecy and facing Congress and the people with the results of their private actions which would no longer be undone. Most Americans now realize that the secret agreements at Tehran, Yalta, and Postdam, and other conferences brought on the Korean War, forced upon us remobilization of our industries and of our sons, and a wartime budget in what the politicians call peace.

The people regard their country as in peril.

This, then, is what the demonstration for Gen. Douglas MacArthur means in its broadest and impersonal aspects.

Recognizing the high regard of our people for MacArthur, they nevertheless spontaneously sensed that this is a way to emphasize to the President that the people are displeased, frightened, and angered and that they want a change from the policies pursued and the methods employed by the administration not only in our foreign relations but in domestic affairs.

And it is also a warning to Great Britain—to Great Britain more than to any other country.

Most Americans believe that the prime factor in the removal of General MacArthur has been the constant and unseemly British opposition to him.

From now on we shall have an American policy in the Far East. The British can do what their interests require them to do—but so shall the American people. Anybody, the President or the Secretary of State, who thinks otherwise, will find an American public opinion that has rediscovered its power and authority.

This is democracy at work.

The political issue that Douglas MacArthur raised is: Who is telling the truth—the President or Douglas MacArthur? The President says that MacArthur acted without authority; MacArthur says that his program was approved by the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Up to this moment, General Bradley has not denied that the Joint Chiefs of Staff approved MacArthur's program for Asia.

Until this is cleared up, it remains a controversial and troublesome question in American life. Our people dislike liars—they need to know who lied in this vital matter.

Soviet Cultural Influence in North Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM BENTON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, Dr. Harvie Branscomb, the chancelor of Vanderbilt University, who is Chairman of the United States Advisory Commission on Educational Exchange, has been kind enough to send me a copy of the fifth semiannual report of the Commission, dated April 6, 1951. The Commission was created under the Smith-Mundt Act to advise both the Congress and the Department of State on the progress of our international educational exchanges.

I ask consent to have inserted in the RECORD one section of Dr. Branscomb's latest report, a section dealing with Soviet cultural activities in North Korea.

Last summer, testifying before the Foreign Relations Committee on my Resolution No. 243, I asked how the Soviet Union had been able to whip up the emotions of the people of North Korea to the point where tens of thousands of their boys were flinging themselves against our machine guns. I cited as at least a partial answer the power of the Pyongyang radio, and other instruments of Communist-controlled propaganda. Now Dr. Branscomb assembles the evidence on the enormous scale of Soviet cultural penetration in North Korea, as distinct from its activities in radio, pamphleteering, posters, and the handling of the news.

I am not introducing Dr. Branscomb's material because of its retrospective value. The North Korean instance is a test case on how Soviet propaganda works, and as such is applicable to many areas of the world. It is a warning to us of the nature and scale of the Soviet thrust which we must counter and overcome.

Think of it, by 1949, 1,300,000 North Koreans, out of a total of 8,000,000, were enrolled in Korean-Soviet culture societies, in 105 branches. One hundred and nine special Russian-language schools were established. In 1949 alone some 500 Soviet books were translated into Korean, 2 of them attaining distribution totaling 537,000 copies. During 1949, 209 Soviet films were imported into North Korea. In 1948, 70,000 lectures and concerts were given by Soviet artists, writers, and other cultural representatives in Korea, and an even greater number were given in 1949.

There being no objection, the excerpt from the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ATTACHMENT

SOVIET CULTURAL INFLUENCE IN NORTH KOREA

The predominant role of the Soviet Union in North Korea is reflected in North Korean education and culture. During the period of Japanese rule, mass education of the Koreans was neglected, artistic creativity was repressed, and literature, drama, and art were limited to a select few, mainly Koreans educated in Japan. The educational and cultural void enabled first the Soviet occupation forces and then the North Korean regime to foster Soviet culture among the mass Korean people through the educational system and through the encouragement of mass appreciation of Soviet literature, drama, and art. Until the past year, however, lack of facilities limited the scope of the educational and cultural program. Since then there has been increased activity in both programs.

Most aspects of Soviet cultural imperialism are carried out through official channels. The programs are facilitated by the Economic and Cultural Agreement of March 17, 1949, which states:

"The contracting parties shall in every way develop and consolidate the relations which have been established between them in the spheres of culture, science, and art."

The objectives of the Soviet educational and cultural programs are publicly supported by the North Korean Government leaders, who have avowed the superiority of Soviet culture and have encouraged the spread of training in the Russian language, the influx of Soviet educators into the schools, the translation, publication, and reading of Soviet literature and the cultivation of Soviet artistic works.[1]

The educational and cultural programs projected to encourage assimilation of Soviet culture are implemented mainly by the Ministries of Education and Propaganda. In addition, there are special organizations charged with the responsibility for the propagation of Soviet culture. The Korean-Soviet Culture Society is the indigenous agency primarily responsible for the Soviet cultural program. In the fall of 1945 the society had a membership of about 3,700, with only 20 branches. By May 1949 the membership of the society was over 1,300,000, with 105 branches and 20,000 units. Among the activities of the society are the translation and publication of books, the publication of a newspaper and a magazine, and the making of arrangements for lecture tours, concerts, theatrical performances, etc.

There are, moreover, certain Soviet organizations that direct the flow of materials and Soviet representatives to the Korean-Soviet Culture Society and to other indigenous organizations. Among these are the Soviet culture houses and several propaganda outlets under the Soviet Embassy; the Soviet Information Bureau and Soviet libraries; the Soviet Motion Picture Export and Import Society (a branch of the Soviet Ministry of Cinema Industry); and the TASS News Agency.

Soviet influence on the educational system

A primary objective of Soviet educational policy is the teaching of Russian as the second language in North Korean schools. The Ministry of Education has reportedly decreed that Russian will be the only required foreign language in Korean schools. In order to train middle school teachers and Government employees, 109 special Russian-language schools have been established. There are reported to be 1,580 graduates of these special schools already. A Russian Language College has been established in Pyongyang. Reliable reports indicate that the Russian language has been added to the curriculum of other colleges and universities. In addition to Russian training, courses on Marxism, Soviet history, literature, art, and other aspects of the Soviet civilization are offered in North Korean schools.

Soviet influence over the educational system is further manifested through the assignment of Soviet scholars and professors to teach in North Korean colleges and universities, short visits of other Soviet academic personnel, and the provision of Soviet textbooks, teaching and training manuals, experimental apparatus, and literary works on both an advanced and an elementary level. It is reported that 13 of the original members of the teaching staff of Kim Il Sung University were Russians. Since July 1948, more than 30 well-known Soviet scholars have visited the various Korean institutions of higher learning to assist in their educational programs. Soviet engineers also visited Korea to provide similar assistance in industrial and agricultural fields.

The Soviet Union has also brought Korean students to the U. S. S. R. for educational training in the natural sciences, humanities, public administration, engineering, and other technical fields. More than 600 such students, both men and women, are currently in the Soviet Union, and recent reports indicate that many more students are expected to go to the U. S. S. R. These students, upon their return, are expected to assume positions of responsibility in the Government and political organizations and to form a nucleus for the Communist intelligentsia in North Korea.

Cultural assimilation

Assimilation of Soviet culture is sought not only through Soviet influence over the educational system but also through dissemination to the general public of a wide variety of translated Soviet publications; the performance of Soviet motion pictures, plays, music, ballet, and the like; the exhibition of Soviet creative works; and the visits and lectures of Soviet writers, artists, and other cultural representatives. In the field of publications, from the time of the Soviet "liberation" up to 1948, 72 books (with a total of 770,000 copies) were published in North Korea, most of them translations of Soviet literature and technical books. In 1949, some 500 books were translated; copies of the History of the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of the U. S. S. R. and Stalin's Collected Works alone totaled 537,000. In addition, two

"In order to develop the important educational culture, it is the most pressing popular aspiration to study and absorb broadly the advanced Soviet educational science, and to consolidate more than ever the everlasting imperishable good will between Korea and the Soviet Union. * * * Soviet educational science occupies the highest place in the world as the means to develop culture and the weapon for the realization of a Communist society." (Pyongyang radio broadcast on October 26, 1949, of a speech by Paik Nam Un, Minister of Education.)

"Only by absorbing the advanced Soviet culture will we be able to develop our national culture further. Therefore we must intensify our efforts to absorb more vigorously the advanced Soviet culture so that we may develop our national culture to a higher level and make ours a rich, powerful country." (Pyongyang radio broadcast on October 19, 1949, of a speech by Pae Chong Son, Vice Minister of Culture and Propaganda, on the necessity for the absorption of Soviet culture.)

daily newspapers are devoted primarily to Soviet writings; one published by the Korean-Soviet Culture Society and the other by the Soviet Foreign Culture Association. Finally, there is also a weekly publication of the Soviet Foreign Culture Association and a magazine published by the Korean-Soviet Culture Society.

In the nonpublication fields, there are numerous examples of Soviet cultural penetration. During 1949 more than 209 Soviet films were imported into North Korea and shown in both urban and rural areas. The State Theater at Pyongyang, established on January 9, 1947, is reserved for the performance of Soviet plays and for concerts by Soviet musicians and dancers. Its limited facilities, however, permitted the production of only eight plays in 1950. Finally, almost 70,000 lectures and concerts were given by Soviet artists, writers, and other cultural representatives in 1949, and an even greater number were given in 1949.

Comments on MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter from Arthur Bliss Lane, dated April 17, 1951, and published in the New York Times on April 19, 1951, regarding the dismissal of General MacArthur.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMENTS ON MACARTHUR

AWAKENED NATION SEEN

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

In the universally general discussions which are taking place on General MacArthur's dismissal there is too much emphasis on the personal note (i. e., who is right, Truman or MacArthur?) and too little attention to the basic problem involved, our national security.

In evaluating the situation we should keep in mind the events not only since June 1950, but since 1943, when General Marshall as Chief of Staff argued in favor of bringing the Soviet Union into the war against Japan. On good authority I learn that MacArthur then opposed bringing the Soviets or Great Britain into the far-eastern phase of the war on the correct ground that we were capable of winning it alone and that our allies would undoubtedly wish to impose conditions when the victory was won. (I do not need to remind your readers that MacArthur has in the recent crisis been pilloried by both the British and Soviet press.)

The Marshall mission to China, which had as its aim and result the introduction of Communists into the Nationalist Chinese Government, the suppression of the Wedemeyer report, the Acheson statement of January 1950, setting forth the policy of the administration on Formosa, were all steps leading to the inevitable: the elimination of the man who consistently stood for the protection of American interests and prestige and who reportedly was not consulted on the Korean adventure.

It would indeed be presumptuous on my part to pretend to read General MacArthur's thoughts or motives which led to his dismissal. But I feel sure many of us believe that his dramatic separation from his command, damaging though it may be to our standing in the Far East, will accomplish something which even General MacArthur could not have accomplished had he remained in a position subordinate to his Commander in Chief: the awakening of the American people to the enormity of the danger in which we now lie.

Fortunately there are democratic and constitutional steps by which the disaster lurking behind the danger can still be averted.

ARTHUR BLISS LANE.

To Halt Inflation, the Genuine Remedy Is the Gold Standard

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOWARD H. BUFFETT
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include an article by Maj. Hamilton A. Long, that was reprinted in the February 1946 issue of Great Lakes Banker, Journal of Illinois Bankers Association, explaining in nontechnical language the decisive importance of restoration of the gold standard:

NO THERMOMETER, THEREFORE NO FEVER?

(By Maj. Hamilton A. Long)

INVITING TROUBLE

If a patient with a fever should smash his thermometer, he would thereby neither reduce his fever nor protect himself against fever and illness in the future. He would only be asking for trouble.

Those who blamed the gold standard for our economic ills and considered it an agent for evil are like the patient who blames a thermometer for his fever. The gold standard is essentially a device for testing the state of a country's financial health by measuring public confidence in the credit of the government—paper money and government bonds, in the credit of banks, bank deposits, and notes—and in credit conditions in general. The gold standard is like a thermometer. It is a device which cannot do any harm and can be very useful to all the people of a country—of our country.

HOW THE GOLD STANDARD WORKS

When a country is on the gold standard, its government promises to keep on hand, as security behind its paper money, an amount of gold equal to a stated percentage of that paper money. The government also promises that it will exchange a specified amount of gold on demand for each unit of its paper money. If the gold standard were functioning in this country today, anyone could exchange paper dollars for gold dollars at any time.

When this public confidence is shaken, the people demand gold in exchange for paper money. By doing this they show their disapproval of the conditions which created lack of confidence. It is a warning to their public servants to take corrective action. On the other hand, when the people allow the gold to remain in the government's possession, it is tangible proof of their confidence. This is the way the people use a functioning gold standard to safeguard their country's financial health and their own welfare.

When the people demand gold in exchange for paper money, the government usually takes corrective action in an effort to restore confidence before its gold supply is seriously reduced. If, however, the conditions which created lack of confidence cannot be readily corrected, and the people continue to demand gold, the government usually goes off the gold standard. It stops redeeming paper money in gold. By such action the government officially acknowledges the existence of these conditions and the difficulty of correcting them. This focuses attention upon these conditions and puts public officials under pressure to take corrective action. When these conditions are finally corrected and public confidence is restored, the government can then return to the gold standard by again redeeming paper money in gold upon demand.

The gold standard works the same way in every country, regardless of the amount of gold exchangeable for a unit of paper money, regardless of the fact that this amount may be changed by the government from time to time.

NOT A "CROSS OF GOLD AND CROWN OF THORNS"

As the gold standard is simply a device for measuring public confidence in the soundness of Government credit, bank credit, and credit conditions in general, it cannot be held responsible for the state of these factors. Under no circumstances is it sensible to blame the gold standard for our economic ills. The old political slogan that the gold standard is a "cross of gold and crown of thorns" for the people is as absurd as it would be to say that a thermometer is a cross of mercury and a crown of thorns for a patient.

COMPARATIVELY LITTLE GOLD IS ENOUGH

When a country is on the gold standard, all bank depositors cannot at the same time withdraw their deposits and exchange their paper money for gold. There is never enough gold available to make this possible. For example, in 1929, when this country was on the gold standard, our total bank deposits were over 12 times the amount of our gold supply. This great excess of deposits over gold supply always exists. In the case of a great country like ours, total bank deposits far exceed the entire world's gold supply. The fact that the function of the gold held by the Government is simply to serve as tangible evidence of public confidence is a basic reason why it is not necessary for a country to have an amount of gold equal to its bank deposits in order to be on the gold standard.

A THERMOMETER TAKEN APART

The basic elements of a functioning gold standard are (1) a law fixing the gold content of the standard currency unit; (2) a supply of gold; (3) the practice, sanctioned by law, of redeeming paper money in gold upon demand. When a Government stops redeeming paper money in gold the other two elements become useless in measuring public confidence in credit conditions—just as a thermometer taken apart becomes merely mercury and glass which are useless in detecting fever. Since our Government will not now redeem paper money in gold upon demand, our present enormous gold supply is useless in testing the state of our country's financial health.

NO SIN OR CRIME

No sensible person would assume that he has no fever just because he has no thermometer. Likewise, no sensible person should assume that our country is in good health financially just because we have no functioning gold standard.

It is, of course, no sin or crime for this country not to be on the gold standard with a standard gold dollar like the one in use in 1932, or with a standard gold dollar containing a different amount of gold. However, this is only part of the completely accurate proposition.

JUST COMMON SENSE

The other and more important part is this: It is equally true that it is not absolutely necessary for a patient to have a thermometer, but if he has one he is likely to be better off because it will help him to know his condition and act to safeguard his health.

A country which does not take advantage of the proved usefulness of the gold standard is at best following a highly dangerous course. It is only common sense to learn by experience; and we in this country have had enough sad experiences to provide us with ample lessons.

NOT WORTH A CONTINENTAL

Take one example alone. In the early days of our country, a type of paper money called Continentals was in use. This money was not redeemable in gold, so there was no limit upon the amount that could be issued. There was a great depression then; and more and more of these Continentals were printed to help pay Government expenses in order to avoid facing the unpleasant and unpopular task of heavily taxing the people to balance the budget. Finally, so many of them were issued that the public lost faith in their value; and Continentals became practically worthless. Today, over a century and a half later, "Not worth a Continental" is still a popular synonym for worthlessness.

CONTINENTALS, GREENBACKS, AND OTHER DEFICIT FINANCING

If a country is not on the gold standard in a time of economic depression and government expenditures far exceed tax collections, there is an almost irresistible temptation for the government to use its credit to finance its deficits instead of collecting enough taxes for this purpose. This is done by printing and issuing paper money which is not redeemable in gold (whether greenbacks or paper money of some other color makes no difference); or by adding to the public debt through printing and issuing government promises (bonds and notes) payable in future years; or by both methods. The first method is currency inflation; the second, credit inflation.

This deficit financing is easy to start, easy to carry to excess, and extremely hard to stop. Stopping it becomes increasingly unpopular the longer it is practiced. Gradually such an easy-money, easy-borrowing policy wins wider and wider popular acceptance, even among those who utterly condemned it at the beginning. The situation is aggravated by the fact that it is impossible to know with certainty just when such inflation must be stopped if financial collapse is to be avoided. In such a situation, political leaders are tempted to spend more and more freely and to create larger and larger deficits when they are being met—temporarily—simply by using the printing press.

TODAY'S BILLIONS UPON BILLIONS

Consider our own case today. A billion dollars now sounds commonplace. The prewar doubling of the national debt, as a result of a succession of annual deficits of billions of dollars, was viewed by most people and public officials without alarm, even with indifference. A few years previously, however, when deficits began to occur, even a hundred million dollars sounded like a huge amount of money. Everyone would have been shocked then to know that the subsequent astronomical deficits were to be incurred. This illustrates the chief danger of deficit financing through inflation—the readiness with which the people and their public servants gradually come to view, with growing complacency, its increasing use—the readiness with which they again and again invent new excuses for it and repeatedly revise their definition of the danger point in their eagerness to follow the temporarily easy path just a little while longer.

The public debt's wartime jump from $45,000,000,000 to about six times that figure, with multibillion deficits still continuing despite the war's end, makes this matter one of critical importance to the people as a whole.

The fact that a country is on the gold standard does not prevent the Government from meeting its deficits for a while by inflation of credit or of currency or both; but it does keep the people and their public servants keenly and continuously aware of the dangers involved. A functioning gold standard provides the people with an effective instrument for calling a halt to such deficit financing. It is the best safeguard the people can have against the evils of inflation. As a practical matter, it seems to be their only dependable safeguard.

AN EASY, SAFE STEP

Other countries could not withdraw enough of our gold to force us off the gold standard, because today we have over $20,000,000,000 in gold, several times as much as we need. When on the gold standard we never had over five billions in gold and usually much less. Other countries could withdraw two-thirds of our gold and still leave us far more than we ever had when on the gold standard—much more than we need now for this purpose.

In fact, we have far too much of the world's gold supply for our own good. It is greatly to our interest that other countries have sound stable currencies based upon gold. Our real problem, therefore, is how to help them get a large part of our gold for this purpose.

All that is needed to return this country to the gold standard is an act of Congress requiring the Treasury to redeem paper money in gold upon demand and specifying the amount of gold to be exchanged for each paper dollar. When this has been done, the people of our country will again have a functioning gold thermometer.

Fifteenth Anniversary of the Public Affairs Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL H. DOUGLAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a testimonial statement on the occasion of the approaching fifteenth anniversary of the Public Affairs Committee, which is also being celebrated by the publication, in conjunction with the American Red Cross, of the pamphlet Blood—Your Gift of Life. I am glad to pay this tribute to the significant contribution this committee has made to our democracy by its publication of 175 different pamphlets which have now run into a circulation of nearly 17,000,000 copies.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR PAUL H. DOUGLAS ON PUBLIC AFFAIRS COMMITTEE'S FIFTEENTH ANNIVERSARY AND ON RELEASE OF ITS ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-FIFTH PAMPHLET, BLOOD—YOUR GIFT OF LIFE, IN COOPERATION WITH THE AMERICAN NATIONAL RED CROSS

In a few weeks one of the country's most unusual publishing ventures celebrates its fifteenth birthday. Fittingly enough its anniversary publication will be issued in conjunction with the American National Red Cross blood program. I would like to call the attention of the Congress to this venture because it typifies all that is best in the American tradition.

The organization is the Public Affairs Committee which this month will begin distribution of its seventeen millionth pamphlet; pamphlets which have come to be recognized as giving reliable, simply stated, down-to-earth facts on important subjects, and which people can use in their homes, schools, churches, clubs, and forums.

As its anniversary pamphlet the committee is publishing Blood—Your Gift of Life, and in a foreword to this anniversary pamphlet E. Roland Harriman, president of the American National Red Cross, pays tribute to its timeliness and calls for the full support of every American for the blood donor program "in the interest of better national health and greater national security." This is the one hundred and seventy-fifth pamphlet to be published at a price people can afford to pay by the Public Affairs Committee, a nonprofit educational organization that stands alone in the field of popular education in important subjects.

The Public Affairs Committee was born in the midst of the depression when everybody was talking about America's social and economic problems, but very few knew the facts. A great deal of research was being done, but for the most part results were buried in the technical journals and were not finding their way to community leaders. How to bridge that gap, how to bring vital information to all Americans in readable form without dogma was a problem met by a group of outstanding economists, political scientists, and educators. Chiefly responsible for the organization of the Public Affairs Committee was the late Raymond Leslie Buell, then president of the Foreign Policy Association, who became its first chairman. Other founders included Luther Gulick, director of the Institute of Public Administration; Harold G. Moulton, of Brookings Institution; Evans Clark, of the Twentieth Century Fund; Lyman Bryson, of Columbia University; and the late William Trufant Foster.

In the spring of 1936 the committee began printing its widely recognized and accepted 32-page pamphlet. The first year the committee congratulated itself on having distributed 100,000 pamphlets at the cost price of 10 cents each. Now more than a million pamphlets a year go out to the public even though costs have increased to 20 cents apiece.

Today, the 175 titles dealing with health and family problems, education, and social studies are available in libraries, bookstores, and schools. They are used by organizations to obtain the latest information about subjects in their field of interest. The pamphlets have been carefully chosen to meet the needs of the times. A year or so ago, when the threat to the American way of life became a paramount national issue, the committee published a pamphlet, What About Communism? by Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., the Pulitzer prize historian. Immediately after the war it published Rebuilding Europe—After Victory by Hiram Motherwell of the Columbia Broadcasting Co. During the war, when the Armed Forces were in need of a basic pamphlet dealing with race and inter-group relations, the committee published The Races of Mankind, by Ruth Benedict of Columbia University, which itself sold almost one million copies and has since become a little classic in this country with movies, books, scientific exhibits, filmstrip slides, musical comedy, Sunday school programs, and even popular songs and recordings based on its simple story of social anthropology.

A number of distinguished pamphlets on personal economic and social problems have also been issued by the committee. Pamphlets like Facts and Tips for Servicemen, Building Your Marriage, Loan Sharks and Their Victims, and How to Adopt a Baby have been read by hundreds of thousands of people. In the field of health and science, pamphlets on polio, heart, cancer, diabetes, TB, cerebral palsy, arthritis and rheumatism, teeth and alcoholism have brought to millions the latest scientific information in a form easily understood.

The success of the pamphlets can be measured by the high opinion in which they are held. Universities, churches, civic groups, educators, statesmen, industrialists and publishers have paid tribute, at various times, to these objective and informative pamphlets.

Testimonials have been received by Public Affairs Pamphlets from universities as far apart geographically as Columbia in New York, Stanford in California, Xavier University in the East and Occidental College in the West. Church groups ranging from the Protestant Episcopal Church to the Southern Baptist Convention have extolled these pamphlets.

The American Jewish Committee, the National Association of Secondary School Principals, Kiwanis International, the National Urban League and the Garden Club of America have all made enthusiastic comments about the pamphlets issued by this remarkable educational committee. The very diversity of the groups cited shows the wide scope of material covered by these inexpensive yet informative publications.

One of our former, beloved and respected colleagues, the Hon. Arthur Capper, once wrote:

"I have just received the complete set of copies of Public Affairs Pamphlets issued by you. You have rendered a great service to agriculture and to our country. I intend to keep these pamphlets on file in my office for future reference."

Ernest Minor Patterson, president of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, wrote:

"One of the most valuable media of public education in America today is the pamphlets published by the Public Affairs Committee. To all students of social science they are a most effective supplement to the ponderous presentations of the specialists for the specialists. The Public Affairs Committee is to be congratulated upon the vivid and effective manner in which the topics in successive issues are being treated."

Robert Sutherland, director of the Hogg Foundation in Texas, wrote:

"Your committee is rendering such an excellent service that we want to cooperate fully, calling it to the attention of everyone with whom we work."

J. L. Blair Buck, coordinator of teacher education, Virginia State Board of Education, wrote:

"We make effective use of your pamphlets in our schools, and we value their objectivity."

The Reverend Edward A. Cahill, executive secretary, World Churches Organization, said:

"It is pamphlets such as yours which must be given widespread circulation if American democracy is to be cleaned up here on the home front and the basis laid for a full-fledged American participation in the building of the new world of the future."

Ernest S. Griffith, Director of the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress, whose valued help and wisdom is known and appreciated by all of us, is on record as stating:

"The Legislative Reference Service receives your pamphlets regularly and we find them very useful."

Testimonials have been received from eminent leaders of business and industry who read and use these valuable pamphlets. Among them are Thomas J. Watson, president of International Business Machines; Eli Lilly, chairman of the board of the famous pharmaceutical house bearing his name, and Alfred P. Sloan, chairman of the board of General Motors (one of the world's greatest industrial corporations) and founder of the Alfred P. Sloan Foundation.

What kind of committee is the Public Affairs Committee? Who decides what shall be published? How reliable are its pamphlets? The answers are worth noting. The small group of economists, educators, and political scientists who first formed the committee in the mid-1930's have since grown to 26 eminent members. Included among them are doctors of medicine, representatives of universities, the churches, business and organized labor, as well as social sciences. As a committee they have no program of their own to promote, no one school of thought. In fact, their constitution specifically says: "The sole purpose of the committee is educational. It has no economic or social program of its own to promote."

WHO SELECTS THE TOPICS OF THE PAMPHLETS?

The first step in publishing a Public Affairs pamphlet is to select a topic. I have learned that the original suggestion for this may come from a member of the committee or from its staff, from organizations initiating the research, or from users of the pamphlets. These recommendations are studied and are turned over to the organization's board of directors at its bimonthly meetings. The board of directors of this committee is in itself an unusual group in the sense that it has not been drawn from big names to impress people, or because of organizational connection or financial standing. The board consists of people who are informed about the best social and economic research going on in the country and who are competent to judge it. They are definitely not of any one school of thought. But this one thing they do have in common, a great interest in seeing that important social and economic facts reach the largest number of people. The board weighs each proposal for a pamphlet. It decides its present-day importance and relevance to the committee's program. It is the board that decides what subjects should be dealt with.

HOW RELIABLE ARE THE PUBLIC AFFAIRS PAMPHLETS?

From the information I have about the committee, I believe the editorial work on each pamphlet is as careful as it can be. The author selected is recognized as an authority in his field, whose work shows his ability to write analytically and objectively on important issues. To make certain that all of its pamphlets are accurate in fact and reflect the high standards of scholarship in their interpretation, a careful system of checks and balances has been set up. All the manuscripts are submitted to a panel of from 15 to 25 experts chosen by the board to represent a diversity of opinion. On the basis of comments from these experts the manuscripts are thoroughly revised to eliminate doubtful or inaccurate statements, and to present controversial issues adequately, honestly, and objectively.

Before publication the revised manuscripts are again reviewed, first by a subcommittee and then by the Public Affairs Committee as a whole. From these comments final revisions are made. The success of this procedure has been demonstrated in the 15 years that Maxwell Stewart has served as editor. From its first pamphlet to the present, the accuracy of none of the factual statements in a Public Affairs Pamphlet have been challenged by specialists in the subject matter. In subsequent editions, of course, full advantage has always been taken of new knowledge. Pamphlets on current issues in which there is interest are usually brought up to date.

A good many of the Public Affairs Pamphlets are cooperative ventures, with the committee seeking out as many as possible of the groups working successfully in a particular field for advice and criticism in the preparation of the pamphlets. For example, the anniversary pamphlet Blood—Your Gift of Life is prepared in cooperation with the American National Red Cross. A recent pamphlet on heart disease was prepared in cooperation with the American Heart Association. Other pamphlets have been done with the American Genetics Society, the National Association for Mental Health, the Conservation Foundation, the General Federation of Women's Clubs, the National Conference of Christians and Jews. In fact most pamphlets are prepared in close cooperation with the national agencies most directly concerned.

WHO SUPPORTS THE PUBLIC AFFAIRS COMMITTEE?

The committee's money, I understand, has come from two sources: grants from educational foundations and sales of the Public Affairs Pamphlets. The initial organizing grants were made by the Maurice and Laura Falk Foundation, and beginning in 1937 the Alfred P. Sloan Foundation made grants annually for more than 10 years. Since 1943 aid has been received from the Carnegie Corp., Marshall Field Foundation, and the Twentieth Century Fund. The great bulk of its support, however, remains with the people who have bought 17,000,000 copies of the committee's publications.

In surveying the work of this outstanding organization, it is worth noting that pamphleteering has always held a high place in the American tradition, starting with the birth of our Nation and coming down to the present.

As our means of communication expanded, as national publications tended to dominate the field of written thought, as books became a major force in the intellectual life of our country, the place of the pamphlet tended to become obscured. It is difficult to think of another organization which can approach the inspiring record of the Public Affairs Committee in keeping alive the tradition of the American pamphlet—the forceful, intelligent, informative approach to vital subjects at a price so low as to be within the reach of virtually every person.

On this fifteenth anniversary, it is proper to extend to the Public Affairs Committee, its board of directors who have so wisely guided its policies, its staff and its readers the well wishes of all who believe that informed discussion is a cornerstone of successful democracy. I am appending a list of its members to indicate the broadly representative character of this committee.

May it continue its job of popular education in the democratic spirit for many years to come.

Counterattack

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WRIGHT PATMAN
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, on April 16 I called the attention of the House to the attempt of Fascist-minded groups in behalf of that monstrosity in the field of taxation, which seeks to repeal the sixteenth amendment—the income-tax amendment to the Constitution of the United States—and supplant in its place the obnoxious millionaire's amendment limiting taxes under our Federal laws to 25 percent on incomes, gifts, and inheritances. At the time I spoke to the House, I had been reasonably assured that the attempt to cram Senate Joint Resolution 7 through the Ohio Legislature petitioning the Congress to call a convention to submit this utterly indefensible proposal to the States for ratification had been definitely defeated. I am now informed that the resolution is still under consideration at Columbus, although the legislators have indicated they are not in sympathy with the objectives of this resolution.

We must ever be watchful, if we on the ramparts are to steer the Nation through the mine fields of financial and economic chaos. During these dark days, we must ever keep lit the sacred torch of liberty. The ratification of the millionaire's amendment would be a major calamity. It would with one fell stroke destroy our financial and economic system. The savings bonds bought by the little people would be so much papier mâché, and in the ensuing disorder, the money barons, like the robber barons of old, would be in the driver's seat, and representative government, as we know it, would disappear like the dying embers of a forest fire. All that we hold dear, all that we have worked for, and our boys have died for, would become a cruel mirage and the hopes and dreams of all our good, solid American citizens would wither and perish.

We must defeat this foul thing, this millionaire's amendment, if we are to survive as a nation. Twenty-two States have passed this resolution which, if approved by 32 States, will force this Congress to call a convention for the submission of this outrageous proposal to the States for ratification. It is, therefore very encouraging, Mr. Speaker, that an attempt is now being made in the New Jersey Legislature to repeal the action of that body taken in 1944, petitioning the Congress to submit the millionaire's amendment to the States for ratification. Assembly Joint Resolution No. 8 presently before the New Jersey Legislature would rescind the action taken by New Jersey 7 years ago. All liberty-loving groups are supporting this resolution, and I hope it will be passed so this stepping stone to disaster will be removed in this fight to preserve our economic order and our sacred liberties.

College Education Put Within Reach of All

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARENCE J. BROWN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement from the Wilmington College News, Wilmington, Ohio:

COLLEGE EDUCATION PUT WITHIN REACH OF ALL

WILMINGTON, OHIO, May 2.—A small Ohio college here has provided an answer for critics of college student draft deferment policies which have been called unfair to young men from families of limited means, because a qualified boy may be deferred only if he can afford the expense of a college education.

While the Nation has been debating the issue, Wilmington College has been busy setting up a new kind of work-study program which will enable students to earn virtually all of their college expenses. Under this earn-while-you-learn plan, a college education is available to every qualified young man regardless of his financial resources.

Established to help insure the Nation a supply of trained leaders for tomorrow, the program opens up an untapped source of potential leadership by putting higher education within reach of all who are willing to help themselves.

In announcing this program, Dr. Samuel D. Marble, visionary young president of Wilmington College, explained that the plan was inaugurated on an experimental basis last fall, and that the results have been more than gratifying. Approximately 100 students are now participating in this project and are getting invaluable employment experience as well as an income sufficient to cover their basic costs of tuition, room, and board.

Now that the idea has proven itself to both the college and the cooperating industries and business firms, it will be expanded this summer and fall with opening for 200 more young men and women, Dr. Marble said.

In operation, the plan provides that two students hold down one full-time job. One does the work on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday and attends classes on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday, while the other student paired on the job has just the alternating schedule. The students are paid by the cooperating firms at the same rate as full-time workers, and have the advantage of living in dormitories on the campus and enjoying all the privileges of full-time resident students. While the majority are employed in industry, the student is free to select any course of his choice.

Students in the program can complete degree requirements in four calendar years and graduate with their classes holding not only a college degree, but in addition the equivalent of two full years of work experience.

Far-Eastern Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN A. WHITAKER
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. WHITAKER. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial entitled "Not Much Help" appearing in the Park City Daily News of Bowling Green, Ky., on April 23, 1951:

Another great debate, this time over far-eastern policy, is under way. Calm reason and respect for fact ought to play a larger role in this public discussion than was true in the troops-for-Europe argument.

As an example, take the case of Chiang Kai-shek, leader of the Chinese Nationalist forces based on Formosa. The notion exists among many Americans that he commands a large, fairly well-equipped army which is in a fighting mood and needs only a signal from the West to jump into Korea or invade mainland China to help us bring the Korean war to a speedy end.

It is virtually suggested that American lives are being wasted through failure to tap this reservoir of trained military manpower close to the fighting scene.

What are the known facts?

First, though some estimates of Chiang's army run as high as 800,000 men, most military observers put the figure closer to 400,000. This is not a big army, but it is larger than the American forces now in the field in Korea.

The Nationalist army is not well equipped. Chiang's chief American adviser, Adm. Charles Cooke (retired) former Seventh Fleet commander, several months ago guessed it would take $250,000,000 in equipment to outfit this force for combat. With prices still spiraling, the cost unquestionably would be higher today. It might hit $300,000,000.

The morale of Chiang's troops is pretty much an unknown quantity. Though supplied with a lot of American equipment, his forces fighting on the mainland right after World War II did not acquit themselves well against the Chinese Reds. The present army has been held together on Formosa with difficulty over a 2-year span. It is not battle-tested.

It is wholly possible that with adequate equipment this army might give a good account of itself. But there is no way of knowing that in advance. Those who assure us the Nationalists would fight successfully are guessing since no facts exist on the matter.

Let's suppose we should give the word to Chiang to invade China proper. He has no air force worthy of the name and no fleet of consequence. Only the United States could provide the necessary sea-air cover to protect a mainland landing. And since air operations would necessarily involve bombing shore installations, troop concentrations, communications, and other facilities, it is hard to see how such assistance could do anything but immerse this country in a wider war with China.

Russia of course has a mutual defense pact with China. No one not inside the Kremlin knows whether she would honor the obligation to assist Mao Tse-tung if we gave Chiang the sea-air cover for a mainland assault.

Senator TAFT says such an attack would not bring in Russia and lead to general war. One wonders how he can know what the Soviet reaction would be, unless he is privy to Stalin's secrets. Obviously, since the defense pact exists, a very grave risk would be taken of precipitating a big war.

This is not an attempt to decide whether we ought to take that risk. That is for the American people to decide, acting through their elected representatives. But at least they should make their judgment in full knowledge of what is involved and in full appreciation of what sort of instrument Chiang's army might be in a wider fight against communism.

Nothing known up to this moment suggests that Chiang would be ready to fight quickly, or guarantees that his forces would fight well, or assures us that his entry would shorten the far-eastern war rather than lengthen and broaden it. It is the facts, and the facts alone, that lead to this conclusion.

Who Said There Is a Shortage of Iron Ore?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial taken from the Buffalo (N. Y.) News of February 27, 1951, reveals a possible 4,000,000 tons of iron-ore deposits available at the Steep Rock mines in Canada.

The railroads are there and so are the ships to transport the ore to the mills, which means that the St. Lawrence seaway and power project is unnecessary.

The editorial follows:

WHAT OF STEEP ROCK ORE?

The New York Herald Tribune appears to have done a little surveying of its own regarding the North American iron-ore outlook, a matter which the Truman administration has stressed as of the greatest concern in connection with the proposed St. Lawrence seaway. Cabinet members and others under influence of the administration represent that unless a seaway is constructed for transportation of Labrador-Quebec ore the steel mills on the Great Lakes won't be able to continue operations for many years more. They say that the ore of the Mesabi Range is running out and there are no near deposits on which these mills can draw. But the Herald Tribune tells a different story. Here is what it said in an article Monday:

"The little town of Atikokan in Ontario bids fair to become the seat of one of North America's greatest iron-ore-mining operations. The Steep Rock mines, 6 miles from Atikokan, may be developing into another Mesabi right before the eyes of this ore-hungry country. Prominent Canadian mining engineers, who recently made an exhaustive study of the new Step Rock potential, believe the ore in this area may extend to a depth of 4,000 feet. They maintain that the immensity of this discovery—a possible 4,000,000,000 tons of iron deposits—is not realized even in Canadian mining circles. This would compare with Mesabi deposits (reserves and used) of 2,500,000,000 tons."

Ore is now coming out of Steep Rock at the rate of 1,200,000 tons a year, and the company operating there "has under active development a new mine which will raise annual output to 4,000,000 tons. The Canadian National Railway has a 147-mile line running from the deposits to Port Arthur at the head of Lake Superior. "The ore-loading dock there may be tripled," says the Herald Tribune, "and 25 new ore-carrying ships may become necessary." Thus the delivery of Steep Rock ore to steel mills on the Great Lakes would be a matter of a few hundred miles. On the other hand, ore from the Labrador-Quebec region would have to be transported 360 miles by rail to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and more than 1,000 miles by water to reach these same mines.

The spokesmen for the Truman administration have chosen to ignore the Steep Rock deposits, but these ought to be taken into account by Congress as it considers the proposed St. Lawrence seaway project, one which cost more than $1,000,000. Remember it will be necessary to deepen every harbor on the Great Lakes to accommodate the ships which are expected to provide service through the seaway.

Mitbestimmungsrecht

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GARDNER R. WITHROW

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein an editorial which appeared in Fortune magazine of April 1951:

MITBESTIMMUNGSRECHT

On January 25 American industry discovered the specter of mitbestimmungsrecht. It was the day that West German Chancelor Adenauer yielded to the threat of a general strike in the Ruhr Valley and agreed to a proposed law granting the workers codetermination or, legally, a 50-percent share in the management of the steel and coal industries of the country—the largest in Europe. The National Association of Manufacturers, in a letter to the German consul general in New York, condemned the plan and warned that "American investors are watching the developing situation with increasing concern." Editorial voices were also raised in opposition.

In actual fact, however, the issue was settled 4 years ago when the British military occupation established codetermination in 80 percent of the west German steel companies. Given the history of German cartel machinations, such a move was almost inevitable. It was the price that ossified European capitalism was paying for a long series of mistakes. The question raised at Bonn on January 25 was whether this established system would be written into German law. In the decision the unions won a 30-year battle.

In 1919 German labor won the right, under the Weimer Constitution, to establish "works councils" in which employees had a voice in setting wages and plant working conditions. After Hitler fell, the occupation authorities in the three western zones revived these works councils (law No. 22) as the basic labor law of military occupation. However, this was now too pale for German unions. Pointing to the fact that many of the Ruhr industrialists had financed Hitler and other reactionary political groups, the late Hans Boeckler, Socialist head of the West German Trade Union Federation, declared that "money must not be allowed to become the basis of political power and to cause another disaster." Codetermination was a move to end this power.

In the British area the old steel cartels were decentralized and 24 new companies created in their stead. The occupation authorities acted as trustees for the stockholders. In 1947 the Iron and Steel Control, as the trusteeship was called, agreed to a codetermination scheme.

In Hesse, within the American zone, the state passed a codetermination law for industry in that area. Similar steps were taken in Württemberg-Baden and Bavaria. But these actions were nullified by General Clay, who ruled that they went far beyond the intent of law No. 22. Clay suspended the new laws until the federal constitution of the new German Republic should be promulgated. Later (April 1950), however, United States occupation authorities relented, and in Hesse and Württemberg-Baden codetermination was allowed.

The parliamentary situation in January arose when the Allied High Commission ended further control of the coal and steel industries and announced that the companies were being returned to the owners. In the absence of a law providing for codetermination, the trade-unions feared these gains would be abolished. Hence the threat of the general strike.

But why did Adenauer capitulate? The singular political fact is that codetermination is not only a Socialist demand. (Some Socialists, in fact, oppose it, fearing that the scheme will be a barrier against full socialization of industry.) Much of the backing for codetermination has come from Catholic labor and from the left wing of Adenauer's Christian Democratic Party. Codetermination is for them a cardinal element in Catholic social theory. In September 1949, the Seventy-third Catholic Social Conference, held in Westphalia, declared, in startling language:

"Catholic workers and employers are agreed that the right of co-determination for all workers in social, personal, and economic questions is a natural right in the order intended by God, to which right corresponds the obligation of coresponsibility for all. We demand that this right be established by law." This statement by a quasi-official Catholic body has been cited throughout Western Germany, Austria, and Switzerland.

Catholic labor, which today accounts for roughly 40 percent of the German Federation of Unions (a merger of the pre-Hitler Christian and Socialist unions dictated by the occupation authorities), is solidly behind codetermination, and this pressure was an important force on Adenauer.

The codetermination scheme, as presented by the Adenauer government, calls for more than equal participation by labor in plant management. It provides, virtually, for the syndicalist organization of industry. At the head of the steel and coal industries is a senate of six members, appointed by the government, three on the suggestion of the trade unions and three by those members of company boards who represent stockholders. The senate acts as umpire in any deadlock over the selection of managers in individual companies.

Each individual company is ruled by an 11-man board of directors. Five men (one of whom must be a "public" person) are nominated by the stockholders. Five are nominated by the union. The eleventh is chosen by the other ten, but he must be approved by at least three members each from the labor and stockholder groups. Under the board of directors are three operating officials, two for production and sales, nominated by the stockholders' bloc, and the labor manager, nominated by the unions. However, a two-thirds vote of the board is necessary for confirmation of each official; hence the labor group maintains an effective veto on all three. Production plans are drafted by the board and the three-man managerial staff. But all policy decisions—allocations between dividends and wages, plant expansion, sales methods, and so forth—are decided by the board.

The codetermination scheme, as blueprinted by Bonn, gives tremendous power to the top union leaders. Under the law, only two of the labor directors come from the plant, one is a "public" person, and the other two are named by the national union. Such a system will strengthen the move to industry-wide bargaining.

The German codetermination scheme may arouse an appetite in American unions for similar plans here. The CIO has long favored "industry councils," which in conception, if not in detail, resemble the German version. Its convention endorsements written by an ardent socialistic Catholic, John Brophy, have been applauded by many Catholic prelates. Archbishop William Walsh devoted his invocation sermon at the 1948 CIO convention to this theme. Catholic labor papers, in fact, citing Socialist regard for British nationalization as extreme, are claiming codetermination as their own.

What the Jews Believe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH B. KEATING
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, appended are two reviews, one from the Rochester (N. Y.) Democrat and Chronicle and one from the Montgomery (Ala.) Advertiser, of the recently published book What the Jews Believe, by a distinguished clergyman, Rabbi Philip S. Bernstein, of Temple B'rith Kodesh, Rochester, N. Y. This essay has aroused such deep interest that I trust a reference to its purport and content will be of interest to the Members and encourage reading of the whole book.

The above-mentioned reviews follow:

[From the Rochester (N. Y.) Democrat and Chronicle of April 15, 1951]

RABBI BERNSTEIN'S NEW BOOK REVEALS KINSHIP OF FAITHS

One of the little books that seem certain to exert a profound influence on American thought, if not on the thinking of the remainer of the world, is What the Jews Believe, by Rabbi Philip S. Bernstein, of Temple B'rith Kodesh, Rochester.

Published this week by Farrar, Straus & Co., of New York, the little volume of only 100 pages contains within its covers a summary of the basic facts concerning that religion which, by sheer spiritual power, has enabled the Jews to survive through thousands of years of misunderstanding and persecution by more numerous neighbors. Readers familiar with the Bible will recognize at once the close religious kinship between Judaism and Christianity. Indeed, it is evident, from the interest created by the condensed summary which appeared in Life magazine, that already a great deal of misunderstanding has been swept away through Rabbi Bernstein's presentation of the principles and practices of the Jewish people.

With the appearance of the new book, which is a more complete statement of the case than was possible in magazine space limitations Rabbi Bernstein's interpretation of the Jewish faith becomes available, in handy, popular form at a price ($1.25) within the reach of the average reader.

Without question, What the Jews Believe is one of the most significant books of this era, of the greatest importance to both Jew and Christian, enabling each to understand not only the other, but themselves as well.

[From the Montgomery (Ala.) Advertiser of April 1, 1951]

CLEAR, INFORMATIVE

WHAT THE JEWS BELIEVE, BY RABBI PHILIP S. BERNSTEIN

A modified draft of this book appeared some weeks ago in the magazine Life and is said to have caused more comment and resulted in the receipt of more mail than had occurred since the magazine was founded.

It is not surprising that it should have attracted so much interest among people of the Jewish faith, and of other faiths as well. It is as clear, informative, and impressive a statement of the religious beliefs of the Jewish people as has ever been compiled. Certainly there is nothing in modern times that approaches it in the graphic, succinct, and memorable way in which it states the basis of the religious convictions of a great and religious people.

Each of the Jewish holidays and festivals is taken up in order and there is a clear exposition of all of them that should be most helpful to anyone who reads this volume.

There are chapters on the holy days, the Jewish year, Succos, Chanukah, Purim, Passover, Shavous, and Am Yisrael Chai which make it clear why people of the Jewish race throughout so many hundreds of years have observed them and treasured them as a racial and spiritual heritage of supreme value and comfort.

Baby Chick Industry Faces Serious Economic Dislocation If S. 1335 Is Approved

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Robert Parks, of Altoona, Pa., chairman of the transportation committee of the International Baby Chick Association appeared before the Senate Post Office and Civil Service Committee on May 2, 1951, in opposition to Senate bill 1335.

Mr. Parks, speaking for the baby-chick industry, made a strong statement in opposition to S. 1335 and warned of the evil effects that will follow should the proposed legislation be approved.

Mr. Parks' statement is as follows:

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, my name is Robert Parks. I am general manager and part owner of the Parks Barred Rock Farm, Altoona, Pa. Our farm has specialized in the breeding and hatching of poultry for more than 5 decades. We produce approximately 500,000 chicks annually, 90 percent of which are shipped to farmers and hatchery-men via parcel post.

I am here today in behalf of 5,000-plus poultry hatcherymen and breeders who are fellow members in the International Baby Chick Association. Bulk of the membership of our association resides and operates within the United States. I am chairman of the transportation committee.

We estimate that association members produced approximately 75 percent of the 1,250,000,000 chickens hatched in this country last year. Over 92 percent of all the chickens raised in this country today are purchased as day-old chicks from commercial breeders or hatchers.

Of this total, we estimate that 50 percent moves from the hatchery to the farm via parcel post. Another 40 percent is delivered locally by the hatchery or picked up at the hatchery by the farmer. The remaining 10 percent moves via railway express and air cargo.

It is the opinion of our members that S. 1335 fails to improve upon postal service, will add to its already large deficit, and will serve no purpose other than to force the cream of the less than carload parcel business away from the post office and into the hands of the Railway Express Agency. The facilities of the Railway Express Agency are not considered adequate for general use by our industry.

While there are provisions in S. 1335 which will enable our industry to continue to ship chicks in much the same manner as we are now doing, S. 1335 is looked upon by us as an opening wedge in a drive to drastically impair the parcel-post service.

Our industry would find itself undergoing a serious economic dislocation in such an eventuality.

The development of the commercial poultry hatchery industry can be traced to 1916 when the Post Office Department first accepted chicks for mailing via parcel post. The economy of the industry has been based on this service.

The benefits have not been one-sided. In addition to the regular parcel-post rates, we pay a special handling fee of 25 cents on every parcel shipped. This fee is estimated to account for 50 to 75 percent of the Post Office Department's total income from special handling fees.

The ability of the farmer to order chicks for delivery via parcel post has enabled him to obtain breeding stock from the Nation's outstanding flocks. It has been a tremendous factor in boosting the average annual production per layer from only 90 eggs in World War I to more than 162 eggs now.

Taking into consideration the many changes that have taken place in our transportation system in the last 10 years, including the elimination of numerous local trains and local stops, our industry still considers parcel-post service to be generally satisfactory. There are rough spots occasionally, but we usually can smooth these out in conferences with postal officials.

It should be apparent to all that S. 1335 spells reduced service, less efficiency, and higher shipping costs for business in general. It means inefficiency, more clerical detail, and less income for the Post Office Department.

S. 1335 means hatcheries served by first- or second-class post offices, for example, must carefully check the type of postal service accorded each customer in preparing his order for shipment. Shipments going to customers served by first- and second-class offices but not on RFD or star routes, must travel in single unit boxes of 100 chicks each.

As a matter of fact, the safety-type boxes with over-all dimensions of 73 to 78 inches could not be used at all in filling such orders. The standard winter-size chick box measures 72 inches. The larger sizes, however, enable us to ship chicks with greater freedom from over-heating or smothering en route, the principal travel hazard.

The employees at the first- and second-class post offices will face added clerical duties, too, for they in turn must recheck what the hatchery shipping department has done with respect to determining whether the customer is served by a first- or second-class post office.

All of this adds up to a tremendously inefficient operation. Delays will surely occur. A missed train often means a 24-hour delay, and a 24-hour delay frequently means a bad loss.

The damage does not make itself known, in many cases, until after the chicks have been fed for several weeks. Thus, everyone stands to lose—the hatcheryman, the Post Office Department, and the farmer.

Insofar as we have been able to determine there is nothing in S. 1335 that will help the Post Office Department overcome its deficit. It probably will aggravate the problem. Denied the right to carry packages weighing in excess of 20 pounds beyond the second zone, it will lose a lucrative portion of its volume. It doesn't cost the Post Office much more to carry a 40-pound parcel for which it receives $3 into the sixth zone than it does to handle a 5-pound parcel for which it earns about 50 cents.

If S. 1335 is enacted, postal facilities will remain unchanged. There will be about the same number of post offices and terminal facilities. The number of employees will hold at or above the present level, but the utilization of these facilities and personnel will decline. The per-unit cost of handling parcels will go up.

It doesn't take a crystalgazer to see the end result—higher and higher rates on all remaining parcel-post business.

This is exactly what has happened on railway-express business. Rates have been shoved higher and higher, and the good customers still using the service find themselves penalized for doing so as they are called on to absorb a larger portion of the operating expense.

Once again the International Baby Chick Association wishes to voice its opposition to S. 1335 and any other measure which threatens to curtail our use of the parcel-post service.

The economy of our entire industry has been tied in with our ability to deliver chicks via parcel post almost since the very start of the service. Our industry is not a Johnnie-come-lately using the service as a temporary expedient.

We are one of the oldest, largest, and most consistent users of parcel post. It's a life line for us. We see in S. 1335 something that tends to upset the pattern of service in the immediate future.

Of even more concern is the feeling that it is a forerunner of greater curtailments and restrictions in years to come.

Colorado River Storage Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. REVA BECK BOSONE
OF UTAH
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mrs. BOSONE. Mr. Speaker, those of you who have been receiving letters opposing the Echo Dam project in Utah will find information of interest to you in two items which I wish to place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD today. The first is a letter which I have received from Mr. Frank Ward, secretary of the Colorado River Development Association, which points out a number of errors in the Interior Department project planning report on the Colorado storage project and participating projects. Echo Dam is one of the key dams in the Colorado storage project.

I should like also to place in the RECORD a letter from Dr. Ernest Untermann, director of the Utah Field House of Natural History, to Dale E. Doty, an Assistant Secretary of the Interior. In this letter Dr. Untermann seeks to correct certain erroneous reports which have been published about the pending destruction of geological values by the proposed dams.

And finally, I should like to place in the RECORD a clipping from the Salt Lake Tribune which tells how the Utah Federated Artists, at first opposed to the Echo Dam project because they feared it would endanger scenic values in the area, found after a first-hand study of a special committee that this was not true, and voted to approve the project.

The above-mentioned follows:

COLORADO RIVER
DEVELOPMENT ASSOCIATION,
Salt Lake City, Utah, April 14, 1951.

Hon. REVA BECK BOSONE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR REPRESENTATIVE BOSONE: The Colorado River Development Association has carefully considered the Colorado River storage project and participating project, upper Colorado River Basin, more clearly identified as Project Planning Report No. 4-8a.81-1.

We respectfully submit herewith the comments of said association.

As to the details of the construction of the 10 storage projects, we highly commend the Bureau of Reclamation Director of Region 4, Mr. E. O. Larson, for the magnificent manner in which he has presented this report. We also highly commend Commissioner Michael W. Straus for his visionary recommendation to the Secretary. We approve the order of construction, viz, Echo Park Dam, Flaming Gorge Unit, Glen Canyon Dam, Navajo Unit, and the White Water Unit.

The recommendation that the Secretary of the Interior be granted authority to operate recreational facilities at the project sites is approved and highly recommended by this association.

The recommendation that the projects be built and operated in conjunction with State water conservancy districts is highly commended.

We take the following exceptions to statements made by the National Park Service:

1. The request of the National Park Service for $25,000 per annum for 3 years to excavate "important dinosaur sites within Echo Park and Split Mountain Canyon" should not be allowed for the reason that there are no such sites within this area. Mr. Ernest Untermann, Director of the Utah Field House of Natural History (the only man who has completely geologized the monument) emphatically states there are no dinosaur remains in this area due to the fact that the formations of the area are a hundred million years younger than that of the formation wherein the dinosaur remains are normally located.

2. The statement by the National Park Service that "Utah State Highway No. 44 runs from Vernal while unimproved roads lead southward from Greenriver, Wyo." is an indication of the National Park Service lack of information of this region. The road leading south from Wyoming is a greatly improved road over half of which is paved, the other half of which will be paved this year to the Utah border.

3. The National Park statement that "It is surmised that the reservoir and construction activities would destroy or damage a number of archeological sites," is another indication of the Service's lack of information and this paragraph should be removed from the report because the Park Service themselves have stated in another portion of the report "it is not known whether an archeological survey of the site has been made."

4. The National Park statement paragraphs 1, subparagraph 1, and subparagraph 3 on page 39 are misleading for the reason that they tend to impart the information that the National Park Service has restored the Dinosaur National Monument to its original state as far as grazing and agriculture pursuits are concerned. This is not so. They have not interfered with either. The statement in subparagraph 2 is misleading because it established facilities in the area for proper recreational use and administration of the area. The buildings in the area were constructed by the CCC boys. There has been no new construction since that time. The so-called museum is lined with a material resembling gunny sacks upon which hang crudely painted signs.

5. On page 44 of the National Park Service statement it states that U. S. No. 30 runs through Vernal, Utah, while Highway 30 runs through Greenriver, Wyo. This is a transposition and should be changed.

6. In the report of the Fish and Wildlife Service, last paragraph on page 10 and first and second paragraphs on page 11, we take exception to the following statement, that the reservoir would create more rough fish than could be taken for sport. Representatives of the Colorado Fish and Game Commission and the Utah Fish and Game Commission believe that the Echo Park Reservoir will become a great sport-fishing area, second only to Lake Mead, and that the river below the dam, because it will become a clear stream of water, will become an excellent trout-fishing area for as much as 50 miles below the dam site.

The statement that the reservoir would seriously reduce the deer wintering area and that it is doubtful if the remaining range could maintain the present deer herds is pure imagination and is not based upon any facts. The director and other members of the Colorado Fish and Game Commission, representatives of the Utah Fish and Game Commission, sportsmen of the area, Mr. Ernest Untermann, director of the Utah Field House of Natural History, all concur that the reservoir will not have any adverse effects upon the present deer herd, but that a benefit will actually arise in that the water will rise in the canyon so that the deer will be able to secure drinking water without climbing down the sheer side of the canyon walls.

We sincerely urge that the above statements be carefully analyzed and corrected.

This association unanimously supports the project plan and urges the immediate construction there.

Very truly yours,

COLORADO RIVER DEVELOPMENT ASSOCIATION,
B. FRANK WARD, Secretary.

Approved:

B. H. STRINGHAM, President.

UTAH FIELD HOUSE OF NATURAL HISTORY,
VERNAL STATE PARK,
Vernal, Utah, April 15, 1951.

DALE E. DOTY,
Assistant Secretary of the Interior,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. DOTY: Thank you for your letter of April 6 in which you inform us that item (a) which appears on page 47 of the National Park Service portion of the project planning report, Colorado River storage project and participating projects, Upper Colorado River Basin, December 1950, should have read: "To excavate two important fossil sites in Echo Park and Split Mountain, respectively, * * *," instead of dinosaur fossils.

With your kind indulgence and without, I hope, appearing difficult and cantankerous, may I clarify something for the record?

My sole interest in this controversy and in the controversy over the proposed dams in Dinosaur National Monument is to give factual data and, insofar as possible, to avoid any ambiguous statements which might confuse or mislead the public, or be seized upon by any group for the purpose of misrepresenting the true facts. For these reasons I feel that the above mentioned item (a) represents an unfortunate choice of language and would have better been stated as invertebrate fossils instead of merely fossils. This is particularly true when item (a), in the full report, requests $25,000 annually for 2 years of study, plus an additional $20,000 for a museum in which to exhibit the fossil material. This makes the fossils of Echo Park and Split Mountain look very important indeed, in the eyes of the lay public, an importance which facts certainly do not warrant.

I readily concede that the planning studies of the National Park Service in Dinosaur National Monument are none of my affair. I am again only concerned with giving exaggerated importance to an area which does not warrant such special attention, and which infers a value which does not exist. Item (a) creates the impression that great values may be inundated by the dams in Dinosaur National Monument and gives the opponents of the dams new fuel with which to create a smoke screen of bias and misrepresentation.

Let me give you the facts concerning the Split Mountain and Echo Park invertebrate fossil areas:

At the Dinosaur National Monument hearing of April 3, 1950, in discussing the fossils of the area, I said, in part, "A few marine invertebrates will be covered in Carboniferous (Paleozoic) formations in Split Mountain, Whirlpool, Lodore, and Yampa Canyons, but are abundantly represented in the canyon walls, rims, and elsewhere in the monument and on the outside." The abundance of this invertebrate material, in identically the same formations with identically the same members present as in the canyons, is adequately illustrated by the fine Paleozoic fossil localities in other areas of the monument. Some of the more outstanding of these are: Round Top, Martha Peak, Tanks Peak, Bear Valley, Thanksgiving Gorge, East Cactus Flat, Douglas Mountain, Zenobia Peak, Wild Mountain, Harpers Corner, and Jones Hole. To single out Split Mountain and Echo Park for special study, as though some great scientific values were about to be lost, seems to us, utterly ridiculous. In the immediate vicinity of Dinosaur National Monument, but outside its boundaries, are other excellent Paleozoic fossil localities. Diamond Mountain, Lena Peak, Brush Cheek Mountain, and Taylor Mountain are but a few of these. All these areas, both inside the monument and outside its boundaries, are far from any river beds and are wholly unaffected by any dams in the canyons of the monument.

In addition to having mapped the geology of the entire monument, Mrs. Untermann and I have made special studies of certain areas and have publications covering this work. The first of these, Geology of Green and Yampa River Canyons and Vicinity, Dinosaur National Monument, Utah and Colorado, G. E. and B. R. Untermann, appeared in the May 1949 issue of the Bulletin of the American Association of Petroleum Geologists. It deals with the stratigraphy and fossils of the area. The Morgan Formation of Whirlpool Canyon, Green River Dinosaur National Monument, Uintah County, Utah, G. E. and B. R. Untermann, appeared in the December 1949 edition of the Oil and Gas Possibilities of Utah, issued by the Utah Geological and Mineralogical Survey. This paper is a comprehensive study of the Morgan Pennsylvanian beds giving a detailed description of its 104 members and the marine invertebrate fossils they contain. Fossil identifications were made by Drs. Lloyd G. Henbest and James Steele Williams, of the United States Geological Survey, with headquarters in the National Museum. Drs. Henbest, Williams, and John B. Reeside, Jr., all of the United States Geological Survey, and Dr. G. Arthur Cooper, of the United States National Museum, as well as Dr. Christina Lochman, a Cambrian specialist, all contributed to the fossil determinations of the first paper mentioned above. Stratigraphy of the Split Mountain Area, G. E. and B. R. Untermann, appeared in the Guidebook to the Geology of Utah, No. 5, which was published by the Utah Geological and Mineralogical Survey in 1950.

I mention the above publications to show that studies have already been made of the areas which item (a) of the National Park Service report lists as worthy of special consideration. Also that the diagnostic fossils are known to the scientists of the United States Geological Survey and the National Museum and that geologic determinations have already been made on a basis of these identifications. Also that the same formations and beds are present in rank profusion throughout the entire area. Paleozoic exposures are so common that threatened inundation in a limited area need be no cause for concern.

Very sincerely yours,

G. E. UNTERMANN.

ARTISTS GROUP TO SUPPORT DAM PROJECT—ECHO PARK'S BEAUTY, VALUE ENHANCED, CLOSE STUDY SHOWS

A proposal that the Utah Federated Artists join other aesthetic and conservationist organizations in opposing construction of Echo Park Dam in Dinosaur National Monument Friday resulted in a report strongly endorsing the project.

Lynn Fausett, president of the federation of art societies of the State, said a special committee had been named to investigate the project as a result of a motion at the last convention by Miss Mabel Fraser, associate professor of art at the University of Utah, that the federation go on record opposing the project.

HEADED COMMITTEE

Instead of taking action at that time, Miss Fraser was made chairman of a committee to investigate the proposed project, which has been subjected to a barrage of criticism from groups in the East interested in preserving aesthetic, scientific, and scenic values. But after a first-hand study, the committee submitted a report to the executive officers which prompted them to approve the project. Highlights of the report follow:

1. Fossils: Not affected. Are miles away from the project.

2. Geology: Well represented in other canyon walls.

ARCHAEOLOGY STUDIED

3. Archaeology: Area to be flooded already studied and explored.

4. Biotic values: Well represented throughout monument area.

5. Economic values: No minerals or oil occur in monument.

6. Inspirational values: No inspirational values will be lost, since principal trout streams and majestic canyon walls are outside the area to be flooded. The area will be opened to public observation by the project.

7. Ice jams: Ice jams, which have proved so dangerous to bridges and holdings along the stream, can be regulated by the dam.

8. Economic security: Water power would unlock many of Utah's natural resources and enable more of her people to find employment at home. The water is badly needed.

The Parson Speaks Up

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a newspaper article entitled "The Parson Speaks Up," by Rev. John A. Bolen, pastor of the Methodist Church, Van Buren, Mo., which was taken from the Current Local, of Van Buren, Mo.:

THE PARSON SPEAKS UP

(By John A. Bolen)

I am never worried very much about public opinion among people who will do some thinking for themselves. People who allow somebody else to do their thinking for them are the people who stir up the most trouble in society. Some people, thriving on prejudices and excited by hullabaloo, are always ready to climb up on somebody's band wagon. More often than not, it is the wrong wagon.

Take, for instance, the big fuss about General MacArthur. In this instance there are two band wagons. Of course, in the interest of the best citizenship, each of us should sooner or later come to have a definite opinion or set of opinions in this matter.

However, I believe that we ought to be willing to wait until all the excitement is over. If we could clear all the political hogwash out of the way of our thinking, that would be a distinct advantage. Granting that this may have elements of both right and wrong in it, the fact remains that it is largely a matter of partisan politics, and I hope that all of us have the gumption to know that partisan politics may stink to high heaven.

As a parson, I have always prayed that I might be blessed with an intelligent congregation. That sort of congregation is infinitely more pleasant to work with than a crowd of people who are lacking in intelligence. So far, with the very least exceptions, I have been fortunate in this respect. People do not necessarily have to have college degrees in order to be intelligent. In fact, all of us know many intelligent people who did not finish high school and many other intelligent persons who did not get through grammar school. However, academic training provides intelligent folk with some real advantages.

The core of my argument is: We should do our own thinking and not be stampeded by somebody else's bush beating and flag waving.

A Bit of Hard Fact

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, cold analysis eventually breaks through and always survives emotionalism. Walter Lippmann has been doing an excellent job on that score in the so-called MacArthur-Truman controversy. Another of his down to earth, unemotional, but factual, contributions appears in today's Washington Post in his syndicated column, as follows:

A BIT OF HARD FACT

(By Walter Lippmann)

There is a bit of hard fact, in no sense a military secret, which is not often mentioned though it is of the greatest possible importance to an understanding of the real issues.

That bit of hard fact is that American strategic airpower cannot be brought to bear effectively against the vital centers of the Soviet Union except with the consent and active collaboration of Great Britain and France. I do not believe that anyone can dispute the truth of this statement. The bomber fleet does not now exist, and could not be constructed in any near future, which can attack in force the Soviet heart-land from bases which are under American sovereign control.

Strategic air war against the Soviet Union cannot be conducted with any prospect of being decisive from the Pacific side, that is to say from Japan, Okinawa, Formosa, and Alaska. The distances are prohibitive for any sustained assault. To the nearest and by no means the most important industrial area the round trip from Japan is about 5,000 miles. The vital centers of Russia are in the Urals and in European Russia. They cannot be attacked seriously from the Pacific side. They cannot be attacked seriously across the polar ice. They can be attacked seriously only from the European side. But that attack cannot be delivered now, or in the foreseeable future, except from bases under Britain and French sovereignty.

This is the hard fact which has to be taken into full account by anyone who wishes to judge responsibly the issues that are now being debated.

The use of the British and French bases, though it would be indispensable if we were at war with the Soviet Union, cannot be taken for granted under any and all circumstances. The bases do not belong to us; the bases in both British and French territory could not be used unless and until Britain and France had declared war. It is by no means certain, it cannot at all be taken for granted, that they would or could declare war against the Soviet Union in Europe if the Soviet Union confined its action to the Far East. We must remember that the North Atlantic Pact has nothing to do with the Far East.

I am not suggesting or implying that our British and French Allies would not stand by us if we ourselves were the victims of plain aggression in the Far East. I believe they would stand by us. But I mean to say that we must not count upon their support if, against their strong objections, we involve ourselves in a general Asian war. They are bound to hesitate to involve themselves in such a war. For if the war is in Asia and if the Soviet Union does not attack in Europe, how sure can we be, how sure have we a right to be, that the French Parliament would vote for a war that invited an invasion, or that Britain would choose to begin a war in which she might receive the first atomic blow from the Russian side. How would Senator TAFT vote if he were an Englishman and a member of the House of Commons, how would he vote if he were a Frenchman and a member of the French Assembly? We shall be prudent and wise if we assume that the instinct of survival will act very powerfully in Western Europe; and that the people of Western Europe are not likely to stake their very existence on the soundness of General MacArthur's ideas.

We must not deceive ourselves about the genuineness of this condition of affairs, and shrug it off by ascribing it to leftism, to fellow travelerism, to defeatism, and to neutralism. The recent French governments have been as cooperative as it is possible for any French Government to be. Yet they have had to cut down on the facilities they intended to open up to us. At that one can make a very good surmise about what is really happening among the French people by looking at the position now taken by General de Gaulle in his bid for power. His slogan is "Security against the adversary (Russia), independence with regard to the Allies (America)." And then to make it sure that no Frenchman misunderstands him, General de Gaulle has demanded "an alliance and not a subordination" and he has denounced "the encroachments (that is, our bases and facilities in France and in north Africa) now incurred through the weakness of our regime."

Thus General de Gaulle, who leads the French nationalist and fiercely anti-Communist movement, is making it plain as he runs for office that he does not regard the Atlantic Treaty in its present form as finally a settled matter.

Our alliances in Europe are not yet consolidated, and what is going on here these days is subjecting them to a fearful strain. Perhaps the agitation would become subdued, perhaps the discussion would become more temperate, if more people understood that the crack-up of the alliance would be tantamount, or very nearly so, to the neutralization of our strategic air power as a global force. Were the European bases to be closed to us, our air power would be reduced to a regional instrument incapable of being deterrent or decisive.

CARE

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM T. BYRNE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. BYRNE of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Albany (N. Y.) Knickerbocker News of April 21, 1951:

WE DO CARE

When Americans face that eternal question, "What can I do to make this a better world?" they might take a look at the statistics on CARE and behind the figures see a heart-warming picture of good neighbor policies at work.

CARE recently marked the shipment of the ten millionth package abroad. In 5 years the American people, through this agency (Cooperative for American Remittances to Europe, Inc.) have sent the equivalent of 26,000 head of cattle, 100,000 pigs, 32,000,000 cups of sugar, flour for 33,000,000 loaves of bread, 360,000,000 cups of coffee, 56,000,000 quarts of milk. They have added new items, such as coal, seeds, plows, toys, medical equipment, and most recently a tool package for gardening in India and Pakistan.

From countries all over the world grateful praise has come for lives saved, burdens eased, children given a decent chance. CARE packages have been delivered by camel and airplane, on foot, and on elephants. Each package has been a tangible bit of American generosity, a practical proof that the people of this country are kin with the peoples of all the world.

More directly personal than Marshall plan aid, more workable than point 4 programs, CARE has been since the war perhaps the most potent instrument for building up American prestige, for counteracting the propaganda designed to show us as selfish, unfriendly penny pinchers. Here is aid freely given and directly to the point of need, with no questions asked, no strings attached.

The need continues urgent. America, having started this unique humanitarian agency, cannot let up now. Packages are still being made up at CARE's great storehouse in Philadelphia. Information will be given gladly by CARE headquarters at 20 Broad Street, New York City.

Dismissal of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES H. ELSTON

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Cincinnati Enquirer, an analysis of the results of a poll of that newspaper's readers on the subject of the MacArthur dismissal:

MISTRUST IS SHOWN TOWARD PRESIDENT IN POLL OF READERS—FIVE THOUSAND VOTE ON MACARTHUR ISSUE AND ALMOST ALL SAY TRUMAN BUNGLED

(By Donald Urban)

Cincinnati area Enquirer readers once again have expressed their disapproval of the Truman administration. In the second of two readers' views polls taken by The Enquirer, persons returning ballots showed unmistakable mistrust in their President's policies.

Unlike the survey of a month ago which covered a number of important questions of the times, such as the troops-to-Europe issue and wage and price control, last week's poll was limited to but one subject—the MacArthur dismissal.

So intense was the public interest in this controversy that some 5,000 people took the time and went to the trouble of filling out and mailing in the questionnaire ballots which were printed for 3 days in the Enquirer. In the previous general survey, which also ran for 3 days, the number responding was 1,610.

Statistically, the returns showed some interesting trends.

Most astonishing of these trends, of course, were the answers to the first question—"Did President Truman do the proper thing in removing MacArthur?" Only one reader in every 11 answered this query with a "Yes," while 92 percent said, "No; the President did not do the proper thing."

FIRST QUESTION DRAWS "NO'S"

The first question was the only one on which the "No" answers outweighed the "Yes." On No. 2 through 4, the "Yes's" had it.

Question No. 2 read, "Did General MacArthur have a right to express a personal opinion on our military policy in Asia?" Coincidentally, the percentages on this question were numerically equal to those of question 1. The difference arises in that they were reverse; 92 percent of the Enquirer readers returning ballots saying "Yes." Hence, 11 said the general had a right to express an opinion for every 1 who said he didn't.

Only 6 percent of Enquirer readers are willing to trust President Truman's judgment on Asiatic policy. Ninty-four percent, however, would go along with General MacArthur on far eastern policy in answer to the third question on the public opinion survey, "Would you be more willing to trust MacArthur's judgment on Asiatic policy than Truman's?"

"Has President Truman hurt our position in Asia by this move?" It was believed that he did by 93 percent of readers returning ballots. This means that only one person in 13 felt that the status of United States prestige in the Far East remains unchanged following the General's removal.

OVERWHELMINGLY FOR MAC ARTHUR

General MacArthur received overwhelming majorities on each question. The first and second by 11 to 1, the third by 15 to 1 and the last by 13 to 1. But by digging deeper into the statistics, other interesting facts can be uncovered.

Twenty-nine percent of the people who voted "Yes" on the first question, favoring President Truman's action in removing General MacArthur, said "Yes" to the second question, too. In other words, this 29 percent felt that President Truman did the right thing but that the general had a right to express a personal opinion.

Equally paradoxical are the 29 percent answers to the third and fourth questions. Of that group sanctioning the administration's action, 23 percent said they would rather trust General MacArthur's judgment on Asiatic policy than Mr. Truman's. An interesting fact—they approve of Mr. Truman's removal of General MacArthur, but they would feel safer if General MacArthur were back at his old post.

Possibly the most astonishing is the 17 percent who approved of President Truman's action yet feel that the Chief Executive hurt our position in Asia by this move. Seventeen percent of the people voting "Yes" on the first question voted "Yes" on the last one, too. It would be interesting to see how this group reconciles their two answers.

CONVERSE BALLOTING IS SLIGHT

For the benefit of the skeptics who feel that by the clever use of statistics any argument may be proved, we show that the converse of the above calculations is infinitely smaller.

Only 2 percent of those voting "no" on the first question voted similarly on the second. Only one person in every 49 felt that Mr. Truman did not do the right thing and that General MacArthur did not have a right to express an opinion.

"No's" to both one and three would have given, "No, Truman did not do the right thing, but I would trust Truman's judgment more than MacArthur's on Asiatic policy." The people who said this amounted to 0.7 percent.

The smallest statistic figured was 0.03 percent. This applied to those who voted "No" on both questions 1 and 4. The 0.03 percent said, "No, Truman did not do the right thing, but he hasn't hurt our position in Asia by this move."

What this survey proves, this writer does not attempt to say, and refers readers to today's editorial page. The survey was not conducted by scientific pollsters or based on the so-called random sampling method. It was, however, an effective and interesting poll of public opinion in the Cincinnati area and Ohio Valley Members of Congress will receive copies of this newspaper.

Influence Here Enables British To Ship War Goods to the Soviet and Red China

OF

HON. USHER L. BURDICK

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, for some time now I have been calling the attention of Congress and the country to the action of Great Britain in shipping strategic war materials to China and the Soviet.

Congress passed an act in September 1950 prohibiting economic and financial assistance to any country whose trade with Russia, including Red China, is found contrary to the security of the United States.

Arthur Sears Henning, in a news item published April 30 in the Times-Herald newspaper, of Washington, D. C., says upon this subject:

INFLUENCE HERE ENABLES BRITISH TO SHIP WAR GOODS TO SOVIET—CONTACTS THAT CAUSED MACARTHUR FIRING PAVE WAY TO EVASION OF TRADE LAW

(By Arthur Sears Henning)

British Government influence in Washington, which brought about the dismissal of General MacArthur, is being manifested in numerous other matters, according to congressional investigators.

One is the shipment of war materials by Great Britain and other Atlantic Pact countries to Russia and Russian satellites, which has reached gigantic proportions.

PAID FOR BY UNITED STATES

In many cases, the materials have been furnished to the exporting European countries by the United States under the Marshall plan. As a result, American taxpayers are paying for the materials and equipment being used to shoot down American soldiers in Korea and to prepare Russia to do likewise if world war III should come.

To British influence is ascribed the failure of the administration to enforce the act of last September 27 forbidding economic or financial assistance to any country whose trade with Russia or her satellites, including Red China, is found contrary to the security of the United States. Senator KEM, Republican, of Missouri, urged President Truman in a letter on March 9 to enforce this law. The President made no reply.

BRITAIN SELLS TO RUSSIA

In his letter, the Senator said he had been informed by the Commerce Department that Britain sold nearly $330,000,000 worth of machine tools to Russia last January alone.

KEM also cited the report that Italian factories aided by the Marshall plan were speeding products for Russia and that a Soviet economic party was in Genoa to expedite delivery of electric cranes and thermal-power stations from two factories that were Marshall-plan beneficiaries to the extent of $1,625,000.

The scandal of the arming of our actual and potential enemies by our allies was aired in the Senate with repercussions in the British Parliament.

A member of the British Government stated that there would be no cessation of the trade to which the Americans objected. The agitation did result, however, in a British announcement last week that the export of steel and other potential war materials from Hong Kong to Red China is being embargoed. This is only a trickle compared with the flood of shipments of war materials by Britain to the Soviets through Western Europe and other points on the vast Russian perimeter.

TO RUSSIA VIA CHINA

Russian imports of natural rubber before World War II averaged 35,000 tons a year. In 1950 they bought directly about 85,000 tons, most of it from British Malaya. In addition, 38,000 tons of Malayan rubber went to China, and 44,000 tons to British Hong Kong to be transshipped to the Soviet Union. Another 22,000 tons went to Eastern Germany, Czechoslovakia and Hungary.

China has no way of using rubber in manufacturing, so for 1950, 189,000 tons went to Russian industries as against 35,000 tons in a normal prewar year.

Russia also took 42,500,000 pounds of wool in 1950 and 2,000,000 pounds of cotton, 700 tons of tin. Practically all this from British and Commonwealth sources.

Little Czechoslovakia got 13,127 tons of copper from Belgian Congo in 1950, 7,000 tons of zinc, 1,100 tons of lead, all from Belgium.

The Belgians sold Russia more than $8,000,000 worth of machinery and machine tools and equipment in 1950.

The British shipped $28,000,000 of machinery and machine tools to the Soviet Union in 1950.

Mr. Speaker, just what is the administration trying to do? Knowing that Great Britain is engaged in feeding Red China and Russia with war materials, why do we not follow the law and end all economic and financial assistance to Great Britain?

Are we not permitting our relations to continue with a country which is giving aid and comfort to our enemies? Soon Congress will be asked to make more appropriations available to Great Britain and if any Member of Congress votes for this kind of appropriation, are they not guilty of treason? We can give aid and comfort to the enemies of this country, but if we do we are guilty of treason. Is it not just as much a treasonable act to give money to a country that will at once use it to give aid and comfort to our enemies, when we know that country is trading with our enemies?

This is the third time I have presented this matter of trade with our enemies to the Congress. At this moment, the matter of that trade is heated argument in Parliament. The charge that I have made against Great Britain of trading in strategic war materials with our enemies is now admitted in Parliament.

The September law referred to reads as follows:

SEC. 1304. During any period in which the Armed Forces of the United States are actively engaged in hostilities while carrying out any decision of the Security Council of the United Nations, no economic or financial assistance shall be provided, out of any funds appropriated to carry out the purposes of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended, or any other act to provide economic or financial assistance (other than military assistance) to foreign countries, to any country whose trade with the Union of Soviet Socialistic Republics or any of its satellite countries (including Communist China and Communist North Korea) is found by the National Security Council to be contrary to the security interest of the United States.

This act may be cited as the "Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1951."

There is one loophole in this law and that is that this trading must be found by the National Security Council of this country to be contrary to the security of the United States. Under this law we cannot make the finding that trade is being carried on with our enemies—the Security Council must make the finding, and unless that body does that, are we to sit here with our arms folded while Great Britain supplies Red China and the Soviets with rubber and steel? This law clearly forbids our giving any economic or financial assistance to those countries so trading with our enemies. Now when more appropriations are asked for for Great Britain, are we to extend that assistance in face of the admitted fact that Great Britain is so trading with our enemies? For one, I am not going to wait until the National Security Council finds that such trading is contrary to the security interests of the United States, but I will act now—with all this evidence before us—and not vote one nickel to Great Britain.

No Member of Congress can find the least possible excuse for extending aid economically or financially to Great Britain. To now extend this aid in the face of the admission of Great Britain would come within the definition of treason against the United States.

The Victory We Seek

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a copy of the speech made by Ambassador Warren R. Austin, United States representative to the United Nations, at the New York State convention of the Grand Masters of the Masonic Order, Hotel Statler, on Tuesday, May 1, 1951, entitled "The Victory We Seek":

THE VICTORY WE SEEK

(By Ambassador Warren R. Austin)

"Come now, and let us reason together." (Isaiah 1: 18.)

Our friends around the free world who want to rely on our leadership are listening.

Our adversaries whose totalitarian tactic is divide and conquer are watching.

Let us not conceal our fundmental unity by a smoke screen of explosive dissensions. Let us reason together as Americans sharing a common purpose—peace and freedom—for ourselves and for others.

In that spirit, I want to discuss with you two questions underlying the global struggle for peace with freedom. That struggle the free world is determined to win. What, then, is the victory we seek? What will it take to win it?

Our country is now performing as a member of the United Nations a leading role in the first collective use of force to repel an armed attack.

On June 25 the Communist attack on Korea required the United States and the United Nations to choose between resisting the aggressor or submitting to aggression. There was no other choice.

The Security Council acted promptly and with unity. It called for an immediate cessation of hostilities and for the aggressor to return to the line from whence he began his invasion. At the same time, it called upon all members to support the United Nations policy and to refrain from assisting the North Korean authorities.

If the invader had heeded the Security Council, the victory we seek over aggression would have been won then and there. But Communist imperialism continued to activate its first step through puppet armies. The Communists were seeking far more than the capture of the Republic of Korea. Their objective was conquest by force of country after country. Therefore, their strategy flaunted the Security Council. They could not advance their plan without discrediting the United Nations.

The decision of the Security Council that collective action ought to be taken by member states marked the departure of civilization from the way of Manchuria, Ethiopia, the Sudetenland, and Munich.

The risk of acting had to be weighed against the consequence of not acting. Experience warned us that it would not be peace, but a series of new aggressions, capitulations of the weak before the mere threat of attack, disintegration of free world collaboration, and death to the idea of collective security. We could foresee the fatal miscalculation by Communist imperialism leading to the step that would be resisted, whatever the cost. And then, the cost in lives and destruction would be astronomical.

The free world hailed the decision to act in Korea. Today there is wide agreement that it was a sound decision from every standpoint.

Let us keep clear what that decision was, and why it was taken. Fifty-three governments, members of the United Nations, voluntarily and spontaneously supported it; 15 nations quickly put forces into the field and Ethiopian troops are now arriving; 41 states contributed supplies and material aid.

These contributions have not been poured into a vacuum of policy. Every one of the nations who have declared their allegiance to the United Nations' action have given that allegiance to a policy they have carefully examined and then determined to support.

The policy of the United Nations in regard to Korea is clear, positive, and consistent.

The political objectives of the United Nations in Korea have been set forth for all the world to see since 1947. Those objectives have been repeated and reaffirmed at each annual session of the General Assembly—in 1948, in 1949, and again, on October 7, 1950.

The military objectives of the United Nations were declared in the Security Council resolutions of June 25, June 27, and July 7, 1950.

Always, until the end, protection of the lives of the people of the Republic of Korea and aid to them in the preservation of their liberty inspires the United Nations.

The intervention of the Chinese Communists in Korea has not been ignored by the United Nations. The additional policy required by this new fact was set forth by the General Assembly in its resolution of February 1 this year.

All these resolutions represent United Nations policy. Because that policy has been consistent from the very beginning, the essence of these resolutions can be summarized and stated briefly.

Militarily, the objective is to repel the aggression and restore international peace and security in the area.

Politically, the objective is to establish a unified, independent, and democratic government in the sovereign state of Korea.

We will adhere to both these purposes.

The United Nations has not declared, nor has it ever been asked to declare, that the political objective must be achieved by military means. In fact, the emphasis has been quite the contrary. The policy of the United Nations has been—and should always be—to achieve its political objectives, by pacific settlements.

The United Nations does not exist to conduct war, but to stop it—by peaceful means, if possible; by united force, if necessary. In our allegiance to the United Nations, this is a fact we must never forget.

Even in branding the Chinese Communists as aggressors, the United Nations, in a resolution sponsored by the United States, held open the door to peaceful settlement.

That resolution of February 1, 1951—a resolution which is today exactly 3 months old—expressed both United States and United Nations policy. I think it is worth recalling today.

It affirmed the determination of the United Nations to continue its action in Korea to meet the aggression.

It called upon all states and authorities to lend every assistance to the United Nations action in Korea.

And it affirmed that it continues to be the policy of the United Nations to bring about a cessation of hostilities in Korea, and the achievement of United Nations objectives in Korea by peaceful means.

Those are policies—clear, definite, and positive policies—which we need to keep in mind in judging developments in Korea.

In October, the forces of the original aggressor were, in large part, defeated and destroyed. This was a major triumph over aggression. It was and remains a triumph for the free members of the United Nations.

Then, the Chinese Communist leaders launched a new aggression in a last minute effort to prevent such an overwhelming triumph for peace. We defeated the first aggression. We will defeat the second.

Up to tonight the two aggressions by Communist imperialism have failed to achieve either of their immediate objectives: (1) The North Korean puppets to occupy the Republic of Korea; (2) the Chinese puppets to drive United Nations forces off the peninsula.

The gallant action of our boys and their comrades in Korea has done more than deprive the Communists of their immediate objectives. It has served notice that Communist imperialism will encounter collective resistance wherever it attacks.

This same notice was given by the General Assembly in its resolution of November 17, 1950, entitled "Peace Through Deeds," in which 50 nations formally determined that for the realization of lasting peace and security it is indispensable that prompt, united action be taken to meet aggression wherever it arises.

While we continue the struggle to fulfill our objectives, let us not devaluate the glory of the sacrifices already made by our men in Korea by discounting what they have gained. Their achievements have inflicted calamities upon the Soviet grasp for empire and world dominion.

The Korean conflict has unmasked the Soviet's phony world-wide peace offensive.

It has exposed the Soviet designs for conquest on the installment plan.

It has upset the Soviet timetable for new conquests on the Korean pattern.

The Korean conflict has rallied the first collective force and action behind United Nations principles.

It has stimulated the United Nations to develop new machinery and better methods for meeting future threats.

It has brought the free world to a new peak of unity in the United Nations.

But, most important of all:

The Korean conflict has alerted people all over the world to the imminent dangers of Soviet aggression.

It has strengthened the will of nations to stand together and resist aggression.

It has aroused the free peoples to the necessity of mobilizing their strength for defense, and may thus have saved civilization.

These accomplishments make the stakes in Korea very high, and the need for sober and responsible weighing of policy very great. We must not be panicked into making a fatal error at this crucial stage, an error which might lose all that we have gained and precipitate the world war we are trying to prevent.

The Chinese Reds and their supporters are taking tremendous risks in a desperate attempt to blast the collective barricade from the path of aggression.

The hope of dividing the councils of the defenders gave the Communists their only chance of eventual success. The growing controversy over tactics stimulates their hope of destroying the United Nations. Their present offensive seems to be timed for its impact on a state of confusion and dissension in the ranks of the free.

The victory they seek is the breaking of our unity in this country and in the free world. They hope to isolate the United States from its friends and allies. They hope by persistent pressure to split us asunder over questions of tactics to counter their manuevers, and make us lose sight of our global strategy.

The victory we seek is possible. It will not be easy, but it will be infinitely less costly than general war. It depends on strength, unity, and cooperation.

If these are the essential elements for victory, let us determine to close ranks and present an unshakable world front to the forces of aggression. Let us reason together to find the best way of acting together.

Certainly we can disagree and try to persuade each other of the soundness of our opinions. This can be done in perfect freedom of discussion. We do it all the time at the United Nations. But we must not arm our arguments with canes to beat the rightness of our views into each other's heads; or engage in battles of invective and denunciation. The Soviets have tried it for 5 years with this result: They have convinced nobody and isolated themselves from everybody. Let us not follow that bad example.

I have not talked tactics in this short discussion. Rather, I have tried to keep my eye on the grand strategy by which we hope to stop aggression where it started, discourage its attempt elsewhere, prevent the spread of war, restore peace where it is broken, and make the free world secure by collective action. These are the terms of the victory we seek.

We know from the bitter experience of the past 5 years that victory involves far more than the defeat of an enemy. Therefore, I repeat that the fight to stop aggression in Korea is a fight to prevent it everywhere else in the world. The aim is not to settle political issues by force, but to prevent the aggressor from imposing a settlement by force.

The aim is not conflict without limit, but peace without appeasement. That is the victory we seek.

City Folks and Meat Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ZALES N. ECTON
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. ECTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "City Folks and Meat Prices," which appeared in the Bozeman Daily Chronicle of April 27 last.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CITY FOLKS AND MEAT PRICES

City folk in the East seem to have a strong impression that they could be eating steak dinners for a dollar a throw if those greedy ranchers out in the West weren't gouging them.

Every day or so some urban commentator waxes indignant over the high cost of food. And nearly always his little tirade winds up in a blast at the farm bloc, which he pictures as a sinister gang of congressional bumpkins busily conspiring to woo the hayshaker vote.

These lambasters of the sunburned Shylocks, when they talk about food costs, usually think in terms of animal products. They seldom are outraged by what they have to put out for a good mess of diced carrots or cornmeal mush. What concerns them mostly is meat.

It's a pity, they point out, that a farmer can't be content to set a humane price on his livestock, so city people who aren't situated so they can keep their own sheep will be able to buy lamb chops without mortgaging their cars.

All this only goes to show how little some people know about the processes that bring them their daily nourishment. The truth is that the farmer doesn't set the price on his livestock. He takes what he can get for it. There is nothing that would please him more than to be able to sit down and figure out how much money, labor, and talent he has invested in his sheep and then decide that he will charge so much a pound for them.

But that isn't the way it works. The farmer is engaged in a colossal gambling enterprise that makes the underworld syndicate racket look like Sunday school turkey raffles. And the percentages are by no means rigged in his favor. He risks his chips in the open market and backs his own judgment against the whims of consumers the world over as well as the weather.

No law compels anybody to pay him what he thinks he ought to get for his sheep or hogs. The consumers decide how much they are willing to pay for lamb or pork chops, and that sets the price of sheep and hogs. If the consumers can't get pork chops for what they are willing to pay, they can always decide to buy hominy or something instead. But if the farmer isn't willing to sell his hogs for the offered price, he can't decide to sell corn instead. He decided to raise hogs months before, and it's too late to back out now. If he doesn't want to take what he can get for them, all he can do is keep them for pets. And hogs make very expensive pets.

If good steaks cost so much that only those on Government expense accounts can afford them, why cuss the farmers? He is one of the few who are doing something sensible to hold food costs down. He works by the sun, not the whistle—sometimes two 40-hour weeks a week. He is producing lots more meat now than he did before the war, with less help.

That would bring prices down if we weren't eating 10 pounds more per head this year than we were then.

Training of Airmen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "A Critical Situation," written by Mr. Charles A. Parker, and published in the Civil Air Patrol News of April 23.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A CRITICAL SITUATION

That the fixed-base and/or flying service and school end of the flying industry is being torn to pieces is evident on every hand and that definite need exists to replenish the airman pool through federally sponsored training is shown in the following:

THE MILITARY AND DRAFT

Recall to active duty has already depleted the ranks of other-than-airline aviation to a serious extent in the pilot category alone. The draft is also making serious inroads in all classes of personnel.

THE AIRLINES

Air carriers are looking for pilots; also for mechanics. They are reaching for the fixed-base operator and his personnel, with this end of the industry being robbed of personnel. Their advertisements are on airport bulletin boards. Their hiring agents are at operator meetings. Their advertisements appear in aviation publications.

EXECUTIVE AIRCRAFT USERS

According to a statement by a key member of an association involved with this category, they are looking for skilled multiengined and instrument-rated pilots. Vital defense and mobilization transportation by these people is facing a curb.

AERIAL DUSTING AND SPRAYING

Reports are received that this activity has been cut into seriously by both the military and the draft. Such pilots cannot be trained or replaced overnight. The California Legislature recently found the situation so acute that they passed a resolution directed to Selective Service and the military ecnouraging every consideration of pilots in this category. Vast acreages and food supplies will be jeopardized if this continues.

DEFENSE INDUSTRIES

These industries are attracting all classes of personnel from fixed-base aviation with expanded activity and high pay scales. Persons with mechanical skills in particular are being drawn into defense work. Who will replace them? Airports are closing. The sponge is being thrown in by the operators.

AIR FORCE CADET CONTRACT SCHOOLS

Contracts with only four schools so far exist, yet these schools are already experiencing difficulty in obtaining qualified instructors. What of the additional contracts to come? In addition, public funds are being wasted on cadets in such schools who start training on T-6 aircraft—$1 out of every $3 thrown away, as per Gen. George Kenney, USAF. Prescreening of such cadet material is positively needed to save the biggest part of this dollar, as well as to help preserve existing civil training resources.

THERE WILL BE NO AIRMAN POOL LEFT

Fixed-base aviation is fast melting away. With this are going many airports. This means that civil defense resources are going—the training resource is going—vital fast direct taxi and company transportation service is melting—agriculture will suffer.

Here are the things that civil aviation schools should be doing immediately irrespective of the still greater basic need for a widespread program of aviation and flight indoctrination among the youth of the country in the lower age levels.

1. Refresher courses created for airline and executive user needs, instrument and multiengine ratings or development of such ratings from existing or former commercial pilots.

2. Refresher and development courses for aerial applicator pilots.

3. Refresher and finishing courses for instructors for the AF Contract Cadet Schools and for the civil school facility as well. Note that the expansion of ROTC to include flight training with civil schools that appears certain to come will create a new demand in this category alone. Notable is the fact that in World War II the first shortages developed in the instructor category.

4. Prescreening of AF flying cadets for economy.

5. Development of mechanic skills to feed all phases of activity through the aviation trade school.

If the airman training legislation now pending, which is designed to meet the civil and military needs of the country, were law, the above situations could be met by cooperative planning, evaluation of shortages, and estimates of future requirements, by CAA in connection with appropriate agencies of Government, industry and the military. Necessary training programs could then be established.

The question is heard, where are the GI trainees? This is easy to answer. Some have become established in other activities. Others have returned to military service. Many have already lost ratings and proficiency or were never able to obtain instructor, multi-engine, or instrument ratings under arbitrary and crippling VA restrictions. Neither did they have, nor do they now have, the money with which to purchase such ratings or obtain refreshers. Many could be brought back to replenish the civil pool through the program pointed out here under an airman training act if it were law.

If these are the conditions at a stage no further along than mobilization is at the present, what will be the situation as the tempo of mobilization increases or should we ever reach a fateful "M" day?

Principal conclusion from all this is that early hearings on the airman training legislation, S. 507 and/or the House version, H. R. 1521, must be held by the House and Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committees and every effort be made to create this legislation as law.

Ships Aiding Reds Mortgaged to United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. WILLIAMS
OF DELAWARE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Ships Aiding Reds Under United States Mortgage," written by Helen Delich, and published in the Baltimore Sun of April 29, 1951.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SHIPS AIDING REDS MORTGAGED TO UNITED STATES—CHINESE COMMUNIST PRODUCTS CARRIED TO WEST EUROPE

(By Helen Delich)

WASHINGTON, April 28.—Eight ships currently involved in a single movement of grain and grain products from Communist China to Western Europe are under mortgage to the United States Maritime Commission.

Seven other identified vessels engaged in this transaction were purchased from the United States for cash by Greek-Panamanian and South African interests.

The remaining 12 freighters named in the consignment are registered as British and Russian.

LOSS PUT NEAR THREE BILLION

Since the 15 American-built Liberty-type ships were sold under the Ship Sales Act of 1946, they were embraced in a scathing attack made Wednesday by Senator WILLIAMS, Republican of Delaware, on the legislation. At that time, he pointed out that this Nation had lost nearly $2,800,000,000 in these sales.

Then the Senator noted that the British had permitted seven Nationalist Chinese ships under mortgage to the United States to be taken over by the Communists in Hong Kong and Singapore, and added:

"It would be interesting to know how many more of the ships which have been sold to foreign operators are today being utilized to transport goods in trade with Communist countries."

ARRANGED BY HUNGARIANS

The vast single transaction of approximately 380,000 tons of soybeans, maize, wheat, beans, etc., from China to Europe was arranged by Hungarians in London.

Shipping circles hint that these same freighters are carrying strategic general cargo to Dalny, Taku Bar, Tsingtao, and Chinwangtao—all Red China ports—to discharge before loading grain.

It is believed that the general cargo or the income derived from it is being used to pay Communist China for the grain. Informed sources here state that the exact nature of the general cargo cannot be determined, but presume it contains items sorely needed by the Asiatic countries battling United Nations troops in Korea.

GRAIN FLOWS IN FROM UNITED STATES

At the same time, grain and its products from the United States are flowing into the same Western European ports under the Marshall plan and other aid programs without any cost to these countries.

The freight rates on the grain from China to Antwerp, Rotterdam, Hamburg, or Gdynia range from $25.50 up per ton, considered favorable for the shipowner or charterer.

Exporters and importers assert that this particular transaction typifies cargo movements and the use of ship-sales vessels in the over-all international trading picture.

The 8 ships under mortgage are part of 100 Liberty freighters sold on credit to 75 individuals and firms with the backing of the Greek Government in 1947. These ships specifically were to be used in Greek foreign commerce to help rehabilitate that nation.

Many of the owners live in New York and are associated with various shipping firms under as many varied foreign flags.

The mortgaged ships are the steamship Costantis (formerly Harry Leon Wilson), sold to the Pateras Bros.; Nicolas (William N. Byers), sold to A. & J. Ch. Mavrophillippas & Ch. N. Pateras; Pinios (Robert L. Hague), Athena Maritime Co., Ltd.; Themistocles (Frances S. Barton), Ionion Steamship Co., Ltd.; Nicolaou Georgious (Frederick Tresca), Mrs. Z. Nicolaou and family; Konistra (Edwin L. Kodkin), Thomas N. Ephiphaniades; Annastassios Pateras (Betty Zane), Dimitris Annastassios Pateras; Panaghia K. (Albert A. Michelson), Andreas G. Caravais.

CASH-PURCHASED SHIPS

The cash-purchased Liberty carriers are the Atlantic Seamen (Samuel W. Williston) and Atlantic Wind (Henry M. Robert) to the Atlantic Maritime Co., of Panama; Liberator (James B. Aswell), to Compania Naviera Pan-Americana; Enterprise (Charles Dauray), Cia Naviera Pomerosa, of Panama.

The Northern Steamship (Pty.) Ltd., of Johannesburg, South Africa, paid cash for the President Pretorius (James B. Hickok), President Steyn (John G. Nicolay) and President Kruger (John M. Palmer).

Instruction of Young People in Affairs of Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ESTES KEFAUVER
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a good idea expressed to me from Charles Kress, of Binghamton, N. Y. On a voluntary basis, Mr. Kress was of much help in the Senate Crime Investigating Committee's work. He suggests that some arrangements should be made, preferably through a voluntary patriotic association, to make available to the splendid young men and women who are visiting our Capitol a short talk about the meaning of some of the things which they see here as it relates to better citizenship.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APRIL 15, 1951.

DEAR SENATOR KEFAUVER: I believe we could do much more in this country than we have been doing in the schools, churches, and homes to build character and citizenship in the boys and girls who will be the men and women of tomorrow. I believe tremendously in the youth of this Nation; that they mean well, that their hearts are right, that they want to be fine, good citizens of a fine, good country. The great and serious interest displayed by young people throughout the Nation in the Senate Crime Investigating Committee hearings was to me a very encouraging indication of the fundamental integrity of our young folks.

The question in my mind is whether we older people, we who call ourselves the leaders of this Nation, are doing all we can, and are fully meeting our responsibilities to give our boys and girls the leadership, guidance, and assistance necessary to help them in their honest desires to become good citizens and real Americans.

Right here in Washington are we doing all we can in this direction? Everyday now, and for all the rest of this month, the corridors of this Capitol are overflowing with boys and girls from all over the country—bright young students at perhaps their most impressionable age. They come to Washington, visit points of interest, and leave. But our Government neither takes them by the hand nor speaks to them.

Couldn't we do something better than this? Couldn't we have a speaker from the Government, or from the American Legion or some other patriotic organization, meet each group of these junior citizens as they visit the Capitol, speak to them briefly, explain to them what good citizenship means, and how it, and it alone, has made this great country possible? A speaker to give them a few inspiring words and thoughts which they will keep in their hearts always, associated with the memories of their visit here—a speaker to tell them that Washington is really theirs, that tomorrow they will inherit it from their fathers and mothers—that here in Washington, despite the sensationalism of headlines from time to time, there are good, honest, sincere, hard-working Government officials, Congressmen, Senators, and judges working faithfully and earnestly as true Americans to keep and protect that priceless heritage of American citizenship safe and secure until these young Americans are ready to take over the grave responsibilities of carrying on.

Couldn't we arrange to do something like this, so that all these fine, intelligent boys and girls who are flocking through the Capitol corridors every day now, do not go away empty-handed, without any message of welcome, encouragement, or inspiration?

Can we say we are fully doing our part here in Washington if we miss this opportunity to help in the job of building good citizenship in the youth of today?

Sincerely,

CHARLES KRESS.

OPS Roll-Back of Beef Prices Unfair, Unworkable, and Confiscatory

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. REES
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent given me by the House today, I am including a copy of a telegram from the members of the Flint Hills Farmers and Livestock Growers Emergency Association, expressing opposition to the roll-back of meat prices ordered by the Office of Price Stabilization.

This message was sent as the result of a meeting of approximately 800 farmers and livestock men in my immediate vicinity. Nearly all of these people are farmers who handle comparatively small herds of cattle, and who depend upon the farm and livestock for their living. These people are, after all, the backbone of our country. They are among our best citizens. They do feel that the order of the OPS is not an order of stabilization, but of discrimination, demanding that they accept a lower price on the market for their product than what it is really worth. The telegram reads as follows:

EMPORIA, KANS., May 4, 1951.

Hon. EDWARD H. REES,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

This evening in Emporia at the initial meeting of the Flint Hills Farmers and Livestock Growers Emergency Association, the 815 members present gave their unanimous approval to the following resolutions. You are urged to give them your most vigorous support.

1. Be it resolved, That the roll-back of beef prices as ordered by Office of Price Stabilization be reconsidered since it is unfair, unworkable, and confiscatory for the farmers, livestock growers, and businessmen of this important cattle-producing area. We submit that it is also detrimental to agricultural and related industries of the United States.

2. Be it resolved, That you use your utmost efforts to see that in the forthcoming discussion of the Defense Production and Mobilization Act, and especially article IV of that act, the interest of labor, agriculture, and industry are fairly and fully discussed; that, if it be considered necessary to extend or rewrite this act, you are urged to see that an equitable and workable agreement in which the time element necessary to carry on the normal livestock program, which in this community is from 9 to 15 months, is arrived at. This group would like specifically for you to see that should it be considered necessary, after due consideration by the Congress, to impose controls on any one segment of the economy that they be applied to all groups of industry, labor, and agriculture and not any one segment by itself.

MEMBERS OF FLINT HILLS FARMERS AND LIVESTOCK GROWERS EMERGENCY ASSOCIATION.

The Federal Government's Part in Airport Development

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES I. DOLLIVER
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech given by me before a meeting of the American Association of Airport Executives in Minneapolis, Minn., on Monday, April 23, 1951:

THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT'S PART IN AIRPORT DEVELOPMENT

I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak to you who bear the day-to-day responsibilities and headaches of managing the Nation's airport facilities. As a member, for some years past, of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives—which committee, as you may know, among its other duties considers Federal legislative matters pertaining to aviation—I believe that I have gained some appreciation of your problems and of the importance of our airport facilities to the successful functioning of air operations as a whole, particularly in these difficult times when increasingly greater demands upon aviation facilities are being made.

While I am going to center my comments this evening [afternoon] on the Federal Government's part in airport developments, I fully recognize, as you do also I am sure, that the Federal Government is and can be only one of the partners in expanding and improving the Nation's aggregate of available airport facilities. The part of the local community sponsors, and of you as the operating executives actively on the job, determines more than anything else how well the airports function as an indispensible arm of aviation. To you must go much of the credit for what has been and is being accomplished.

ESSENTIALITY OF AIRPORTS

It has aptly been said that an adequate system of airports is the essential "taproot of all aeronautical activity." Obviously, the finest and swiftest aircraft which man has been able to devise can serve no useful purpose, aids to safe navigation in the air are by themselves pointless, and the most expertly trained flying personnel is helpless and futile unless the port facilities are available which enable the planes to take off and to reach safe landings at their appointed destinations. It is only by means of adequate airport facilities that any community can become a significant part of the stream of air commerce.

These altogether self-evident observations would require no particular mention were it not for the notable fact that throughout most of the history of aviation up to the present the development of adequate airport facilities has tended rather persistently to lag behind improvements in other aspects of aviation's growth and progress. If this be true, as it has been recognized to be by many who are interested in the sound and balanced growth of aviation and air commerce, it becomes important to consider how existing and prospective airport deficiencies can be overcome and how the responsibilities, financial and otherwise, for the necessary improvements should appropriately be divided among those who are concerned.

EMERGENCY PROGRAMS

It may be helpful to note very briefly the background of airport developments in this country. For more than a decade prior to World War II, the Federal Government, under various work-relief programs, had provided the greater part of the funds spent for the construction of airport facilities. The local communities and sponsors were required, however, to provide the sites as well as to assume the costs of airport maintenance and operation. Considering the lack of experience in airport planning and design in that early period, and also the fact that these airport projects were more often than not hurriedly conceived and carried out as emergency measures to provide employment, it is not surprising that many of the facilities proved to be poorly located, designed, and constructed. To a large extent it may well be true that, under the circumstances then existing, future airport needs could not have been very clearly foreseen. But at least we do know by hindsight that a large part of the airport expenditures made in the decade of the thirties failed to produce facilities of lasting value. In any event, the mistakes that were made provided some needed lessons to guide subsequent developments.

Beginning in 1941 and continuing through the war period, airport construction had to be geared into the war effort, with priorities limited strictly to those facilities which would contribute most to military requirements and the national defense. Under the DLA (defense landing area) program in World War II a total of 535 municipal airports were constructed with Federal funds. As before, the municipal sponsors were expected to furnish the sites and, except for direct military operations, to bear the continuing costs of operation and maintenance. Thus, throughout the first 15 years of Federal participation in airport development, emergency conditions prevailed which dictated the essentials of the programs which were undertaken.

THE POSTWAR PROGRAM AND LEGISLATION

After the conflict, wherever possible these war-built facilities were converted to civilian use, even though in many instances they were not wholly suited for such purposes. Nevertheless, the war undoubtedly accelerated the growth of airport facilities, even as it stimulated the advancement of aviation generally.

At the present time there are some 2,100 municipal airports in this country. Counting all types of landing areas and strips there are, of course, many more than this—altogether about 6,500—but most of this total number are suitable only for the smaller aircraft, local operations, and emergency landings when circumstances require. Many of these existing airports have been established since the close of the war and most of them have been substantially improved or enlarged in recent years.

In 1946 the Federal Airport Act was adopted (Public Law No. 377, 79th Cong.). For the first time under this act provision was made for a sustained program of airport construction directed primarily toward the development of a national system of airports designed to meet the needs of civil aviation. Prior to that time, as I have mentioned, Federal airport aid had been extended mainly in connection with emergency programs, first of depression and then of war.

The 1946 act authorized the appropriation of $520,000,000 to be spread over a 7-year period on the basis of matching grants to sponsors of public airports in the States and certain of the Territories. No restrictions as to the classes of airports eligible for Federal assistance were specified, apportionments as between larger and smaller airports being left broadly to the discretion of the Civil Aeronautics Administration. The act did provide that the funds be spent in accordance with a national airport plan to be formulated and revised as necessary by the Civil Aeronautics Administration.

Good airports do not spring into being overnight. They require, as you well know, careful planning and working out of financial problems. For these reasons, and also because the initiative in airport development still must come from the local community sponsors, the program envisaged by the 1946 act started and gathered momentum rather slowly. Even so, appropriations for the first 4 years totalled $157,000,000 through the fiscal year 1950, or at the rate of nearly $40,000,000 a year.

At this point I should like to refer briefly to amendatory legislation affecting the airport program which Congress has enacted in recent months. The first of these amendments, which became effective on September 27, 1950 (Public Law No. 846, 81st Cong.) extends for five additional years beyond June 30, 1953, the period during which the $520,000,000 authorized by the 1946 act may be expended. This extension should enable the public airport sponsors to proceed carefully with their plans under assurance of continuity in the availability of the Federal funds which are provided.

The second airport amendment to which I refer became effective on January 9, 1951, under Public Law No. 912, Eighty-first Congress. Heretofore, the Federal Government has borne only 25 percent of the site-acquisition costs for airports, whereas usually the Federal share in other respects has been 50 percent of construction costs. This restriction as to the financing of sites apparently hampered some communities in getting desirable airport projects under way and, perhaps more important, was contributing in some instances to the selection of poor locations and the building of airports on too small an acreage. On the other hand, communities which were farsighted in selecting the best available sites, even though more costly as to the required original outlay, were in effect being penalized by the 25 percent restriction. It was widely felt that, because of the basic importance of suitable location and adequate size, the Federal Government should not weigh the scales against sound long-run airport economy. Consequently, under Public Law 912, the Federal Government now bears the same portion (50 percent) of land costs as it can pay of other developmental costs. As I understand it, many administrative and legal difficulties in distinguishing between land-acquisition costs and other costs have also been eliminated by this change.

NEED FOR INTEGRATED AVIATION FACILITIES

One of the greatest aviation needs now, it seems to be agreed, is for more deliberately considered integration of aviation facilities. By such integration I mean, for example, that sound airport planning requires account to be taken of associated changes which are occurring or are in prospect with respect to flying equipment and air-navigation facilities. This problem is of particular importance to you as airport managers because it is the airports in many instances which are now, and threaten increasingly to become, the limiting bottlenecks to further aviation advances.

Especially from the standpoint of safety and dependability of flying, we can all of us heartily applaud the great strides which have been made recently in the development of an improved all-weather common system of air-traffic control under the so-called SC-31 program, which was initiated on the basis of the report in 1948 by the Radio Technical Commission for Aeronautics and which is planned for completion by 1963. Already it is apparent, however, that this common system of air-traffic control, which is expected to cost the Federal Government considerably more than $1,000,000,000, cannot yield its full potential of benefits to aviation unless there are geared with it corresponding improvements of airport facilities.

The importance of this integrated airport problem is high lighted with emphasis and clarity in the report of the Air Coordinating Committee on Air Traffic Control and the National Security, published last December. That report states that under the common system of air-traffic control now coming into being the terminal area traffic capacities per instrument runway will be approximately doubled and that this increased traffic capacity, when compared with anticipated increases in traffic demand, will eliminate the delays, cancellations, and bad weather unreliability that currently cost the airlines alone millions of dollars annually. Military traffic also will be enabled to move into civil airports or civil traffic to operate into military bases with equal ease, since simplified common procedures will be in use.

It is not at all difficult to see what this means with respect to the adequacy of airport facilities on the ground. The stepped-up activity and greater traffic flow potential into the terminal area will shift the bottleneck to the surface of the airport itself, whereas in the past the major bottle neck in the movement of air traffic was in the air because of cumbersome procedures of navigation which made it possible for only a few aircraft to complete approaches and to land at an airport in an hour.

The report of the Air Coordinating Committee finds that even today, with present traffic-control capacity, many of our airports have reached the saturation point and cannot handle the increased traffic which the common system will make possible. Unless the advantages of this improved navigation system are to be nullified in large part, therefore, airport design and development must keep pace and airports must be recognized for what they are—integral parts of the air-traffic-control system.

FEDERAL ROLE AND LOCAL RESPONSIBILITY

Airports, I don't need to tell you, cost money and often the necessary funds for improvements are not easy to come by. This raises directly the question of what are the relative shares and areas of appropriate responsibility for the financing of airports as between the Federal Government and the local sponsors. Is the present arrangement satisfactory, as provided under the Federal Airport Act of 1946, or should there be some shifting or realinement of burdens in one direction or the other? Is there need for a classification of airports which would limit eligibility for Federal assistance to certain categories?

To these important questions I have no pat answer or conclusion, but I do think that it is both possible and desirable to indicate certain existing conditions which have a bearing on those questions. As in so many other ways the requirements of national defense and security must have first consideration with respect to airport developments and their financial support, and for all that we are able to see now this is likely to be so for an indefinitely long period.

I mentioned earlier that under the terms of the 1946 Federal Airport Act no limitations were placed upon the kinds or classes of airports which could be assisted with Federal funds. The Federal Government, under this program, has been providing about 50 percent of the cost of the smaller, as well as the larger, airports. Generally, the airports of class sub-1, class 1, and class 2 are suitable only for private-owner aircraft and small transport planes. Under the airport program launced in 1946 and down to June 30, 1949, such small airport projects accounted for almost one-half of the projects for which grants had been committed, and they accounted for approximately 14 percent of the allotted Federal airport funds.

According to the national airport plan—1950—as projected last year by the Civil Aeronautics Administration for a 3-year period, there were found to be 5,093 locations at which airports should be constructed or improved in order to meet existing or anticipated demands. The estimated costs of this 3-year program were $928,000,000, of which the Federal share would be $445,700,000 and the sponsors' share $482,300,000. Of the 5,093 airport projects covered by this survey, more than 75 percent pertained to class 2 or smaller airports, and they would account for over one-third of the projected Federal expenditures.

It seems more likely now, however, that many of these contemplated smaller airport projects will have to give way on grounds of essentiality to requirements of the national defense, insofar at least as financial assistance from the Federal Government is concerned. Since the 1950 national airport plan was first announced, the Civil Aeronautics Administration has reviewed its entire airport program and has eliminated nearly all of the small projects. The aim now is to concentrate on those larger projects which are most essential from the standpoint of the defense effort in the emergency.[1]

Whether this may represent a permanent shift of emphasis with respect to the scope of Federal airport aid is not yet clear, but it does indicate an awareness that in the present circumstances, at least, Federal funds for airports should not be spread so widely or thinly as to defeat the essential purpose of the Federal Airport Act—to develop a system of airports having real national significance.

There appears to be considerable sentiment favoring such limitation as a matter of permanent Federal policy. This does not mean, of course, that the smaller airports of more localized significance are not important or should not be built. In emergencies, they may, like nearly all of the Nation's facilities and resources, be called upon to serve a defense purpose as well as to provide local community service. It seems true, nevertheless, as the Aviation Development Advisory Committee has well emphasized in its report on America's Civil Air Power, dated August 28, 1950, that many small airports will suffer attrition in the coming years unless these airports have the full support of the communities they serve.

The issue then is where to set the limits of appropriate Federal financial responsibility in terms of the interest of the Nation as a whole. Unless the Federal Government were to assume a greater and greater share of the financial burden of airport development—both large and small and those of more localized as well as national significance, we must continue to rely mainly upon the initiative and financial responsibility of the local community sponsors.

As a final word, I should like to stress the importance of increasing airport revenues in order to realize in greater measure their financial self-support. This objective is of prime importance, it seems to me, with respect to all airports whether large or small, and it is in the real interest not only of the local community sponsors and the Federal taxpayers, but of the airline companies and other users of the airports as well.

Economic Stabilization and the Attitude of Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ESTES KEFAUVER
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Why Does Labor Act That Way?" by Edwin A. Lahey, who has specialized in the field of labor. The editorial appeared in the April issue of Extension magazine.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHY DOES LABOR ACT THAT WAY?
(By Edwin A. Lahey)

(In the present confusion over the wage-price controls, it is difficult for the layman to clearly understand the issues. We have asked Mr. Lahey who, in his long writing career, has specialized in the field of labor, to tell us how things look to him as we go to press.)

Labor leaders have hopped from one crisis to another since the economic-control agencies began to take shape in Washington.

It would be easy to gather the impression, as one reads the crisis bulletins, that labor leaders are screaming for special advantages for their members before the cement sets.

This is far from the truth. As we slip into a controlled economy in this country, an analysis of the basic fears of the labor leaders would seem to be in order.

The protests of A. F. of L., CIO, and independent union leaders against the more popular blueprints for control stem from a real concern for the family welfare of workers in every strata. Only time can tell whether their fears are justified, but the union leaders are apprehensive because they see a long period of economic controls ahead of us, with two grave dangers looming up.

1. That under a rigged waged control, social benefits separate from wage rates will be whittled down, or arrested in their normal development.

2. That under the stress of the mobilization fever, Congress may be stampeded by control officials into passing a universal service act for civilians; which will end voluntary society as we know it.

The restlessness of the labor-union officials is firmly rooted in their own experience. They all served on committees and boards that administered Government controls in World War II. They know on the basis of their own experience that if they were in the seats of the mighty, they could devise a wage-control machine full of loopholes, and a price-control machine with no loopholes.

But labor leaders are not in power. President Truman has vested the vast powers of the National Defense Production Act in the hands of business executives, industrialists, and financiers.

A trade-unionist does not assume that a business executive, an industrialist, or a financier is any less patriotic than himself. Neither does he assume that any of these types is less human than himself.

Consequently, the labor leaders have viewed the whole development of the control agencies with the suspicion that the men in charge were rigging up price-control machinery with loopholes, and wage-control machinery with no loopholes, the opposite of what labor leaders might be tempted to do if they had the vast powers of the Federal administrators.

The first draft of a wage-control rule by the Wage Stabilization Board headed by Cyrus Ching confirmed these suspicions and produced a real revolt, in which the three labor members of the nine-man Board walked out.

The three public members and three industry members of the Wage Stabilization Board had determined, over the running opposition of the labor members, that wage increases of 10 percent above the rates prevailing on January 1, 1950, would be permitted to compensate workers for the increased cost of living.

The Board also voted that "fringe benefits" would be frozen, pending "further study." Meanwhile, any "fringe benefits" would have to come out of the 10 percent general wage increase permitted in the order.

The freeze of "fringe benefits" was the thing that induced the labor revolt.

This term is a misnomer and for this reason the unrest of the labor leaders has not been clearly understood.

A "fringe benefit" is anything outside the basic wage structure. In recent years of collective bargaining, the area of "fringe benefits" has been expanded to new horizons, so that today the "fringe" on the economic rug is very wide and runs all the way around, instead of just at the ends.

Pensions, health, welfare, and hospital plans, paid holidays, vacation time, regional wage differentials—these are some of the vastly important aspirations of labor that come under the innocuous head of "fringe benefits."

If the southern wage differential were eliminated tomorrow, such action would cause an economic earthquake, but it would come under the title of a "fringe benefit."

If the workers in auto and steel negotiated a pension increase to a minimum of $200 per month at 65, it would be a "fringe benefit" of tremendous cost to industry, and a tremendous blessing to older workers.

Similarly, it would be a "fringe benefit" if private industry pensions were "vested." The "vesting" of existing pensions is the next great hurdle for the unions in the mass-production industries. When a worker in a noncontributory pension plan leaves his employment today, he generally leaves his pension rights behind him. When these pension plans are "vested," the payments made by a company into his pension account will remain credited to him when he changes employers.

This specific issue of the pension rights of a worker who shifts employment will soon assume major proportions, as the flow of defense orders brings about the involuntary transfer of many workers from one plant to another.

Quite naturally, labor leaders are not willing to stand by and see this and other "fringe issues" dropped into the deep freeze of economic controls "pending further study."

Labor economists are quite willing to concede that a worker's hourly wage rate should be subject to control in an inflationary period, assuming that there is some relation of wage rates to price movements.

But they will not admit the justice of completely freezing "fringe benefits," or of the suggested method of taking these "fringe benefits" out of an allowable increase in wage rates.

On their behalf, it should be said that it is difficult to see the inflationary effect of slight increases in pension and hospital insurance payments, or an increase in paid holidays or vacation time, such as labor might be able to negotiate in collective bargaining with employers.

The second fear of the labor leaders, over the development of manpower mobilization policies inimical to the family welfare of union members, is perhaps remote, but none the less real.

The A. F. of L., and CIO, and the nonaffiliated unions strongly urged in the beginning of the mobilization effort that Secretary of Labor Tobin remain in charge of all manpower policies, as orginally intended by President Truman.

But, over the vigorous protests of his labor friends, the President reassigned the manpower authority of the National Defense Production Act to Charles E. Wilson, the over-all boss of the mobilization effort, who, it can be reasonably assumed, did not give up his post as president of General Electric until he was assured by Mr. Truman that he would have complete powers to mobilize the industrial and civilian manpower resources of the Nation.

The labor leaders fear not Mr. Wilson, but his manpower advisor, Gen. Lucius Clay, whom they regard as an exponent of universal service idea, a concept that comes naturally to a military man.

The frightened union officials feel that in the black despair of another Pearl Harbor Day, it would take only a suggestion from General Clay to Mr. Wilson and then to Congress to clamp this Nation under the regimentation of universal service, in which men, women, and children would be told when and where to report for work.

Mr. Wilson tried manfully to quiet the apprehension and stem the revolt of the labor leaders in Washington.

While his deputy, Economic Stabilization Director Eric Johnston, sought a way to woo back the labor members of the Wage Stabilization Board, Wilson himself sent a mollifying letter to the United Labor Policy Committee, offering to accept one of their members as his own counsellor in mobilization work, and reminding the labor leaders that the "effective employment of manpower in the mobilization program is not solely a labor problem."

Maybe the labor leaders are seeing things under the bed, we can't say for sure. But as we pointed out in the beginning of this editorial, the labor boys had plenty of experience in economic mobilization in World War II, and ought to be able to recognize a cold deal when they're getting one.

Letter Written by a Marine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NORRIS POULSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, when we hear one story from our Speaker telling us about the imminence of war and, at the same time, in the other body we find Senator CONNALLY stating that war is not likely this year, you can see how we in Congress think that most information is put out for propaganda purposes. The people throughout the country are subject to the same thoughts, and many of us doubt the stories being released from the battle front. Therefore, letters written by the boys to members of their families really give us the best picture of what is going on in Korea.

I am inserting a letter written by a marine to his brother-in-law, which not only gives us an idea of what the boys are thinking but graphically describes what they are going through:

MARINE FIGHTER SQUADRON, April 14, 1951.

DEAR STEW AND BETS: We are all so upset about this MacA. deal we are sick. Hope the American people have the gumption and good sense to do something about it. MacA. is the only leader in the United States in my mind with guts. The only thing in the world the Commies respect is force, and he is the only leader we have who threatens them with it. It is apparent to us out here that this Commie deal is a war to the finish. I'm sure it must be to those in the States—except our State Department people. Why don't the people do something about it? Why should we not utilize the CN troops and why not bomb the Manchurian bases and MSR? They are worrying about getting in an all-out war with China and we are already in one. We are just leaving the time of the knockout blow to the Reds. Their build-up in North Korea is fabulous and in Manchuria it's undoubtedly greater. We could stop it if they'd let us, but they won't. That means they will annihilate us here, or we'll give them everything over a treaty table that our people have suffered and died to protect. During the last 3 weeks the AA has gotten so bad we have had to completely change our tactics. All this build-up could have been prevented if we'd opened up on the Manchurian borders and we have had to sit idly by and watch it happen. Don't believe what you read in the papers. This situation is far worse than our position in the Philippines, etc., in 1941. Certainly our leaders have access to our intelligence reports, and I cannot understand their thinking. I hope MacA. blows the lid off when he hits Uncle Sugar—and I believe he will. I'll stop sounding off. It's just that we all have a very hopeless feeling about the future of our country.

I did some flying while we were in Yokosuka. I took some boys to Itami and we picked up four replacement aircraft. Boy, are they junk heaps. We are flying equipment now, Stew, that you wouldn't fly in the States. Our mechanics and ordnance men are working around the clock to keep our planes in good enough repair to maintain a schedule. They are doing a bang-up job. After we got to Tokyo with our planes we still had a little time to play. Tokyo is really State-side, only cheaper. I had 2 days there and it was really fine. The people stationed there are fat as a goose—scotch and sodas 18 cents at the Australian officers' club, and everything else on the same scale. Seems funny to see automobiles, etc., again. No wonder our occupation forces went to hell. Anyhow, we had a couple first-class parties and everyone was relaxed, hung over, etc., when we pulled out for the zone again. We had been hit very hard the last couple of days of operation prior to going to Tokyo, so everyone was ready. I've virtually been on the wagon out here so far, but most of the boys were on their butts. We went back to our regular operating area on the west coast and only operated 3 days. Boy, the activity had stepped up. We all got shot up—I got shot up two hops of there and we had three planes shot down. Two of the boys were picked up O. K. and our skipper was killed. His plane was hit and he tried to make the coast, but it started burning. He jumped and was picked up later that night by helicopter, but he was dead. It was a great loss to our squadron and to the Marine Corps—he was a wonderful C. O. and we all felt very bad. We had so many planes beat up we couldn't make the flight schedule and we returned to Yosiho. We stayed there 1 day, had the skipper's services and I got drunk along with everyone else in the squadron. The services were over at 1500 and I was aboard ship at 1800 to assume the duty and was loaded enough to be sick all the next day on the way to the east coast. We've been operating with an English carrier and they have a good bunch of boys. They've had some bad luck—lost a pilot a day since we came back out here. The first day we operated out here we had 12 planes shot up out of 30 launched and 1 shot down. Sumner went in the water off of Wonsan and was picked up by a helicopter off a cruiser. When he got aboard he found Jeff Harp (a pilot who was in our squadron before we went carrier-based). He's been picked up the day before for the second time. One boy was hit in the cockpit and had superficial wounds in the back.

We finally decided that the Chinks had successfully countered our tactics to the extent we'd have to change ours. We did change and we've been doing O. K. since—pick up a few holes, but nothing too rough. We are getting a few replacements, but they are just about keeping up with our natural attrition. We've had three boys relieved this month that had been shot down and were through flying for a while, and we've picked up five replacements. They say, however, that there are a couple large replacement drafts coming out the next 2 months, so we are still hoping to get relieved in June. The squadron morale hit a low point a while back, but with encouraging news about relief, it seems to be getting pretty high again. I'll have a hundred missions by the end of this month, so you can see some of the boys are getting sort of tired. I was high man last quarter and I'm not tired, but some of them are.

The only thing that upsets me is I'm afraid we are doing all this for nothing and that Truman and Acheson and the others will give away everything we are fighting for. We've all just been sitting here talking about it and I guess that's why I can't get it out of my mind.

We are getting up at 3:30 a. m. every morning and next cruise we'll probably get up at 3 a. m. I slept all afternoon yesterday and 'til 8 a. m. this morning because we are replenishing this morning. I really feel rested. This carrier life is so much better than land based that every time I feel low I just think about Kimpo, Wonsan, Yonpo, etc., and I feel real good.

Surely miss Janet and the kids. Surely is going to be fun to see them again. Lord but the kids must be growing up. We've got some new 21-year-old replacements that really make us feel old. Let's face it, we aren't getting any younger. Sure hope I can get back to work soon, but I doubt if we'll make it. Surely wish I had a house and was settled in one place, but I guess that's out—probably get tired of it anyway. Janet is happily settled in her house and I'm very happy about that. For the first time in my life I'm anxious to be home and help around the house, etc. I want to take Janet on a nice vacation—nothing fancy, just to get away. Then try and be a little more help around with the house and kids. I've always used all my energies toward my vocation and getting ahead as a breadwinner, but that doesn't seem as important to me anymore. Our lives are fouled up and will probably continue to be fouled up to the extent that long-range planning, etc. is sort of a waste of time I'm afraid.

If we could just get a change in administration I'd feel a lot different. If I had the money I'd feel like being a politician—I guess I sound like one today.

Dorothy and Jack undoubtedly had a nice trip. I hope it wasn't all business with Jack. Just at the time when he should be able to start relaxing a little, it looks as if he will be busier than he's ever been before. We've got a lot of building to do all over the world, and it's going to have to be done pronto. I can't help but worry Janet and kids a little, being in Los Angeles, but I'll be home soon. She has a lot of friends around there and seems to be having a pretty fair time. Clem is about to go into business for himself, and apparently has a pretty good deal set up. He wants me to try and get out of the Marine Corps when I get home to go into it with him. Three of my old bosses have written me offering me jobs, and they all sound swell, but I just wonder what's the use of working my butt off again, just to be called back in the service in a year or two again. If I'd gotten further along in construction I'd be worth more to the country in that capacity, but, unfortunately, the best I can offer them is an aircraft jockey. Life, I guess.

Please pardon the B. S. Sometimes it helps just to blow off a little. We've had a swell cruise, and I haven't a kick in the world. My family's well and happy, and I'll be home soon.

I loved your pictures and letters. Lots of love.

BERT.

Test Comes Now on Asia Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Charles A. Merrill from the Boston Sunday Globe of April 29, 1951:

TEST COMES NOW ON ASIA POLICY—RESULT OF DESPERATE FIGHTING IN KOREA MAY HELP SHAPE UNITED STATES COURSE AS MACARTHUR AND DEFENSE CHIEFS PRESENT VIEWS TO SENATE COMMITTEE

(By Charles A. Merrill)

Gradually the trumult and the shouting dies. The renowned "old soldier" who has come back from the wars may not fade away, but henceforth he will play a more normal role on the American scene, and will be accorded more rational treatment by the public. The mass hysteria honoring the general, so fascinating on the television screen for the millions unable to be present, already seems like a dream dimly etched on our memories. Our attention has shifted back to that corner of the world whence the general flew home to us. TV does not yet reach that far. But the headlines spotlight events in Korea of more importance than the career of any individual. Our seasoned young soldiers on the Asiatic front—our few to whom so many Americans are debtors—together with their UN allies, have again been struggling against a Red tidal wave. Lieutenant General Ridgway, the new supreme commander, warns us that this battle may prove decisive.

If the latest attack by Chinese Communists, shall turn out to be the long-anticipated Red offensive, it could settle the argument here at home over American policy in the Far East.

NO TV DRAMA

As emotion subsides, the issue is being clarified in the public mind. The MacArthur idea is that an effort should be made to end the Korean conflict quickly. He thinks he might have accomplished this if (1) he had been permitted to bomb the Manchurian supply bases; (2) if American planes were dispatched to bombard coastal areas on the Chinese mainland; and (3) if our Government had sent aid and given the go-ahead to Nationalist leader Chiang Kai-shek on Formosa for an attack on Communists in China. This, says the general, plus reinforcements in Korea, might turn the trick. He thinks it improbable that Soviet Russia would involve her forces in retaliation. The administration replies that, quite aside from its determination to keep the civil authorities in control of foreign policy, it considers the MacArthur program too great a risk. Presumably, this is the opinion of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. They do not believe it wise to commit our forces to a full-scale Asiatic war. They hope to limit the Korean conflict. We are playing for time to build up our defenses in Western Europe. Furthermore, have our Allies not made it clear that they will not support any such plan as MacArthur urged? Are we ready alone to take on Red China and Soviet Russia, plus her European satellites?

Within a few days, according to present plans, the conflict of views will be aired before a combined Senate committee. Presumably, General MacArthur will outline his ideas in detail, and answer questions. Defense Secretary Marshall and General Bradley, our top military planners, are expected to follow. Out of the huddle something definite should emerge. The American people should be kept informed on the proceedings. But it is to be hoped that the Senators will not be tempted to stage a full-dress TV drama. This was highly useful in the Kefauver crusade which sought to rouse public opinion against corruption. But histrionics will hardly help our foreign policy makers in framing a defense policy. The committee should be concerned with the past only insofar as it helps illuminate the road ahead. And surely, great caution will be in order for security reasons.

MAN WITH PLAN

The acclaim for General MacArthur, almost as ardent in Chicago and Milwaukee in the past week as it had previously been in Washington and New York, is typically American. He rated it on his record. His long absence from the country added to the glamor. But there was more to it than this. Though the whole episode was made to order for certain political master minds, there has up to the present hour been nothing in the general's conduct to encourage those few reckless followers whose attitude seems to imply: "Who does i' the wars more than his captain can, becomes his captain's captain." In large part, the story seems to be that the appearance of this vivid personality, under rebuke by his superiors, offered an opportunity for a growing public mood of discontent, frustration, uneasiness, and resentment to express itself. Only a few years after the end of World War II, the American people are again in trouble. The casualty lists are coming in. The planning of youth for peacetime careers is once more interrupted. Prices soar, and so do taxes. Worst of all, this time the objective seems obscure, nor does there seem to be any end in sight. A magnetic radio voice or TV personality is lacking to rally the people. Even if there were such it might not prove persuasive in a period when we are neither wholly at peace nor fully at war. To appreciate this, we have only to recall that, even under the vibrant leadership of Franklin Delano Roosevelt, the lower House of Congress fell only one vote short on a motion to empty our training camps a few months before Pearl Harbor. Now, in this hour of perplexity, appears a picturesque figure, experienced in war and postwar maneuvering. He not only has charm. He has a program, and he is articulate.

This may be the explanation of the public reaction to General MacArthur. But it does not supply the answer to the complex problem of security for our country and the preservation of our common heritage, western civilization.

MASS KILLING

It may lift our spirits to remind ourselves of the substantial agreement among us that our quest is for peace. There is little dissent from that. Any other idea, now that science has removed all physical barriers on the earth and placed in the hands of man instruments for mass slaughter, would be sheer madness.

There are many reputable observers who believe that we can avoid an all-out war. Speaking in London, President Conant, of Harvard, though warning that Western Europe must be made defensible as a deterrent to possible rashness in the Kremlin, sees hope, perhaps a decade hence, of disarmament and peace—"a free world secure in its own frontiers, a Soviet with vastly diminished ambitions and pretensions." Mr. Paul Hoffman, former ECA Director, expresses similar views in an article, just published in book form, captioned "Blueprint for peace."

President Truman says the major aim of his administration is to avoid another global war. And though he may differ on the method best calculated to bring peace, General MacArthur himself evidently believes full-scale war would be suicidal. As he reminded Congress, he has not on the record been a warmonger. About a year ago, shortly before the Korean outbreak, the general told C. L. Sulzberger, of the New York Times, in an interview in Tokyo, "The scientists of the world have developed to such an extraordinary degree the processes and ways of accomplishing mass killing that war is no longer rationally a means of settling international problems. Its destruction has become so great that there can be no victor. * * * The public realizes all too well in the terms of the last war that there can be no real victor in a future war. The Russian masses are probably just as opposed to a shooting war as are the people in the western countries.

BIG WARS NOW

We sometimes forget that until relatively modern times, war did not touch the lives of the majority of the people, except in the region where it was fought. In both ancient Rome and medieval Europe, dependence upon citizen soldiers became impractical, and professional armies were raised to fight wars which, measured in modern terms, were restricted. The first compulsory military service law in history was promulgated by leaders of the French Revolution. The Prussian militarists introduced universal peacetime training, and converted Europe into an armed camp. Thus it has remained since 1870, and as we have learned to our sorrow, an explosion over there is a chain reaction from which there is no escape for us.

Wars no longer have their origin in the struggle of capitalist states for markets and sources of raw materials. Civilization has evolved beyond that. Two aggressive, totalitarian revolutions, first the Fascist, now the Communist, the later worldwide, have disturbed the peace.

The western countries—and if the truth were known, probably the people of Soviet Russia, after 16,000,000 casualties in World War II—have no stomach for an atomic conflict. In the first flush of revolutionary triumph, Red Chinese leaders have perhaps indoctrinated their armies with martial fanaticism for Asiatic conquest. But this can hardly be true of mankind generally. If the Russian desertions to the Nazis in the last war mean anything, the Soviet rulers will hesitate to lead their people into another conflict.

The danger signals are up. We cannot ignore them. Another flareup, like the Korean struggle, might spread. But our best chance would seem to be to play for time, to build strength and use it for peace.

Results of the fighting in Korea may well shape our course. If the Red attack is stalled, the hour should be propitious for the UN to find out if the Chinese Reds have had enough. To have checked Communist aggression in that area might prove a turning point in the midcentury struggle to save the peace of the world.

The Navajos' Problem as They See It

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

THE NAVAJOS' PROBLEM AS THEY SEE IT

DEAR FRIEND OF THE NAVAJOS: The following comments and sentiments of the Navajos are given you at the request of their leaders, so you may better understand their feelings, desires, and needs at this time.

Our organization is endeavoring to assist them in their many problems toward the goal of attaining their rightful place in American life and citizenship.

We bespeak your continued interest and assistance in this undertaking.

Very sincerely yours,

NAVAJO ASSISTANCE, INC.,
BERT POUSMA,
Managing Director.

Before we were taken captive by the United States in 1864 we lived on the land which lays between four of our sacred mountains, namely, Mount Taylor, near Grants, N. Mex.; San Francisco Peaks, near Flagstaff, Ariz.; Laplata Mountains, in southwestern Colorado; and Mount Baldy, near Alamosa.

This was a large land and a good land, containing open plains, mountains, valleys, and meadows. There was grass and trees, lakes, springs, streams, and water holes. We had our farms, orchards, sheep, goats, and horses. We had a good living.

About 200 years ago the Spanish came to our country and said that we would have to obey them. Then in 1823 Mexico said they were our boss. In 1846 the United States took our land from the Mexicans and told us we belonged to them. Why these nations, which had so much land of their own, had to fight about our land and take it way from us is hard for us to understand.

When the United States soldiers came, they said we would have to stop fighting and stealing. Most of our people did not believe we had to obey these strangers so kept on doing the same as they did before. Then the soldiers burned our fields and orchards and killed our animals. When we finally didn't have anything to eat, we were forced to bring our women and children to the white man's fort, so that we wouldn't starve. That was in the spring of 1864.

Then they took all our people on a long march of about 400 miles from our homeland to Fort Sumner, N. Mex. Our women, children, and old people suffered much on the way, and we all reached Fort Sumner practically naked. We were hungry and cold, tired and sick.

While we were in exile at Fort Sumner, Washington appropriated $100,000 for our relief, but we didn't get much relief. Some of our white friends heard about this and there was an investigation. This revealed that we were given only $30,000 of relief supplies, and that some bad white men got away with $70,000. We realized that dishonest people were taking things that were intended for us. Sometimes they would walk us around a building and count us twice, so they would get more supplies for us, but we didn't get it. Then we tried to fool them by raising the number of persons shown on our ration tickets so our families could get enough to eat, but they found out about it and made different kind of ration tickets that we couldn't change.

We had old tents to live in. There wasn't enough wood to keep us warm, and, because we didn't have enough blankets or clothes, we suffered from the cold. However, we worked hard and willingly did what we were told to do, constructing buildings, unloading freight, and so forth. The soldiers and officers reported that we were very good workmen.

In our homeland we were used to a roving life, but at Fort Sumner they made us live in 12 small villages and work on little farms. The bad water and poison weeds killed our livestock. The water also made us sick. Dry weather and bugs killed our crops. Many people died.

We were hungry, sick, weak, and discouraged, and then a worse thing happened. In the winter of 1866–67 smallpox came and killed many of our people. The dead were quickly buried, but the graves were not made deep enough. We saw coyotes come and dig up the bodies of our loved ones, and we were too sick and weak to do anything about it. We believe the coyote brings evil. That made us feel doubly unhappy and afraid. We wanted to get away from that place. Many of our people escaped and went back to our homeland. Some of our girls, in order to get enough to eat and warm clothing, ran away to little towns and lived with white men or Mexicans. We longed for our homeland where we could keep our families together and provide food and clothing for them.

We begged for permission to go back to our own country. We were willing to agree to anything, just so they would allow us to leave that awful place where everything went wrong during the 4 years that we were compelled to stay there.

Then in 1868, a treaty was made. We were permitted to leave Fort Sumner, but not yet permitted to go to our former homes. We were instructed to go to Fort Wingate (near Gallup, N. Mex.).

After the long walk from Fort Sumner to Fort Wingate, we were again naked and hungry, but they didn't give us enough to eat. The treaty authorized purchase of 500 beef cattle and 1,000,000 pounds of corn for our sustenance in the winter of 1868–69. Some of that cattle and corn was not given to us. We never got enough food and clothing. We ate prairie dogs, rats, and field mice, roots, wild plants, seeds, and tree bark.

When it became too crowded at Fort Wingate, they took some of our people to Fort Defiance, Ariz., but we weren't yet permitted to go to our former homes. We had to loaf around and wait for the 15,000 sheep and goats which the treaty said we would receive, but which were late in coming.

The animals finally came in the winter of 1869–70. We were given about three sheep for each member of the family, also some seed and a few tools. We were sure glad to get them. Now we could leave and go to work. We took good care of the sheep and goats. We worked hard and did all we could to eke out a living so that the Government wouldn't have to help us. In 1887 an investigator said that $700,000 was due our people for appropriations made by Congress for implements, seed, and stock, which we never received.

Our sheep and goats increased. Our people increased. We soon realized that we needed more land for our animals and that we were shut out from most of the land that we had before we were taken into exile. The best of our old streams, springs, and lakes were excluded. We needed all the land and water back again that was our homeland between our four sacred mountains.

As early as 1875 some of our head men went to Washington and pleaded for more land for our people. We did not understand that the treaty cut us down to such a small area.

In 1886, when the Apache Indians were on the warpath and the United States soldiers had difficulty in subduing them, our people were asked to help. While Indian troops were being formed, our chiefs met with the commanding officer. They said: "We are willing to help you. Our men will go to fight for you. They will leave their homes and loved ones. They will leave their people. They may not come back. They would like to have their children provided for by giving them our old homeland east of here that was taken from us. That is the heart of our country. That is where our heart is. That is what our children should have." The commanding officer replied: "We will do that." But that promise was not kept, and our children still have no land.

Small parts of our original homeland were given to us from time to time, but not nearly enough for our increasing people and animals. Some of our land was taken for the railroad. They were given a lot of land on both sides of the track which was built in the early 1880's. They leased that land to white cattlemen, and we were chased off. White and Mexican homesteaders came on our land, threatened us with guns and burned our hogans. Our best farm land is now occupied by white men and Mexicans. Our best grazing land is now controlled by white cattlemen. The good things were taken away from us, and evil brought into our country by bootleggers, gamblers, and prostitutes. We obeyed the treaty in not harming others, but no protection was given us against others harming us. We were commanded not to scalp anyone, but it seemed that no one cared if outsiders came in and skinned us alive.

In spite of disappointments, we did the best we could with what land and water we were allowed, and increased our sheep from 3 per person to an average of over 30 per person. It takes 50 per person to make a decent living, such as the white people call a minimum living standard. We had visions of the time when we would reach that standard and could afford a house, proper food, and clothing, and all the other things we saw the white people have, and which we wanted for our wives and children, to make them well and happy.

But then, just when we were getting along pretty good, the Government said there was too much sand from our reservation going into the Colorado River, and would fill up Hoover Dam. We said, "Give us more land and water like we have been asking for. Give us back all of our old homeland. Then there will not be 'soil erosion from overgrazing.'" But they would not do that. Instead of giving us more land and water, they came to our homes and first took away our goats, which we needed for milk for our children and for meat to eat. Then they kept on cutting and cutting our goats and horses and sheep until we now have an average of only about seven per person. Many families have none at all.

When this treaty was made in 1868, the Government told us: "Take good care of your sheep. Then they will increase, and sometime in the future you will have enough to take good care of your families." We did just what they told us, but then, when we were getting enough sheep to take care of our families, they made us get rid of them. It made us angry and discouraged for them to treat us like that. We hadn't done anything wrong. We obeyed the treaty. We followed their instructions. We worked hard and saved. Sheep are our heart. They are our life. They took our heart out of us. They took our life away from us. We were helpless, disillusioned, and discouraged. Hunger and sickness increased. Many of our people, especially the babies and little children, died. Tuberculosis increased rapidly on account of undernourishment.

The Government said they would give us plenty of work on the reservation that would more than offset our loss of income from the sheep. They made flowery promises of giving us work building schools, dams, wells, and irrigation projects. But those promises were not fulfilled. Some families had to eat the few sheep they had left and were then dependent upon relatives. Mothers, too sick or weak to bear more children, died and left many orphans.

The Government said they would give our needy people relief but, even though there were thousands needing help, they gave small checks and a few supplies to only a small number. The relief supplies lasted only a few days, and sometimes they skipped a month or two. Then the needy were again dependent upon their relatives and friends and consequently all were undernourished, as there was not enough to go around.

Three thousand six hundred of our boys were in the Second World War. They were good soldiers. Their families received allotment checks and could buy baby food, canned milk, and other necessities for their babies and small children, but when the war stopped and they didn't get those checks any more the children had to go back to their old poor diet, and many are undernourished and sickly. More than half of our children die before they reach school age.

Our people need assistance. What we would like best of all is the fulfillment of promises made us. Then we would have more land and water, so that we could have more sheep and goats and farms. Now, instead of that, we are compelled to leave our homeland to go to work in beet and vegetable fields and on railroads far away from home and kin. We appreciate the efforts to help us get work, but they do not seem to realize that this is breaking up our families, as in many cases we cannot take our little children along; also crippled and sick and old and blind persons, who need our help, must be left behind. The railroads will not take families, so fathers must leave home for months. Sometimes the wife or baby dies, and he does not know about it until he comes home many days later. Many of our men who go away to work are taught bad things by the white, black, and Mexican men and women, who take advantage of their innocence and ignorance. As a result, disease and drunkenness is increasing. Some of our girls working far from home are learning to lead bad lives. When the fathers are away for a long time the mothers, children, sick and aged are not properly protected and cared for. The off-reservation work is seasonal and menial, and there is no future for us in that class of work. The breaking of families is contrary to all American and religious principles. It is having a very serious effect upon our children as well as the parents, and especially upon the older unmarried boys and girls.

We need the kind of work that will make it possible for us to keep our families together and support them, have a decent home for them to live, dress our children properly when they go to school, buy proper food for our babies and little children, take care of the sick and crippled and old people, become respected American citizens. When they decreased our sheep, they promised us much work, building schools, roads, irrigation projects, dams and wells, and thus providing those desirable improvements which we so badly need. Those betterments will make it possible for us to again become self-supporting. Although their cost might be considered high, it is only a small percentage of the value of the land and the income which was taken from us.

We need education. In the treaty of 1868 the Government promised us a school and teacher for every 30 children of school age, but today there is school room for only 8,000 of the 24,000 children of school age. Sixteen thousand of our children cannot go to school. As there is not enough good land for them to make a living on the reservation, and as they are not being given an education so that they can take care of themselves off the reservation, what will become of them?

In 1933 the Government promised, in addition to improving the seven boarding schools in existence at that time, to build seventy community-day schools with laundries and shower rooms, a doctor and nurse, and agents who would be ready to help us in our many problems. That made us very happy, as we wanted our children to be given an education without being sent far away from home and kin. We also needed the health and home-making services promised. But it was just another promise that was not fulfilled. At present we have a total of 60 schools, of which 9 are closed, and several others cut to 1-room capacity. Actually we are getting less than half of the school benefits promised, and the doctors, nurses, and agents promised have not been provided.

The schools are not operated for full term. Reservation schools are kept closed until off-reservation schools are sent their quota, and are closed before the school season ends. We would like to have all our own schools filled to capacity and operated full term before sending our children hundreds of miles away from home. Many parents wonder whether it isn't useless to give their children the present irreguar education. We see public schools and mission schools on and adjoining our reservation where children are given full-term standard course of education, and cannot understand why this is denied our children in Government schools.

We need hospitals. Sickness and death rate is extremely high on our reservation, but six of our hospitals are closed and others not fully utilized. All the hospitals should be opened and operated to full capacity. More hospitals are badly needed; also tuberculosis sanitaria.

We need doctors and nurses who have our health and welfare at heart. There is never enough medical help to take care of our sick people. For many years we have been asking that our girls be given nurses' training in Navajo service hospitals. Then we would have our own nurses. But this request was not granted and now the need is more acute than ever, and our people suffer.

We need homes. There is much sickness and suffering on the reservation because our people can afford only log and mud hogans to live in. We would like to improve our living quarters for the health and welfare of our wives and children.

We need water wells. In many cases we must haul water in barrels on wagons many miles, from unsanitary sources.

We need dams and irrigation projects. Good farm land was taken away from us, and, as it is apparent that it will not be returned to us, the best possible use should be developed on what we have. Besides the many desirable small projects, there is a large San Juan River project which would give work to thousands of people and bring lasting benefits to our country. We hope Congress will appropriate the money for these improvements as soon as possible.

We need police protection. For years we have been pleading for law and order on our reservation; also for protection against unscrupulous outsiders. Bootleggers, gamblers, prostitutes, and other evil persons take advantage of the ignorance and innocence of our people, but very little protection is afforded us either on or off the reservation. We may not defend ourselves as we are treaty-bound never to do white men any harm.

We need the advice, encouragement, and assistance of all who have our welfare at heart. So many promises have been made and broken that we don't know who or what to believe. We need true friends who try to understand our condition and will help us to help ourselves.

We greatly appreciate all the fine assistance given us by our friends over the country and hope that you will continue to help us until we reach the goal of finally providing for our children the opportunities and privileges which we so ardently crave for them.

New York State Bar Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. LEONARD W. HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. LEONARD W. HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me, I include for the RECORD a summary of the report of the committee on Federal legislation of the New York State Bar Association, adopted at its seventy-fourth annual meeting, January 26, 27, 1951, as follows:

SUMMARY OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON FEDERAL LEGISLATION

To the New York State Bar Association:

Said Huey Long: "When fascism comes to this country it will come disguised as anti-fascism."

Instead of fascism, socialism has been creeping up on us under various names and guises. It is being administered to us in small sugar-coated doses. It is always camouflaged as being something for the "public welfare." The result has very aptly been called socialism by default.

Former President Herbert Hoover says we are now on the "last mile" toward complete socialism in America.

This report will deal mainly with just one camouflaged proposal that is before the Congress, seeking to socialize medicine in our country. It has become the fashion in Washington never to call a measure by its true name. Ugly things are given pretty names to catch the votes of the unwary.

Now, the regimentation of the great medical profession in America (and let us not forget that we are next on the program) the extension of the clammy hand of Federal bureaucracy into every sick room in this Republic, most certainly is a major step in the direction of the Socialist state as they have it in England; and most certainly is an ugly thing and a vicious thing. Yet, one of its sponsors calls it a health measure and a Congressman calls it health insurance. One may well wonder whose political health they are trying to insure at the expense of the public.

Now let us take off the mask camouflaging this measure so that we may see it for what it really is.

In order that we may recognize the measure as socialistic we should define socialism. According to Karl Marx, socialism, very briefly and simply put, is government management or ownership of a nation's economics and the refusal by the government to the individual the right to manage his own affairs. Socialists, Communists, and fellow travelers always think in terms of compulsion. They abhor the American brand of constitutional liberty.

So now they want to impose upon us, through this measure before Congress, compulsory medical insurance.

At the very outset let us analyze the so-called reasons given by them for this proposed measure. Only then we shall see how unfounded and shallow these "reasons" are;

and if the reasons advanced for the proposed legislation fail, then the proposed legislation fails with them.

It seems that suddenly the state of the Nation's health becomes a matter of grave concern to the authors of the measure. Is there really an emergency confronting us? How serious is the condition of the Nation's health that it should evoke such drastic socializing of medicine and the medical profession? Let us see.

The Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.'s statistical bureau is one of the most authoritative sources of information on the Nation's health. We are going to let the bulletin issued by the bureau answer these questions.

Four of the most common and dangerous diseases that afflict children are whooping cough, measles, scarlet fever, and diphtheria. The bulletin gives us two comparable 5-year periods, 1931–35 and 1944–48, both years inclusive. How eloquently they speak for free medicine.

During that period whooping cough declined 77 percent, scarlet fever dropped 92 percent, and diphtheria and measles fell 73 percent. Says Dr. Williford T. King, economics professor emeritus of New York University:

"That is, in the last 5 years the chances that your child might die from one of these ailments was only one-fifth as great as in the first half of the 1930's. Does this marvelous improvement show that there is something radically wrong with the existing medical system?"

Now, let us see what has happened to expectancy of life of the new-born babe. Fifty years ago the average expectancy of life of a baby girl was 51 years; a baby girl born now has a life expectancy of 70 years.

To the contention that the poorer elements have not received the benefits in health improvement as have the more well to do groups, that being the main argument for socialized medicine, the bulletin gives a still more eloquent answer. It shows that while 50 years ago a colored girl baby's expectancy of life was 35 years, in 1946 it was 61 years. Here it may be pointed out that the colored baby's gain in expectancy was 7 years more than that of her white sister. Such are the disadvantages to the poor under private medicine.

But they say that the poorer States do not have good medical care as the larger States. As that great American, Al Smith, used to say: "Let us look at the record."

The poorest State in the country probably is Mississippi and the richest is New York. Government figures show that the death rate in Mississippi in 1919 was 12.3 but it declined to 9.2 in 1946, a drop of 3.1 points. During the same period the death rate in New York dropped from 13.9 to 11.1, a decline of only 2.8 points. Much less than the decline in the poorest State in the Union.

But, one may ask, by what process of reasoning does one conclude that socialized, political, bureaucratic medicine can serve the people more efficiently than private medicine, spark-plugged by private enterprise.

The experience of 5,000 years of human history is against this contention. So is the experience of England. Sir William Y. Darling, a member of the Parliament of Great Britain, while in this country, warned us against the socialism of England. I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

"Some of the nostrums of my home country have been freely discussed, and some have been practiced in the United States here and in Canada, and elsewhere. They are to the effect that the State can do something better for you than you can do it for yourself.

"Before I go back to my country with its shilling's worth of meat a week, its declining standards of life, its business desperately entangled, please let me tell you, my friends in the United States and Canada, that the road Great Britain is traveling is the road you should not travel. The experience is not worth while. It is a road which has led to the degradation and lowering of our human standards in which you and we believe.

"There is an old saying that few people in the world can learn anything except from their own experience. It is hoped that the American people will learn from this experience without having to pass through a similar ordeal."

Now, let us take a glance at what this so-called health measure bill is proposing to do.

It is not insurance in the real meaning of the word. It proposes a new tax to support a Government regulated and politically controlled medical system, with doctors, dentists, nurses, drugs, hospitals, and, last but not least, patients, goose-stepping under it. This vast Bureau will collect the tax, control the money, set the rules, determine the nature, quality, and quantity of medical services, direct doctor and patient participation, thus dominating every citizen's medical affairs, even the most intimate doctor-patient relationships. Whether one needs or even gets medical care or not will depend entirely upon the whim or pleasure of some bureaucrat. Thus the American people are not even having their cherished privacy in the matter of their medical affairs, with the local administrative boards, patterned after the British system, in possession of all the records. Recently the British Housewives League protested bitterly the resulting local gossip over family medical records. Do the American people want that sort of thing in America?

Nor is this thing new. It is an importation from Europe. Most certainly, it is not native to America. The original author of the bill, Senator Wagner, was still a child in Germany when Prince Von Bismarck originated the thing which the social planners are pleased to call "health insurance." But the great Iron Chancelor of Germany was more frank about it. He said it was a method of subduing the people, so he called it a golden chain around the necks of the workers. Look at the German worker today. He gave up liberty for the promise of security. Now he has neither. The Italian and Russian workers have had the same experience. We are also beginning to hear the rumbling from the workers of England.

It was Benjamin Franklin who said that "those who give up essential liberties to gain temporary security deserve neither liberty nor security." Here we may add that history shows that they invariably get neither.

This compulsory health insurance measure will put the "golden chain" (fool's gold) of Bismarck around the necks of the workers of America.

We doubt very much that the American people want to go à la Bismarck. However that may be, one thing is certain: It is a cruel fraud upon the people to attempt to put over this costly socialistic cradle-to-the-grave scheme at a time when they are too preoccupied to look at the price tag, both in treasure and loss of liberty—especially when the Nation is already burdened with an indebtedness and incurred obligations, direct or indirect, of over $300,000,000,000.

In private voluntary insurance companies the worker can obtain real health insurance at much less cost and at the same time remain free. If at any time he wants to cancel it, he can. But he cannot cancel this cradle-to-the-grave insurance. Like all socialistic schemes, it is compulsory. It is here where he exchanges his liberties for the mere promise of security. He gives up his liberty to spend his money as he sees fit. Under this measure, he will give to the politicians a lifetime check-off on his pay envelope. They will control the moneys which he otherwise would have used for medical care, and with this control will come the inevitable graft, followed by third-rate medical service. Not only that, but he will lose the right to choose his own family physician. Some politician will do that for him. That is the record.

Also note this: The great insurance companies of America weathered the last depression just about 99 percent. This in contrast with about 3,000 municipalities and 1 State that defaulted on their government obligations. Even Uncle Sam repudiated his solemn obligation to pay his creditors in gold. Says former Congressman Sam Pettingill:

"If the worker goes in for this womb-to-the-tomb insurance, he not only handcuffs himself for the rest of his life; he doesn't even leave his boy or girl a free choice. They, too, when they begin to work, will have to cough over to the State. The worker of today would vote Government check-off against the bread and butter of his unborn children at a time when conditions may have totally changed."

Besides the destruction of personal liberty the material cost of the measure will be staggering.

The best estimates of tax economists range from 5 to 15 billion dollars. No one knows exactly. Its sponsors say they do not know. It is a step in the dark. Only a babe in arms would want to go in the dark, especially in matters of expenditures.

Tax estimates range from 6 percent to 10 percent on every pay check up to $4,800.00, half paid by the employee and half by the employer. The self-employed would pay the whole amount. Here is exorbitantly high price for low quality medical service. For instance, no American would tolerate the low quality of medical service available to the average Englishman under compulsory health insurance. Yet, the British system went in the red over $200,000,000 in 9 months of operation. It will take many millions in new taxes, not only in Britain but also here in America, to make up the deficit. For let us not forget that the American taxpayers have been underwriting socialistic England since its inception.

Statistics show that it would require 1,500,000 clerks, bookkeepers, administrators, collectors, and so forth, on the Federal payrolls to administer compulsory insurance. What a waste of medical dollars.

There is no need for this waste. Over 55,000,000 Americans now have voluntary health insurance in private insurance companies and organizations such as the Blue Cross plan. This guaranteed medical, surgical, and hospital care costs about on the average of $2.50 a month for the individual and $5.50 for a family, irrespective of size.

Thus the evidence is clear that compulsory insurance proposal is economically unsound in that it entails staggering burdens financially, politically vicious in its implication of regimentation of the most intimate personal affairs of the citizen and replete with freedom-destroying potentialities. What then, is the real objective of this socialized medical program, especially since our great insurance companies are well able to supply all needed insurance? We shall let Mr. King tell it:

"Clearly the aim is the same as that of communistic programs everywhere. Namely, to make the diligent and the competent pay for the care of the lazy and shiftless. The thrifty, efficient, hard-working man who has about two children and earns $5,000 per year, is asked to pay into the health fund twice as much as his happy-go-lucky, ne'er-do-well neighbor who has six children and earns only $2,500 per year. This is the crux of the whole matter. The proposed program is the very antithesis of the basic principle of a free society—namely that every tub should stand on its own bottom. It is obvious Marxism in a new disguise."

The whole social-insurance scheme is based upon the morally indefensible Socialist theory that individuals are entitled to things that they themselves have not earned and on the politically vicious expedient which teaches that society owes everyone a comfortable living whether or not he repays society by doing his fair share of the world's work.

The American people should get clear in their thinking one simple truth: That a social planner in Washington does not in any way differ from one in Moscow or London. They are Socialists at heart and therefore enemies of the basic liberties of man.

Have the opponents of this socialistic measure an American program more efficient? They have. Exactly as owners of cars once proved negligent are required to take accident insurance, the American plan is to require health-insurance policies in a similar way. We shall again let Mr. King explain it:

"Since President Truman and the American Medical Association agree on objectives it is a pity that they do not unite to back the most logical and least expensive procedure for assuring that everyone will be properly protected, and that the ne'er-do-wells will not be allowed to sponge their care from the diligent. Let Government require every income recipient to purchase from one of the numerous private organizations in the field a policy giving himself and dependents adequate coverage. Let it be the function of Government to see that premiums are paid when due—when necessary compelling deductions from wages and salaries—and let Government stop there. This program would call for no elaborate new machinery, would interfere but little with individual freedom, and would preserve American competitive enterprise. When this road is open, why take the trail running down into the co-collectivist bog?"

If the supporters of this bill were really sincere in their concern for the "little fellow" as they say they are, here is a real program which will not cost the taxpayers a penny. Under the pretense of doing him good they are taxing him to death. The real picture shows that the Federal Government is making this little fellow, the small man, smaller every day. To quote the words of Hon. James F. Byrnes, former Supreme Court Justice and Secretary of State.

"If the 'little fellow' sends a message by telephone or telegraph he pays a tax. If he travels by railroad or bus he pays a tax. If he buys an automobile, the sale price includes a tax. When he buys gasoline or oil he pays a tax. If he buys cigarettes, he pays a tax. If he goes to a football game or baseball game, he pays a tax. If his wife buys a pocketbook or cosmetics, she pays a tax, and if his children go to a movie, they pay a tax.

"The average working man must work 47 days a year to earn the money necesasry to pay his taxes to the Federal Government. That is almost 1 day out of every week. If the new programs now seriously proposed should be adopted he will have to pay in taxes the equivalent of his wages for an additional 20 days, making 67 days he will work each year for the Government instead of for himself and his family. That is what the Federal Government is doing to the little fellow.

"If the spenders really want to help the little fellow, they should allow him to keep more of the money he gets for his labor to spend as he pleases, instead of having it taken from him and sent to Washington, to let bureaucrats spend as they think it should please him.

"Men intoxicated with power will never voluntarily surrender the power to spend the money of other people. Human nature does not change. The Government will not repeal a single war tax now being collected unless forced to do so by public sentiment."

This is what the social planners in Washington are doing to the little fellow. Will the little fellow ever wake up?

There is something else they are doing to the little fellow. Let us quote their patron saint, whose doctrines they are following, as to the inevitable result of the policy of taxation sponsored by them. Said Karl Marx:

"There is only one way to kill capitalism * * * by taxes, taxes, and more taxes."

Can it be possible that these social planners may, after all, be deliberate in their taxing policies? Perish the thought.

Your committee feels this fight for liberty is peculiarly the function of the bar. Former President Holman, of the American Bar Association, recently subscribed to the same view. He said:

"No movement in the history of the world for the improvement of man's conditions and the establishment of justice among men has ever succeeded without the influence and leadership of great and courageous lawyers. Yet lawyers generally are likely to devote themselves to the championship of individual freedoms and private rights and are not inclined to act together against trends in law and government, which actually imperil individual liberty and private rights. They often fear that group action on their part may be interpreted as political—as taking a position for or against a program of a particular political party."

Your committee has no such fears and in this fight it is simply standing by the philosophy stated by Theodore Roosevelt:

"There is no sport in life so rewarding as a hard fight for the right."

In closing may we leave this one thought with you. The question before us transcends in importance every other question now before the American people. It is the question of liberty. It is a challenge to the bar to summon the people to again hear and heed the thundering voice of Patrick Henry that there is something much sweeter and infinitely more important than life itself, that there is something much dearer and more fundamental than peace, and may we add, there is something much safer than security, and that something is liberty. The liberty of the individual, as a citizen of a free country and a free child of the eternal God.

It is therefore recommended that the New York State Bar Association adopt the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the New York State Bar Association hereby approves and adopts the report of its committee on Federal legislation; it is further

"Resolved, That the proposal of socialized medicine would be destructive of the essential liberties of the American people and should be defeated; it is further

"Resolved, That the officers of this association, its executive committee, its committee on Federal legislation or any subcommittee thereof, be and they hereby are authorized on behalf of the association to do and cause to be done all things necessary or appropriate in pursuance of these resolutions.

Respectfully submitted.

RICHARD MARLOWE,
Chairman.

What Should Our Message Be?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES R. HOWELL
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I want to call to the attention of all Members of Congress and all policy makers in our Government who are directly or indirectly affiliated with the United States information and educational programs, the following statement, "What Should Our Message Be?"

This statement, which was prepared by several leading social scientists, consists of notes on a positive program for United States Information Services abroad. In my opinion, this statement represents one of the clearest, most concise, and constructive analyses of our propaganda problem that has ever been written.

As such, it deserves the special attention of Congress and all public officials:

WHAT SHOULD OUR MESSAGE BE?

INTRODUCTORY NOTE

The purpose of this memorandum is to help policy makers and those responsible for United States information and educational programs, both domestic and foreign, to clarify the fundamental, long-range goals of their programs, to specify our positive purposes, and thus to have some consistent basis for our day-to-day activities.

While we believe that improved facilities for getting this country's message to the people of the world are badly needed, we believe it is even more important to be clear as to what this message should be. It must, among other things, be so designed that it will put the Soviets on the defensive. It must also ring with a practical idealism.

In preparing this memorandum, we have tried to take into account the most modern scientific interpretation of "human nature," the philosophical basis of communism, the current Soviet practices, and the full implications of democracy as a concept to which this country subscribes.

The statement here puts the problem of what our message should be in general terms. Obviously the specific context to be used in different cultures and with different population groups at different times should be worked out with area specialists and could, as suggested in the strategy notes at the end, be guided by protests of various appeals.

A. WHAT IS THE REAL DANGER TODAY?

Today, more than at any other time in the world's history, the most important thing in the world is in danger—the human being, you, us—whoever you are, wherever you may live.

Men and women everywhere are threatened by conditions which make it difficult or impossible to work out their own destiny.

The threats to human beings assume various forms in different parts of the world; millions of people, especially in Asia, are faced with the age-old problems of survival which they are eager to solve—the problems of food, shelter, clothing, and prevention of disease. Millions of people are thwarted in their struggles for self-improvement; attaining higher standards for living from the soil, the forests, the mines, the shops, and factories; reducing illiteracy; wiping out corruption and exploitation; attaining a greater participation in social and political life.

Men and women everywhere are being denied the chance to develop as human beings should develop. People don't want to be pushed around like toy soldiers. Man is a living, human, joyful, and suffering being. He has his own problems, and he solves them in his own way.

Men know they are not equal, but they believe they deserve equal consideration. They deserve the right to be different, the right to be themselves. These are fundamental, inalienable rights that are biologically determined, not mere political slogans.

Human beings have the capacity to choose. The opportunity to exercise this capacity of choice characteristic of man cannot be denied him without violating his very nature. This inviolable freedom of personality is the foundation for the structure of individual rights and social obligations.

Furthermore, we know that human beings are value seeking. Men strive for order and dignity, for worth and goodness, for beauty and truth. While none of us ever has or ever will see these values, they are still more real to us in our experience than the things we do see. They constitute our most gratifying experiences. The basic asset of values is that you can take them with you. And it is characteristic of man that he is never satisfied with his lot, that he has the capacity and the desire to emerge to higher, more satisfying levels of choice and experience.

What is in danger today is not only man's physical survival but the hopes and aspirations of men in all parts of the world. Their plans and dreams of a better life are in danger, their chances of attaining greater security, their chance to participate in directing their own destiny, their opportunity to develop according to their own talents and interests. The meaning of life is going to pieces.

In short, what is in danger is the concept of man. Our goal should be to uphold the integrity of the human being at any cost. For the human being is the building stone cast away by some of the architects of our time. Yet human beings are the very cornerstone of a well-founded structure of humanity.

B. WHY IS MAN IN DANGER?

A new and powerful enemy is out to destroy the dignity of man, to destroy those values of man's spirit that make him human.

Here are a few of the basic tenets of communism and some of the practices of the present Soviet regime which we must keep in mind as targets.

1. The individual is not important. The human being like you, like us, just isn't important at all in the mind of our new enemy. The human being's choices are restricted, someone is spying on him from morning till night. If he is suspected of having an idea of his own, he is likely to be torn from his home, never to return.

In those areas of the world dominated by the Soviet regime, we find men living under a system which is frozen in a set of words they are forced to believe. The Soviet regime claims that its system is dynamic. In reality it is static, stifling real change and progress. This system is ruthlessly on the defensive, afraid of its own people unless they all fit the same mold, unless they all sell their souls to the state and its rulers. The Soviet regime is afraid to let its people believe in God.

Under this regime no differences of opinion are tolerated. Any person, any idea contrary to those of the regime must be exterminated. There is no compromise, no pity, and any means are used to achieve the fixed and invariable ideas of the ruler.

This Soviet regime has created a fiction of the mass man. People are turned into groups or social molecules whose shape is determined by their number. The life of the individual in all its manifestations is subordinated to a low common denominator of a class interest.

This mass man is mechanically united only by external interests with all others. Because the inner life of man is so infinitely differentiated, it is merely a stumbling block for the realization of mass man. In order to turn individual man into mass man, it is imperative to exterminate the individual soul, the individual personality, which is the root of the unique human being. For the mass man needs no personal thought, no personal feelings, no personal judgments.

Hence man is called upon by the Soviets to give up his individuality so that he can be turned into a spare part, an interchangeable screw, a "social machine." The supreme goal is a purely quantitative combination of mass particles, a mechanized world which is to contain nothing but soulless machines obedient to the will of a few. Man is simply a number in a mass of statistics.

But we know it is a travesty of human life to regard man as an automaton. It is scientifically wrong. Modern astrophysics and physics, with giant telescopes and ultramicroscopes, have discovered that from the biggest star to the smallest atom every particle that constitutes matter has an individuality of its own. Modern biologists and physiologists have proved that each living cell leads its own individual self-centered life, that the principle of individuation is the basic trait in organic nature.

Since the mass man created by the Soviet regime cannot tolerate individuality, a whole system of devices has been created to destroy individuality. What is labeled "justice" is secret and arbitrary. There is a network of political espionage, even high officials and the commissars of the people are kept under constant observation.

In every respect the secret police of the Soviet regime constitutes a continuation of the last relics of medieval despotism. It is difficult for those who live in a free society to understand what this means, sometimes even to believe it. Some honest progressives who know nothing of Soviet conditions or Soviet politics may still hail Communism as a gospel of salvation containing a promise of a freer and better future for mankind. Such people must remember that Soviet citizens are not even allowed to ask what their efforts are for, are not allowed to ask why this or that policy is imperative.

2. The concept of materialism: The present Soviet regime is putting into practice the idea of Marx that material conditions completely determine man's ideas, beliefs, and hopes. Ideas are viewed only as reflections of what is outside man himself. Thus human life becomes a mechanical process, in turn determined by the mechanical processes of economic life. For the Marxists and the present Soviet regime, all science, art, religion, and ethics are forced to obey the law of economics.

All of this is scientifically outmoded, is old fashioned in terms of modern scientific knowledge. For modern science in all fields—in physics, in chemistry, astrophysics, psychology, biology—agrees that the individual organism does not follow mechanical laws blindly but seems to play an active role in shaping its own destiny. Modern science regards materialism as an outmoded superstition. The Soviet regime denies the fact of individual creativeness which all modern science confirms.

3. Destruction as a method: The present Soviet regime believes that any means or methods are good if they accomplish the ends the regime has in view. This separation of means and ends can only be justified in a society if the individual human being is not taken into account. For if the individual personality is taken into account, if we ask what life is for, then our means and ends are inseparable, are a part of each other, and no means are justifiable which thwart the development of personality and the attainment of human values. Only by leaving out the welfare of the human being can the means of destruction be justified.

The present Soviet regime follows Marx' dictum that "the hope of the spirit is its alliance with violence." To be sure, violence and destruction are always excused by appealing to some higher principles. Class warfare is a fundamental law. Enemies must be ruthlessly annihilated. Individuals must be destroyed if there is even the slightest suspicion that they will not follow blindly the regime's demands.

This tyranny of destruction is maintained at a high level in all those vast areas of the world which our new enemy now controls. Tyranny is enforced with the most modern weapons so that a mere handful of people can keep millions of other human beings under complete subjugation and terror.

Such is the doctrine of destruction. But we know from the history of revolutions that they destroy one set of static ideas only to replace them with other static ideas. We know from modern biological research that if we try to change the course of genetic development by force, we do not get constructive changes which lead to a new higher order species, but we get, rather, freaks and misfits.

Both history and science show that if we completely destroy existing forms of cellular or social life, we destroy the possibility of flowing in any direction. We destroy our base line.

The arbitrary destruction of any class of individuals, of original or deviating personalities, destroys along with it the possibility of more rapid advancement for all people.

4. The new Soviet imperialism: During the last hundred years, nationalism has gained a powerful place in the ideas of man. The idea of nationalism has become almost a religion. The Soviet regime is exploiting the national self-interest of people to lure them into its own sphere of influence and eventually to dominate and exploit them for Soviet ends.

The Soviets have grasped the implications and quickly realized that they could be successful only if they took into account the new strong nationalistic tendencies, especially in Asia. And so, as often before, they have shifted their international party line for reasons of expediency and have now come out as champions of "revolutionary nationalism." Temporarily they are soft-pedalling Marx's idea that the words "national" and "bourgeois" are synonymous. And they will continue to soft pedal this idea until the Communists in these newly formed nations are strong enough to hold and maintain their power in all parts of Asia.

Furthermore, the Communists are smart enough to realize that in these countries progress can come about only in step-by-step fashion. They realize that after people in a given colonial area have shaken off their former lords, the next step for them is the feeling of national pride. Thus we see that the present Communist regime in China is even more nationalistic than the Nationalists they replaced. The Communists in these areas proclaim that national and social liberation are two aspects of the same process.

5. State capitalism and its consequences: While there is much that can be said against competitive capitalism of the United States brand, there is even more that can be said against state capitalism as practiced by the present Soviet regime. For the Soviet brand of capitalism is much more sweeping than the United States variety. In modern Russia an all-powerful state machine is the instrument of capitalism. Hence all the evils of capitalism are magnified. The state is able to exploit manpower to a much higher degree than the most capitalistic trust in the United States could even dream of.

It is important, therefore, that people everywhere be shown that the destruction of private capital does not abolish capital itself but only funnels it into fewer and fewer hands with greater exploitation possible if the people lose control of the government.

6. The fate of working people: The present Soviet regime claims that it holds the key to the salvation of the working class, the toiling masses. It must be stressed that the Soviet authorization collectivism has resulted in a monopoly of power where there is no freedom left for the individual worker—no freedom to choose his work, no freedom to quit his work, no freedom to bargain for better wages or working conditions. The worker has become a tool, a cog in the great state machine.

7. Soviet education: The aim of education in a Soviet-dominated area is the creation of useful Soviet citizens who believe what they are taught and do what they are told. Once the basic tenets of the Soviet regime are accepted, there are ready-made answers for everything.

All education is so organized that no one may exceed a state-approved amount of knowledge. Soviet rulers do not want to run the risk of speculation and doubt about the wisdom of the state. They do not want personal opinions. Even personal criticism of capitalist warmongers, Wall Street imperialism, etc., are undesirable. For all that is to be said about the evils of capitalism has already been said by the gods Marx, Lenin, and Stalin. Personal argument or elaboration of their themes is considered heresy.

Therefore teachers are expected to preach, not to teach. They preach a new religion which they present as a science.

8. Destruction of human values: In the Soviet regime, personal values must become party property. The party decides what experiences constitute the good, the true, the beautiful, the decent, the worth while.

In the past, the center of life was religion. The word religion comes from "religio" meaning to be related to something higher. In the Soviet regime, an individual belongs to a party, and "party" derives from "part." To belong to a party means to believe in a certain part or aspect. It is partiality instead of totality.

Under the Soviet regime, the party is the state. This means that the part has swallowed the whole. To follow the party line, means to align oneself with the party that has usurped the whole. The totalitarian doctrine of the Soviet regime demands that man and human freedoms become State property. In the Soviet regime, the ideal of totality has deteriorated into totalitarianism. This means an enforced totality instead of one freely adopted.

In this enforced absence of conflicting ideas and loyalties, an individual under the Soviet regime may gradually develop an emotional security. But his emotional security is that of a robot equipped by the State with a synthetic outlook on life. The State trains him with some skill and imbues him with the faith that he is doing his part to bring about a Communist paradise everywhere.

This robot security has the effect of chaining people down instead of pulling them up. It is based on blind faith; it makes for the suicide of man's characteristics through freedom from freedom, through relieving man of the burden of choice and the responsibilities and satisfactions that come with choice. It creates a spiritual vacuum, an inability to meet new situations. Under the Soviet regime the only measure of man is his working capacity. Ethics and morality are completely subordinated to what the leaders think is in the interest of the class struggle. Lenin wrote, "We deduce our morality from the facts and needs of the class struggle of the proletariat."

We might well compare the attitude and pronouncements of Soviet leaders with the convictions and statements of the great teachers and leaders of all ages.

Lao-tse and Confucius proclaimed charity as the basic rule of life. Christ said: "Love your enemies, bless them that persecute you." But Lenin declared: "It does not matter if three quarters of mankind is destroyed; all that counts is that ultimately the last quarter should become Communist."

Buddha proclaimed: "Man shall conquer anger by love, evil by good, avarice by generosity, and the liar by truth." Lenin preached that the only means of dealing with opponents was to smash them. Gandhi declared: "The duty of a human being is to diminish hatred and to promote love." Stalin on the other hand pronounced: "You cannot defeat an enemy without learning to hate him with all your soul."

Tolstoy considered love as "the highest and only law for human life." Lenin decreed: "The hate-laden cry of rage is our only delight."

Jefferson said: "The God who gave us life, gave us liberty at the same time." And Emerson concurred: "For what avail the plough or sail, or land or life, if freedom fail." But to Lenin "Freedom is a bourgeois prejudice." It is rather doubtful whether men like Jefferson, Paine, and Lincoln, who came out for freedom, can be termed as bourgeois.

9. The fiction of "scientific socialism" as used by the Soviet regime: All Soviet goals and Soviet practices are masked under the cloak of the modern god science. The principles under which the regime operates are called laws—dialectical laws. Hence the Soviet citizen is made to feel that if things are happening according to a scientific law, there can be no argument. But the judgment of modern science denies the validity of the laws these Soviets label as scientific.

C. WHAT ARE WE INTERESTED IN?

All of our information programs should be permeated with the sincerity of our realization that the United States is one of the few areas in the world where the struggle for physical survival and economic reconstruction are not now the paramount issue. Furthermore, people in this country have the opportunity to participate in the formation of national policy.

As a consequence, we see that it is largely up to us to do what we can to rescue the concept of man—offering help and holding out hope.

Since we are not primarily burdened with problems of survival and reconstruction, it is up to us to remind men and women everywhere of the standards of value associated with a good life. These standards must be universal enough to appeal to all men and to win all: Chinese, Indians, Hungarians, Brazilians; merchants, fishermen, mothers, clerks, scientists, etc.

These standards should serve as a compass which could direct men in any culture toward those goals that are common to human beings as such from whatever position they may be in now, from whatever basis, whatever system of government, whatever level of culture or political development they may have now.

Our job is, then, to provide faith in the possibility of achieving these universal standards—a faith that people can feel sure enough about so they can use it as a basis for evaluating political leadership and not blindly follow idols. Our standards must give them an answer to the question of "what for?"

We have pointed out that values are things people can take with them. Man's greatest security comes from faith in his values. What people ought to expect of their political leaders, then, is that they keep governments as living and growing organizations for the realization of human values.

If we can help people everywhere clarify the goals of human living, we can then point out to them that the job we are trying to do and the job we must all work together on, is much more than the job of saving any particular system or form of government that any of us happen to have at the moment. Systems of government, whether they be capitalism, communism, or socialism, must be viewed as methods of living together which have been worked out and accepted by different people at different times for reasons which are historically clear.

The solution of man's problem now, that of saving himself from an enemy who would destroy his very nature, will not be achieved merely by substituting one system for another system. What is needed is a clear statement of the goals for which all people are striving. Then people can choose and develop whatever social techniques, public or private, appear best suited to the achievement of these goals.

We must constantly recall to people and to ourselves, all the great values which were created in the past in order to establish and defend the value of man. We must show that those who bid us forget the past, rob us of our spiritual heritage. What we know about the meaning of life is not a modern discovery, it is not the new look of a passing vogue. The values of life have been established by experiences that reach back thousands of years. They are the net profit of the accumulated wisdom of innumerable cultures. No individual, no group, no nation, no system has a monopoly on wisdom.

We must point out that different freedoms are needed in different cultures today, and that we must not try to impose on people one set of freedoms they do not want for other sets of freedoms they do want.

People in different parts of the world have learned to want different freedoms. What means a lot to some doesn't mean much to others. Instead of trying to convert other nations to adopt fully our point of view, our "way of life," we must rather attempt to avail ourselves of the specific national genius of each country in order to fit our concepts to the needs of that individual country, without in the least compromising with our goals.

We must show that freedom is not an end in itself, but that the quality of freedom is measured by what a person does with it.

We must make it clear that freedom involves great personal responsibility, that there is no such thing as freedom from freedom if men are to be themselves and to develop as nature has prescribed. Freedom is not license but the responsibility for the realization of human values.

We must recall that men in western democracies have evolved codes of laws, including the protection of personal freedoms through the right of trial by jury, to guard themselves against arbitrary rules that might be set up by the state or other self-constituted authority.

The fact of man's increasing interdependence on other men, because of our technological development, exchange of goods and ideas, etc., must be emphasized and the consequences made clear. We see that suddenly in the course of history we have all been made neighbors. We see that many of the things we need for an abundant life are produced and manufactured by others, just as the things we produce and manufacture are needed by them. It must become apparent that each individual can achieve his own purposes only insofar as he takes into account and respects the purposes and goals of other people whom his behavior affects.

In the long run, no one individual can do what he wants to do unless other people are allowed to do what they want to do. Hence the necessity of international laws, internationally enforced. The very fact that we have established personal contact with the people of all nations, cultures, colors, and creeds has changed the vague notion of "mankind" and has confronted people everywhere with attitudes which call for wide horizons, understanding, and charity. This we all have to learn and practice if the idea of one world is to become a reality.

Among other things, we must show that our loyalty to our own country does not make us disloyal to our fellowmen in other countries. We should work for the common use of the world's resources, for a commor flag to fly with our own.

We must constantly emphasize our interest in the Russian people and the people of the satellite countries, clearly and constantly distinguishing between the Soviet regime and the dictatorships in satellite countries on the one hand, and the people who live in those areas and their national symbols on the other hand. We must indicate to them that all of us share common purposes as human beings. We must show them that we are willing to make sacrifices to help them concretely.

We should make it clear that this position of ours is not a trumped-up idealism for propaganda purposes. It is, rather, the most hard-headed, yet the most enlightened, kind of realism. We know that in helping them we help ourselves. It turns out that this hard-headed realism is one which can only be achieved by practicing the Golden Rule.

Since we believe that individuals are the most important things in the world, and since we see that individuals are now in danger, we unhesitatingly accept the ideals of democracy. We do this because democracy pledges itself to regard the individual as sacred. That is its keystone. That is why nations everywhere say, "We stand for democracy." That is why the Soviet regime is exploiting the slogan "democracy" for its perverted and distorted aims.

D. WHY OUR DEFENSE PREPARATIONS?

People want peace. Grasping this better than we have, Russia has beat us to the peace offensive. It strengthens her position not only behind the iron curtain but also abroad, especially in Germany, our first and unwilling line of defense in Europe. The Russian peace offensive has trapped many honest people everywhere.

We can recognize that while we still have to defend ourselves against those who do not yet see what is best for them, for us, for everybody, that huge armaments and defense preparations are not goals in themselves. Instruments of war are old-fashioned, outmoded instruments which most men never want to use.

We must make it clear that we know war is wrong. We know it is wrong to kill people, to hurt them, to starve them, to destroy their homes and their factories. We must make it clear that we oppose the trend by which war is in danger of becoming an end in itself.

And yet we know there are some things worse than war—the slavery of bondage of our bodies, our minds, our souls. Hence we must resist all threats of Soviet imperialism and domination wherever they may be found. For, as Daniel Webster said: "God grants liberty only to those who love it, and are always ready to guard and defend it."

What we are fighting for, then, is time for people to see in their own experience that if we will act together we can raise our levels of security, can increase the range of our satisfactions in peaceful ways. We are fighting for time so that we can show people that ideas and institutions should be judged according to the way they affect individuals, that every happening must be judged from an individual point of view.

We must stress that the time we are fighting for is also a time which we feel must be used by the genius of each national group to work toward the common goal of humanity in its particular way according to its customs and its own traditions. Otherwise there can be no lasting success and progress for them or for us.

We also want time to demonstrate to the people in Soviet-dominated areas that the so-called scientific foundations on which the Soviet regime bases its policy are essentially unscientific and reactionary.

We want time to demonstrate the falsity of the assumptions on which the Soviet regime operates—assumptions which they have taught people to believe by refusing them the right to complete information. Among the wrong assumptions now expressed by the Soviet regime are:

1. The assumption that the contradiction between capital and labor is bound to grow. (Precisely the opposite seems to be the trend in the United States.)

2. The assumption that the proletariat will be increasingly oppressed and that monopoly capitalism will attain increasingly greater profit. (Again, exactly the reverse trend is found in the United States.)

3. The assumption that capitalism will become increasingly more imperialistic. (This is belied by recent events such as the British withdrawal from India, the Marshall plan, etc.)

4. Ever-increased rivalry between capitalistic states for colonial areas. (Witness the role of the United Nations here.)

5. The assumption that the proletariat will revolt spontaneously in increasing measure. (This is not occurring in western countries.)

6. The assumption that there will be an increase in the hatred of capitalistic countries for Socialism in any form. (But note our basically good relations with England, with the Scandinavian countries, and with Yugoslavia.)

7. The assumption that there will be an increase in the resentment of the proletariat of preparations for defense or war against Soviet socialism. (This is belied by the fact that the workingman in the United States is just as cognizant of the threat the Soviet regime has for him as anyone else.)

We must constantly show that the Soviet regime has not kept promises to workers but has only made them slaves; it has not kept its promises to peasants and farmers; its appeals to intellectuals, scientists, and artists have been tricks which have stifled their talents and creativity and forced a complete disregard of scientific truth and of universal human values.

We must also stress that our defense preparations are to give us time to work out some of our own problems. We must be frank in acknowledging that in spite of the high standards we have so far achieved, there is still a good deal of housecleaning to be done in our own country, i. e., slum clearance, racial discrimination, etc., and that we are engaged in this housecleaning. We should also indicate that through the United Nations we are concerned with methods of banishing vestiges of capitalistic imperialism at the same time we try to keep colonial peoples from Soviet enslavement

We must make it clear that our whole point 4 program is one designed to help people help themselves. We must make it clear by our deeds as well as our words that we refuse to say to anyone, "Here is bread if you will think the way I do—if you will do as I say."

These are the fundamental reasons why we are determined to defend ourselves and other people who are still free of Soviet domination from the new enemy that confronts man.

The time we are fighting for is time to prevent world war III altogether. It is not merely time to postpone the day of its outbreak. If we can make this point clear, it should provide people with hope, replacing the current despair of those who wonder what's the use of all their effort anyway.

E. WHAT WE OUGHT TO REMEMBER

We must make it clear that we do not want to impose; we do not want to destroy. We oppose only those who would impose and who would destroy to achieve their ends.

We must make it clear that neither we, nor any other nation or group, have a patent on democracy. We should make it clear that whatever has proved good in socialism can be adopted by men without at the same time selling their souls and forfeiting their individuality. We must make it clear that whatever has proved good in capitalism can be accepted by men without sacrificing their security and destroying their own chances for self-development.

We must make it clear that we are not out to save any particular form of capitalism or any particular form of society, but that we are concerned only with the rescue of man who stands in mortal danger. We do not want to force on people anywhere what the people in any one country happen to think is best. For we know that change is the rule of nature and human nature and we have faith that in the distant future men will create social and political organizations which will better provide for the lot of the individual and for lasting peace than any system devised to date.

We should try to point out that we do not regard democracy as an end in itself. To consider democrac, as an end in itself is to kill human life by reducing it to a single dimension. This is the mistake the Nazis made, the mistake the Soviets are making today.

It is what we do with our democracy that matters; it is what we do with our freedom that matters.

If we are to avoid blunders, to avoid insulting people, we must make every effort to understand the national and cultural bases within which these people operate and take these fully into account, capitalizing with complete sincerity and without any condescension on the national genius and the cultural pride found in almost every land.

To remember about Europe: An information program for European countries can only be successful if it takes into account the European concept of the United States. While this concept may strike us as wrong, the assumptions behind it are there, and we must do what we can to change them before we can make any headway.

We must understand that, while Europe is battered, it is not defeated. The people in Europe feel that they are caught in a vise, and they are likely to resent imposition by the United States just as they resent sovietization.

The European outlook on life is basically different from that of the United States. Europeans see the United States as a utilitarian country where everything is measured by practical success. This concept is foreign to most Europeans, who are likely to regard man primarily as an individual who thinks, feels, and lives, not as a person who merely produces. Thus the European has a relatively disinterested attitude in the material luxuries of life.

The stress in Europe is laid more on culture than it is on civilization. Europeans know from experience that culture creates civilization, while civilization never creates culture. Europeans view the United States as a civilized country in a technological sense, but are likely to feel that the United States is lacking in the cultural values necessary for spiritual leadership. Therefore, it is most important to convey to Europeans information concerning our cultural values, showing them that we believe in such values, and that efficiency, productive capacity, and "success" are not our only yardsticks.

Europe is also unsympathetic to the tenseness of the United States pace, to our hustle and bustle. For example, Europeans enjoy "wasting" their time in "idle talk." For they believe that the time isn't wasted and that the talk isn't idle. The replacement of Viennese coffee houses by snack bars is symbolic of our "eat and run" attitude and is likely to go against the grain of the Austrian spirit.

We must reexamine what we are offering to the people of Europe. Are we offering liberalism and democracy wrapped in an optimistic package? This approach would be doomed to failure. For Europe has been disillusioned. The ideas we are offering Europe were born in Europe in the eighteenth century and then transplanted to the United States. Now we are bringing these same ideas back as a new promise of hope to Europe, without regard for the fact that the experiences of the European people in the last 200 years have steeped them in skepticism. Europe has seen the perversion of Socialist promises of equality into dictatorship, of global promises being broken and perverted into global wars fought on European soil. The United States has escaped these historical disappointments, and therefore retains the optimistic faith which most people in Europe have lost. While we believe in our promises, Europe is doubtful.

When we deal with Europe we ought to realize that Europeans are not children who can take only sugar-coated pills. Europeans have come to accept struggle and suffering as an essential part of life. This is doubtless one reason why Marxism had a certain appeal to many Europeans since Marxism does not promise any easy evolutionary progress.

We must not promise peace and ask for rearmament, for Europeans will doubt our honesty. We must not promise free enterprise and stress the necessity of a war economy, for Europeans will doubt our sincerity. We must not ask for sacrifices and then try to disguise them as favors. We must choose our words carefully, for Europeans are wary.

We must take into account the virility of European nationalism and remember that there are still relatively few people in Europe who can conceive of a United States of Europe. The strength of nationalism in Europe may be illustrated with reference to what happened to the concept of socialism which started out as an international concept. Almost immediately the idea was monopolized by nationalistic tendencies: in Italy socialism was perverted by Mussolini to fascism, in Nazi Germany to national socialism, in the Soviet Union into nationalist bolshevism. The present Titoism and recent splitting off of French and Italian Communist leaders who are motived by nationalism and who resent Soviet imperialism further indicates the trend.

At this time, therefore, the wise course of action would seem to be to bolster nationalism rather than to weaken it. For if communism can be broken up into various national brands its danger to the world as a whole will be considerably decreased.

In short, if we want to deal successfully with Europe, we must see her the way she is and the way she sees herself—not the way we want her to be. We must know each country's history, its prides and prejudices, and we must act on this knowledge.

What to remember about Asia: If we want to deal successfully with Asia, we must realize, as the Soviets have, that the main driving force in Asia is an upsurge of nationalism. The Asiatic approach to the world and its problems is a consciously nationalistic one.

And we must realize, as the Soviets have done, that if we want to win the people of Asia as our friends, we must help them on their level, not on ours. There is no use sending machinery which the people of Asia do not know how to use. If we send machinery, we must send along experts who speak the language and who understand the minds and the problems of the people they are going to work with. What we send and how it is to be used must be decided with their full participation and initiative. If we can do this and make them feel that we are trying to help them to help themselves, we will dispel their present distrust of us and of foreign intervention and we will thereby debunk the falsehood of the Soviet-inspired myth of United States imperialism.

People in Asia believe that we are trying to impose a form of government and a culture without regard to their own needs.

People in Asia believe that we think they are an inferior race and that their cultures are below our own. Educated Asiatics tend to look on western culture as young, immature.

Since the people of Asia are struggling for survival, they are not ready to appreciate our emphasis upon mechanization, on mass production, and so forth. For example, in those areas of Asia where fertility of the soil makes the going easier, people still do not believe in working for more than is needed.

People in Asia have seen the United States talk democracy and then actively aid imperialism and dictatorship.

People in Asia have seen the United States talk private enterprise and at the same time exploit Asiatics.

If we want to deal successfully with the people of Asia, then we must not only understand them as they are, but understand how they see us.

F. WHY THIS MESSAGE; WHY ALL OUR MESSAGES?

People everywhere are being deluged by propaganda. They are being asked to believe certain claims, to support certain ideas, to rally around certain slogans.

We are simply trying to tell other people how we see things. We, as a people, are trying to communicate with other people as individuals, as fellow human beings. We are trying to present a point of view as we honestly see it now—a point of view we honestly believe, a point of view we are trying to work out in actual practice.

The people in our own country and in all areas not dominated by the Soviet Union have free access to information, to facts, to current events. If we distorted these in any way for propaganda purposes we would destroy the confidence of the millions of people in our own land and abroad who are concerned with communicating with each other and working out better ways of living. We are not so stupid as to resort to the technique of the big lie, which may prove temporarily successful for the dictator, but which history shows eventually ends in disaster for him and his followers. We believe with Lincoln that "truth is generally the best vindication against slander."

We realize that the people in our own land and in other lands will be willing to make personal sacrifices only if they believe in the goals they are trying to attain. Above all, we realize that these goals must be goals for individuals themselves, not meaningless abstractions. Men everywhere will sacrifice comfort and material security if they believe this will preserve their integrity and their inner security, or if by such sacrifice they can attain the integrity and security they do not have now.

We believe that people everywhere are trying to do their best as they see it, and that all of us can do better for ourselves and for each other if we can communicate to each other our needs and aspirations, our hopes and fears, and work peacefully together for those goals common to all men.

The goals we subscribe to have not been arrived at hastily. We have consulted the most advanced scientific men in all countries where men can think honestly. We have also studied what the great religious prophets and the wise men of different ages and countries have said, and we find that they, too, support what we believe to be the goals of life.

With these goals in mind, it is up to each individual, each group, each nation, to decide what is best; to decide what is right. The decisions men everywhere make today are terribly important—maybe more important than the decisions men have had to make anywhere, anytime.

We realize that there are millions of people in Soviet dominated areas who are not free to choose, who cannot do what they really think is best and right without losing their lives. We want them to remember that even if their own rulers may be against them, against anyone who wants to develop as an individual and be himself, that there are millions of people, millions of fellow human beings and fellow citizens of the world outside Soviet dominated areas, who are ready to work with those people inside the Soviet areas whenever the opportunity permits. We want to hold out hope to those who are helpless and persecuted.

Our chief difficulty in communicating with people in Soviet dominated areas is not one of geographical boundaries. The greatest obstacle is not the iron curtain which tries to shut out truthful information about the rest of the world. The greatest difficulty is rather to pierce the iron mold into which the minds of Soviet citizens have been cast for the last 33 years through no fault of their own.

For this reason, our message must have maximum plausibility. And we must repeat our message over and over again if we are to break this iron mold.

None of us can sit back and indulge in mental speculations about what we should do. Leisurely times have passed. The hour has struck and it is time for action.

What we are trying to do in our communications is to show people everywhere why we feel that the purposes of the Soviet regime are completely inimical to the purposes of human beings as such, and why we uphold the dignity of the individual, the freedom of people to choose and make decisions for themselves. Our communications must show the possibility of self-development at the same time the physical needs and standards of living of people everywhere are raised as they should and must be.

While it is important to act, it is even more important to know why we are acting, what we are acting for. The quality of our action depends upon the quality of our purposes.

G. WHAT, IN BRIEF, IS OUR MESSAGE; OUR CREDO?

We believe that human beings everywhere are born with common needs and aspirations; that chief among the characteristics of man is his ceaseless desire to improve the quality of living; that this requires freedom from want and freedom from fear, together with freedom to choose and freedom to help shape his own destiny; that any group, nation, or ideology which attempts to impose a fixed way of life on other individuals is committing a crime against human nature and the spirit of man; that it is the responsibility of all people everywhere to help their fellow human beings create whatever conditions they feel hold out the possibility of making their living more abundant according to their own cultural heritage.

We believe in the perfectibility of man.

We believe that we and others will achieve a better society only when we and they become better men.

We believe that if action is kindled by charity and love, it can never be wrong.

All this we believe.

Only by acting on these beliefs will we be able to live more abundant lives ourselves. In a world where each of us depends on so many others, the chance for any of us to be increasingly free of want, free of fear, free to choose, free to be ourselves, depends on the chance of others to be equally free.

STATEGY NOTES

1. To solidify our position, concentrate especially on the people of the world whose minds are not already in iron molds, i. e., those who share some of our traditions, goals, assumptions, and hope.

2. A criterion for each message used by the United States Information Service (whether broadcast, leaflet, etc.) should be: If someone asked a person who had heard a VOA broadcast, and so forth, the question "What did it say?" could the listener tell him? That is, was the message clear, unambiguous, simple, pointed, plausible, not easily distorted?

3. It is possible by means of pre-tests on small samples of a population to determine in advance what particular context for our information and education programs will be most plausible and most effective. Such tests are relatively simple to conduct on people not now living within the Soviet sphere of influence and some information concerning the best arguments to use with persons who are in iron curtain countries might be obtained by careful interviewing of displaced persons, etc. The use of this method can greatly aid us in pointing up our message to specific cultures and in no way implies that we are being artificial or untruthful. It means essentially that, like a good general, we are trying to determine weak spots before we put on our major offensive.

4. Use irony where possible. Don't pay the tribute of taking everything the U. S. S. R. says and does seriously. Make use of cartoons.

5. Seek slogans, watch for phrases that catch hold, repeat them often. But choose slogans with great care since people have been deluged with them.

6. Avoid words spoiled by Soviets. Describe what the names are naming.

7. Accompany, supplementally, Voice of America, etc., abroad with a Voice for America at home. This should be a short, 15 to 20 minute weekly report to the people telling them how things stand, giving the "what for's" along with the "how-to-do's." If possible, this should be done by the President. If not, possibly by a neutral voice with State or Cabinet backing, etc.

(NOTE.—The ideas expressed in this memorandum can be documented with evidence from many sources. We could, for example, give the opinions of outstanding scientists that the Soviet conception of "materialism" is now regarded only as a superstition. We could cite the views of leading scientists concerning the importance of values in human life. There is ample evidence that Soviet totalitarianism is contrary to the development of the individual personality. This statement was written in the hope that it would prove useful. Since the writers believe it should stand on its own feet, they feel that the addition of their names is irrelevant. If you can use it in any way, they will be happy to have you use it. It is common property.)

The Need for a United States Medical Academy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. LOUIS B. HELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, I should like to call to the attention and consideration of my colleagues in this House a bill which I introduced on May 2. I want to explain this bill as briefly as possible. I am hopeful enough to believe that the proposal it contains will arouse widespread interest in this legislative chamber, as well as in the country at large, to warrant prompt and early adoption of the proposal.

My bill, H. R. 3931, calls for the establishment of a United States Medical Academy, along the lines of the Military Academy at West Point and the Naval Academy at Annapolis. The purpose of this bill is to increase the number of physicians and dentists who would be available for our Armed Forces, for the United States Public Health Service, and for other governmental activities requiring medical service.

Through the establishment of this medical academy we shall not only help to eliminate the shortage of doctors which exists in the Federal Government, but we shall also help to remedy the serious shortage in the country as a whole. At the same time, the creation of such an institution would insure a new source of specially-trained and readily available nucleus of medical men in Government services around which the necessary expansions could be undertaken in times of emergency, without straining and draining the supply of medical men.

All of us are acutely aware of the doctor shortage today, which was serious enough before the outbreak of the war in Korea, but which has grown considerably worse since then due to the crying need for doctors in the Armed Forces. Nearly a year ago, in June 1950, the Army called for 2,167 doctors who were needed immediately to help meet the new emergency resulting from the Korean crisis. Since then Congress has found it necessary to provide for a draft of doctors. The Department of Defense has set a new and increased goal for men in uniform, which will require an additional 4,000 doctors to meet the needs of our expanding Armed Forces for proper medical care. Less than 10 days ago, on April 23, the Defense Department asked selective service authcrities to draft 1,202 physicians during the months of July, August, and September. If it continues at this rate, how can we avert a disruption of our civilian medical services?

Needless to say, that we are determined our Armed Forces should have the best possible medical care. But we should be equally concerned that the families of men in the service, their parents, wives, and children, are not deprived of the medical attention which they must have. It must also be remembered that our cities may someday become enemy targets and be exposed to enemy attacks from the air. In the event of such attacks, or in the case of serious epidemics or other emergencies, we must be fully prepared to render medical care to the civilian population over and above the normal civilian needs for such care.

Only a short while ago, Dr. Howard Rusk, Chairman of the Health Resources Advisory Committee in the National Security Resources Board, warned that we can expect a shortage of 22,000 doctors in this country by 1954, only 3 years from now. A year ago we knew we needed more doctors. Today we are faced with the stark reality of desperately trying to stretch inadequate manpower to meet the needs in a time of national crisis. Must we wait until it is too late or until the health situation in the United States is dangerously impaired before we take any effective action?

I submit that even without the urgent need brought about by the present crisis, it is necessary for our Government to establish as soon as possible a United States Medical Academy. Let me emphasize that this proposal is not one arising entirely or solely out of the present emergency. On the contrary, the emergency merely accents the need for action which we should have taken long ago.

Throughout our history medical officers in the armed services—unlike the military officers who have been graduated from West Point or Annapolis—had to subsidize their own medical education and training. Why should it not be possible for the Federal Government to train the doctors it requires for its medical services at Government expense, in the same manner it trains a nucleus for our military staffs? Indeed, a medical academy would add a new complement of doctors each year to meet Government needs. It would also, I am convinced, enable military medicine to acquire a professional career status which it deserves, and it would unquestionably serve as a very encouraging factor in the development of new fields of medical knowledge.

Military medicine, as we all know, has some special problems. It must be concerned with the human factors inherent in military service in the Arctic region and in the tropics. It must study physical problems which arise from jet-propelled planes, or in submarines. It is concerned with mass training, global war, and the use of unconventional weapons. Moreover, it has another important distinguishing feature which is sometimes overlooked, namely, preventive medicine—the problem of keeping men and women fit for service and of maintaining adequate health and sanitation measures. Most medical schools today properly put major emphasis upon diagnosis and cure of disease, frequently at the expense of courses in preventive methods and techniques.

These special medical problems of the military are merely noted here without specific recommendations as to the proposed Academy's curriculum, of course. Clearly, they represent fields of specialization. Just as clearly, the basic courses offered in the Medical Academy would duplicate the courses given in every good medical school in the country. Graduates of the Academy would be trained first as doctors and then as specialists.

Mr. Speaker, we should have built such a medical academy a long time ago, because the Armed Forces need it, the Government health services need it, and the country needs it. Today we must be moved by extremity and urgency to establish such a school so that the Federal Government can, in the future, assume its fair share and responsibility in helping to supply the doctors it must have for its own services, in peace as well as in war.

The proposed legislation contains the following major provisions:

First. It creates the United States Medical Academy along lines similar to the Military Academy, the Naval Academy, the Coast Guard Academy, and the Merchant Marine Academy.

Second. Appointments to this Academy would be made from all congressional districts, Territories, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, and the Canal Zone, 8 from each State at large, and 132 from the United States at large.

Third. Candidates for admission would be at least 20 years of age but less than 25, graduates of a college or university or the equivalent, citizens of the United States, and of good moral character.

Fourth. The course of study would include the following subjects: anatomy, physiology, chemistry, hygiene, surgery, obstetrics and gynecology, pathology, bacteriology, and diagnosis.

Fifth. Graduates from the Academy would remain in Government service for 5 years.

Sixth. All employees of the Academy would be paid in accordance with the provisions of the Classification Act of 1949 and would be subject to the provisions of the civil-service retirement laws.

Seventh. The Academy would have a Superintendent appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for a term of 10 years, and a Board of Visitors with prescribed pay and minimum duties.

I am hopeful this bill will receive due consideration and early approval of the committee to which it was referred and the subsequent approval of Congress.

American Preparedness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the period May 12 through May 19 is being observed once more as National Defense Week, at the conclusion of which will be celebrated Armed Forces Day, on May 19. This year, as in several past years, it has been my pleasure to contribute for this occasion an article to the official magazine of the Reserve Officers' Association of the United States. This article is published in the May 1951 issue of the Reserve Officer. Its subject is a long-range program for American preparedness.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the article by printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PREPAREDNESS: TEMPORARY FLURRY OR LONG-RANGE STRATEGY

(By Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY, senior United States Senator from Wisconsin)

What is one of the greatest psychological handicaps to adequate American defense—to a comprehensive reserve program, to thorough preparedness?

The answer is the tendency of our people to fluctuate between the two mental extremes of optimism on the one hand and pessimism on the other hand in our attitude toward international relations and the problem of peace. Because of that tendency, we swing like a pendulum from the extreme direction of pacifism to the extreme direction of militarism. We are an "off-again, on-again, in-again, out-again" people in this respect.

Observers looking at America's history have long noted that after every war in which we have been engaged, there has been a tremendous psychological let-down, a frantic effort to demilitarize, to be done with the messy and costly business of preparation for future possible war. It is only natural, perhaps, that we should be guilty, if you can call it that, of overhasty demobilization after war.

The average American boy is not raised with the idea that he should spend his days perpetually lying in filthy foxholes with insects biting him, with rain pouring down, with the accumulation of weeks' dirt on his body, with shells (live or dummy) bursting around him, and an instrument of death in his hand. The American boy is raised for baseball, football, 4–H Clubs, Boy Scouts, and the peaceful pursuit of happiness.

We have always regarded war as an occasional detestable operation which a nation should get over with as quickly as possible and then promptly forget about in the interest of everybody making a good living in civilian life and enjoying the better things. We, with our unsurpassed standard of living, with our superb comforts and conveniences, with freedoms unknown anywhere else in the world, naturally do not like to think about the possibility of a permanent state of mobilization, of continual tension and preparedness.

KOREA FLUCTUATIONS

But every once in awhile some dramatic event occurs which serves to awaken us out of our lethargy. In 1941 it was the Japanese dive bombers blasting Pearl Harbor. In 1950 it was the North Korean troops pouring down over the thirty-eighth parallel. Each of these sharp events has served to reverse our total thinking. In the instance of Korea, there was a temporary state of near panic and hysteria. It was believed that the firing of North Korean artillery was but the prelude to a deafening roar of Russian guns in the near future and so frantically we started to build up our armed forces and to undo much of what we had done in the rosy alls-well-with-the-world period following September 1945.

In the ensuing months, the fortunes of the Korean war fluctuated back and forth. Every time it loked as though we were "out of the woods," so to speak, and as though American fighting men had once more triumphed, there was a feeling of let-down and an itch to bring the boys home and forget the whole dismal experience. Then, some bad news would come from Pyongyang or from the Kremlin or from Lake Success or from a satellite state or from Iran, and once more we would be plunged into an extreme state of near panic. Back and forth, we would go from optimism as to a bright, peaceful future to blackest pessimism as to the inevitability of a third world war.

Always, when the war clouds seemed to disappear, we would start to wonder why we were spending so much money for training men in destruction and for armaments, when obviously the same outpouring could build schools, hospitals, playgrounds, and a thousand other types of community improvements all over this land. Then, when the war clouds would start to regather, we would hastily appropriate billions to make up for lost time.

We as a people have been historically guilty of this "blow hot, blow cold" attitude of being down in the dumps one day, and riding high in the sky the next day.

STRATEGY OF COMMUNISM

Yet you and I and all thinking Ame[illegible]s should recognize today that what we need instead of these extreme variations is a steady determination to be prepared for every emergency. We need National Defense Weeks and a national defense psychology 52 weeks a year. What we need is a firm recognition that the strategy of Russian communism in the long run is committed to the downfall of the American way of life. So, whether or not Soviet diplomats smile at us one day, whether or not they figuratively pat us on the back of the head and whisper sweet lullabies to us, whether or not Joe Stalin comes out with one of his "peace is definitely possible" talks should make comparatively little difference. We need to recognize that so long as Russia is controlled by a handful of men committed to a fanatical, godless creed and to the whole cult of ruthless power, we have no alternative but to arm wisely, soundly, and on a continuing basis. I do not mean that we should not observe closely changing trends; but I do mean that we must perceive the total pattern, not merely the day-to-day changes.

LONG-RANGE PLANNING

We need to lay the firmest foundations for a broader reserve system, founded on justice, fairness, equitable compensation, decent rights and benefits. The Reserve is still the backbone of America's defense. We need, moreover, to pursue other elements of a long-range strategy. Let me suggest several points in such a program.

1. We must continue to follow an intense policy of all-around penetration of the Soviet Union and its satellites. This means making more effective an expanded Voice of America program. It means OSS—like shipment of considerable quantities of saboteurs, arms, and ammunition to dissident elements behind the iron curtain. It means stirring up so much trouble on a continuing basis for the Politburo that it will not be so sure of its home front so as to commit troops to a foreign war. It means exploiting every weakness within the internal fabric of Russian society—economic, political, and social. A recent Foreign Relations Committee print which I helped arrange for spells out quite clearly the areas of internal Russian tension on which America can capitalize.

2. On a long-range basis, we must adequately train our manpower. The Senate has wisely laid the basis for universal military training to take effect when world conditions will permit the present Selective Service System to be replaced. I am hoping that the House of Representatives will follow suit.

I can understand deeply the contrary feelings of countless educators, clergymen, Parent-Teacher Association leaders who question the advisability of UMT. To them I have said and have written this: One of the greatest sins that we can commit is to some day send American boys into battle unprepared. There is not a single Reserve officer or enlisted man who reads these words who does not know one or even a dozen instances where wonderful buddies died in the opening stages of battle because they did not have the most elementary idea of how to survive in modern combat. It is incredible that with all our magnificent American training techniques we should find our boys engaging North Korean or Chinese peasants who know how to use modern weapons better, who are more expert in infiltration tactics, who are better night fighters, than are our own modern youths.

3. A third element of long-range strategy is a broader integration between the Armed Forces and the industrial genius of the American free-enterprise system. By that, I mean that there must be a continuous closer collaboration between every phase of American industry and experts of our Army, Navy, and Air Forces, so that the latest inventions can be fully utilized for improvements in technological warfare.

We have been so concerned about developing better refrigerators, better automobiles, better washing machines that we have not produced the vastly improved tanks, mortars, jets of which we are capable. I am not saying that we cannot be proud of some of our improved weapons, but you and I know that it is a fact that the Korean war found us with pretty much the same weapons as we used in World War II, often with comparatively few important improvements.

4. The Armed Forces themselves figure in this long-range strategy insofar as their own attitude is concerned. Having suffered from periods of appropriations "feasts" and then "famines," they have not always demonstrated a continuing awareness of their own responsibility in the use of the funds allocated to them. Every once in a while some dramatic instances come before the public view in which there has been a shocking extravagance on the part of one of the services. Such instances merely serve to sour the public on pouring more and more billions into the hands of our military, naval, and air chieftains. This is a most unfortunate situation, because it is important that the people and the Congress have the highest faith in our military leaders. But they, in turn, must justify that faith.

5. We must talk "cold turkey" among ourselves and to the Russian insofar as our negotiations with them are concerned. There is no use of our vacillating like a weather vane in dealing with fellows like Gromyko and Vishinsky. We must impress upon them of course that we definitely do not desire war and do not think war is inevitable between our two peoples. But at the same time, we must acquaint them with the fact that appeasement is definitely out. We must indicate that we, too, have a long-range strategy in terms of winning the world for the free way of life through our point 4 program, through the Voice of America and through every other instrumentality available to us. The Russians have seen how inconstant we are and they are trying to steer us away from a long-range program of steady, stern actions and talks.

6. Since Russia respresents the greatest single problem insofar as the future peace of the world is concerned, I urge that we mobilize our finest brains in terms of a complete mastery of the Russia dilemma. I want us to have experts in every phase of Russian and satellite life—in their languages, in their cultures, in their military science, in their economics, in population, in geography. We have seen how Hitler during his regime had great masses of specialists become intensely familiar with every single area of the world. We should do likewise in both military and civilian spheres, encouraging private industry to fully cooperate. After all, American salesmanship has spread American products throughout the world, and it is only natural that we should make the fullest possible use of the great body of knowledge that has been built up by businesses throughout the world and by their salesmen and other representatives.

It is incredible that we have so few language experts, for example, who even understand the diverse foreign tongues, much less the varying foreign cultures and peoples.

By these and other methods I trust that we can lay the firm basis for a long-range strategy for victory of the free and peaceful way of life. It will cost money and energy, but far less money and energy in the long run than the "now you see it, now you don't" approach.

We want neither extreme optimism nor pessimism—but realism. We want neither pacifism nor militarism—but strength, courage, and justice. We want preparedness not as a temporary flurry but as a part of well-planned, permanent strategy.

Resolution Passed by the New York City Council

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I am in receipt of a copy of a resolution passed by the City Council of the City of New York, which was introduced by the Honorable Edward Vogel, who represents the councilmanic district which is coterminous with my own district. The resolution is as follows:

Resolution 402

Resolution urging the New York congressional delegation and the New York Senators, IRVING M. IVES and HERBERT H. LEHMAN, to request the proper agencies of the Federal Government to issue top priorities for construction of school buildings now and during the immediate future of this emergency Whereas as it appears from a report in the New York Times, March 19, 1951, that, "Because of a shortage of construction materials this country's huge school-building program is in danger of bogging down. School systems everywhere are finding it increasingly difficult to continue with their building plans.

"The situation is especially acute in New York, where a $100,000,000 building program is endangered. Officials do not know whether they will be able to complete the 34 schools now under construction, or whether they can continue with the 31 scheduled to get under way this year. A school that burned down 2 months ago will not be rebuilt for some time to come because contractors cannot get the necessary steel for another 10 months.

"A Nation-wide survey conducted by the New York Times indicates that educators are convinced that unless the schools receive some form of priorities for steel and other needed materials, the construction will slow down or come to a virtual standstill"; and

Whereas the survey conducted by the New York Times reports:

"According to educational authorities, the amount of steel required for school construction is only a fraction of the total used in defense industries. Dr. J. L. McCaskill, coordinator of the National Conference for Mobilization of Education, consisting of leading educational organizations, estimates that construction for schools would take about 175,000 tons of steel a year. This is two-tenths of 1 percent of the total steel produced in the country"; and

Whereas Dr. J. L. McCaskill, coordinator of the National Conference for Mobilization of Education reports:

"It is quite possible that many children will not be able to enter school simply because there will be no available classroom space for them. The damage to the educational program will unquestionably increase the inequality of educational opportunity in America to alarming proportions"; and

Whereas of the situation in New York City, Charles J. Bensley, chairman of the board of education's building committee, said that unless the Federal Government provided the needed priorities to continue with construction, the city's huge program would be completely lost. He warned that "unless we put our school-building program on a par with munitions, democracy will be undermined."

"In recent months," he said, "contractors have begun to shy away from making bids. Of the 34 buildings under construction from the 1949–50 program, some are almost ready to open, while others still have a long way to go. These buildings are estimated to cost $50,000,000, and will seat 36,000 children.

"The 1950–51 building program, calling for 31 projects at a cost of $70,000,000, would supply an estimated 30,000 seats.

"Educationally speaking, this will be a lost generation unless the appropriate authorities wake up and immediately grant the priorities needed to build our schools," Mr. Bensley declared.

A similar warning came from Dr. William Jansen, New York superintendant of schools. Dr. Jansen said the effect of the sheel shortage was already being felt in the school system. About 2 months ago, he said, when public school 11 in Woodside, Queens, burned down, its 750 children were placed in nearby schools. The school cannot be rebuilt because the contractors cannot get the necessary steel for at least 8 to 10 months.

"Unless we can get the steel, our building program will bog down completely," Dr. Jansen warned. "It doesn't seem wise to have such conditions at this time. Our schools should not be left to fend for themselves without some priority rating"; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Council of the City of New York, hereby strongly urges Hon. Charles E. Wilson, Director of Defense Mobilization and the Defense Mobilization Board, to grant a top priority rating immediately for school construction, and it is further

Resolved, That the Council of the City of New York, urges the New York Congressional Delegation and the New York Senators IRVING M. IVES and HERBERT H. LEHMAN to request the proper agencies of the Federal Government to issue top priorities for construction of school buildings now and during the immediate future of this emergency.

Mr. Speaker, the people of the city of New York are indebted to Councilman Vogel and his colleagues for this action on their part.

Prime Question Unanswered: How Do We End the War?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. JENISON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. JENISON. Mr. Speaker, certainly history will record the dramatic events of the past 2 weeks among the most far-reaching since the close of World War II in their effect on the survival of the United States of America and the cause of freedom everywhere.

In all the emotional outburst of a nation shocked by a tragic turn of events, we must not lose sight of the fundamental questions involved if we are to salvage what we can from the error-strewn policies of the Truman administration and ultimately set a proper course toward peace and victory.

This constructive procedure is supported with clarity of expression in an editorial published last week by the Danville (Ill.) Commercial-News, the largest newspaper in our congressional district. Under permission granted by the House, I am including it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the consideration of every Member of Congress. It follows:

PRIME QUESTION UNANSWERED: HOW DO WE END THE WAR?

The thrills and excitement of General MacArthur's great day in the East have shifted to the Middle West to be continued in Chicago Thursday and Milwaukee Friday.

As the fury of the fighting mounts in Korea, however, we are still faced with the cold realization that we still have a war on our hands.

President Truman's and Secretary Acheson's speeches have sought to make what they call a limited war appear akin to peace. But American troops are still being killed in Korea.

To the 10,000 Americans who have been killed, to the 250,000 men still there, to their families, and especially the Koreans themselves whose homes and country have been ravaged, the war now raging is as unlimited as war ever gets.

The risks of extending the war first to Red China and later to Red China's ally, the Soviet Union, were just as great on June 25, 1950, when Mr. Truman began the war.

Since that time, the choice between a little war and a big war has depended upon the Communist powers solely, not upon the United States. The same is true today.

The fact of the war's existence and that it has to be disposed of one way or another cannot be brushed aside by talk of peace when there is no peace.

General MacArthur's proposals for ending it by military means are based on two beliefs:

1. Red China is already engaging the maximum power it can commit, and,

2. The Soviet Union will more likely strike only when it feels that it has military and productive preponderance on a world-wide scale. He does not believe Russia thinks it possesses that preponderance now.

He advocated:

(a) A more intensive economic blockade of China.

(b) A naval blockade of the Red China coast.

(c) Unrestricted aerial reconnaissance—he did not specify unrestricted bombing—of China's coast and Manchuria.

(d) Removal of the blockade of Nationalist Chinese on Formosa and supporting them with arms and supplies if they attacked the mainland.

The State Department blocked these. General MacArthur was informed by the Joint Chiefs of Staff that the State Department was ready to announce that with the clearing of South Korea of Red Chinese, the United Nations was ready to discuss a settlement. He was ordered to mark time at the thirty-eighth parallel, without any advance beyond that point by major forces, until State Department had had time to negotiate for a settlement.

The few weeks sought for negotiations have passed and nothing has happened. No new proposals have been made. Reports are that Peiping has even refused to receive neutral diplomats eager to find a basis of settlement.

So the questions that cost General MacArthur his leadership are still unanswered. His removal has settled nothing. We still have a war on our hands and the initiative remains, because of restrictions on our forces, with Red China and the Kremlin. It is clearly up to Mr. Truman and Acheson to produce a workable solution.

Mr. Speaker, when General of the Armies Douglas MacArthur spoke from the rostrum in this House, he spoke from the heart of a great American to the heart of a great America. His counsel, if considered, may become his greatest contribution in a lifetime of distinguished service and military triumph.

The men—and the events—precipitating the sudden turn of events that brought America's last great living military hero home from the wars should be forgotten for the moment in order to restore a unity of purpose for this Nation still engaged in a bitter war thousands of miles away and threatened by a ruthless enemy entrenched on a global front.

This must be done for the reasons cited by the General himself when he told the Congress and the country:

> The issues are fundamental and reach quite beyond the realm of partisan consideration. They must be resolved on the highest plane of national interest. I trust you will do me the justice of receiving that which I have to say as expressing the considered viewpoint of a fellow American. I address you with neither rancor nor bitterness in the fading twilight of life with but one purpose in mind, to serve my country.

None who heard him, and none who read his words, could doubt the deep sincerity of the man who until little more than 2 weeks ago stood as the very embodiment of American opposition to forces of communism arrayed against his country. It is not necessary to attempt comment at length on the text of his report to the people he has served with such distinction. His words received earnest attention, and they should be subjected to careful study. The petty issues raised by petty men should not be permitted to cloud the larger issues at stake.

It has been argued, and conceded, that the President can remove his military commander in the field. It is argued, and admitted, that in the twin fields of civilian and military authority, the civilian power is supreme. But these are not the principal issues at stake. To look at the matter in that light is to miss the larger question.

This is the question which disturbs the minds and lies close to the hearts of millions of Americans. Are the present policies of this Government policies which really serve the best interests of the Nation? In the face of actual war, and the mounting threat of even greater conflict, are we adhering to a course which serves the dual purpose of contributing most to the prevention of war and to our survival if total war should come? General MacArthur disagrees with the policies and he believes the policies which we have adopted, and which the President says will not be changed, can lead us only to disaster.

This is not a conflict that can be resolved by petty sniping at General MacArthur, by smear campaigns generated in the discredited State Department, or by calculated snubs from the General Vaughns and others of like stature. Neither can it be solved by the country-wide emotional outburst against President Truman. The orderly processes of representative government must be followed, and preserved, or the freedom we are fighting for abroad will be lost in dissension at home.

No one understands this better than General MacArthur. So it is not surprising that he addresses himself solely to the task of presenting his views, views that should have been sought and obtained long ago. It was in perfect keeping with his character that he prefaced his views with the flat assertion that he did not serve the purposes of politics or political parties, and that he entertained no political ambitions.

Now the people have heard the general's views. Let the political pygmies chip away at this marble shaft of faith if they must. Now it is for the people themselves to make the decision. Now it is for them, through their Government, to answer the questions raised by present events and future potentialities.

Personalities are not important. Only the issues are. The general himself endorsed this in his moving farewell by recalling this soldier ballad of the day he entered the military service of his country over 50 years ago: Old Soldiers Do Not Die, They Simply Fade Away.

General MacArthur is very much alive. The Nation—and the free world—trusts he will not fade away. But what must not fade away is American determination and American faith in the fundamental principles on which this country was founded and grew to power. It was founded as a Christian Nation devoted to the preservation of human freedom, with authority—and strength—stemming from the people themselves. Has time robbed us of that devotion to principles and devotion to God? If it has not, the people themselves will fix the proper course. And that course will lead to victory for the men still locked in battle. It can lead to a preservation of the peace they will win. That is the hope that must never "simply fade away." If it does, the hope of this Nation—the cause of freedom everywhere—will fade with it.

Poland's Constitution Day Has Lesson for America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, this is Poland's Constitution Day—the one hundred and sixtieth anniversary of the free constitutional government which Poland no longer enjoys.

For the people of that unhappy land it is a day of sorrow. For the people of the United States it should be a day of shame.

The European war against Nazi Germany was precipitated over the issue of the independence and territorial integrity of Poland.

The Pacific war against Japan was precipitated over the issue of the independence and territorial integrity of China.

America contributed mightily and decisively to victory against both enemies.

Yet, today both Poland and China are enslaved by communism, their independence is destroyed, their territorial integrity is violated, and their liberties are ruthlessly denied.

Most incredible of all is the guilt which American leadership shares in this double betrayal of human freedom.

At Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam, as well as by subsequent policies and actions, American leadership sought to buy Stalin's favor at the price of the independence and integrity of both Poland and China, and at the price of our own honor. Such promises as we received, in return, from Soviet Russia were broken almost as soon as they were given.

True, none of the international commitments and agreements which accomplished this double betrayal has ever been ratified by constitutional processes. At the same time, however, it must be acknowledged that none of those commitments and agreements has even been repudiated by constitutional processes.

Meanwhile the United States today finds itself inextricably involved in the consequences of these betrayals of freedom.

Today we should reread, with penitence and foreboding, the grim words of Abraham Lincoln's Second Inaugural Address:

> Fondly do we hope, fervently do we pray, that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away. Yet if God wills that it continue until all the wealth piled by the bondsman's 250 years of unrequited toil shall be sunk and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash shall be paid by another drawn with the sword, as was said 3,000 years ago, so still it must be said: "The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether."

This may be too stern a doctrine for a generation which has come to put more faith in opportunism, expediency, cleverness, and appeasement than in the simple moralities which underlie freedom.

Yet this is the lesson of Poland's Constitution Day for Americans, tardy though we may be in heeding it.

It is the lesson that there can be no hope for peace, or for the preservation even of our own liberties, so long as we permit our leaders to barter away other people's freedom, whether they are the peoples of Poland or China or Formosa.

It is the lesson that truly "nothing can bring us peace but the triumph of principle."

The Great Alliance of Free Men

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address on the subject the Great Alliance of Free Men, by Hon. W. Averell Harriman, special assistant to the President, at a banquet of the regional conference sponsored by the American Association for the United Nations, Inc., in Los Angeles, Calif., on April 30, 1951. In his address Mr. Harriman urges support of the United Nations and the North Atlantic Treaty, and cooperation with other nations.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE GREAT ALLIANCE OF FREEMEN

(By Hon. W. Averell Harriman)

During the past months our country has been engaged in a series of debates. All kinds of things have been said on all sides of every question. Some would even have us believe that we are all in a state of confusion. Some contend that we have no policies, that we are drifting aimlessly. Some are attempting to distort the true purpose of our policies. Much of what is said is irrelevant; much is even irresponsible.

Of course, in our democratic way we should debate all issues, but at a time when our country is in grave danger we should conduct these debates for the sole purpose of gaining a clearer understanding of the issues.

Tonight I want to try to cut through the fog of unreality. I want to talk about the things we face and how we are dealing with them.

I spent a good deal of time in Russia during the war and I had an unusual chance to learn something about the Russian people and their rulers in the Kremlin.

When I came home 5 years ago, I was gravely concerned over the dangers that were developing from the Kremlin, and I was afraid that we would not face up to them until it was too late.

Well, we have faced up to them. I think the American people have been magnificent during the past 5 years. They have supported unprecedented measures. Never in the history of our country, or in the history of any country, has a nation in peacetime taken such wise and effective steps in dealing with so many varied and complex problems.

In 1945 I had come back for a brief visit, just after the death of President Roosevelt, and I vividly remember the first encouragement I got. It came from President Truman. It was the first time I had met him. I found that he was already alive to the indication of the trouble ahead with the Soviet Union. He had carefully studied the records of President Roosevelt and his last messages to Stalin. He was already much concerned by the duplicity of the Kremlin and was determined to stand firm against the Kremlin schemes. As a result, he has been prepared to take prompt and vigorous steps in dealing with the Kremlin threat. No President has in peacetime initiated so many unprecedented and far-sighted measures and actions for our national security as has President Truman.

In our wartime relations with the Soviet Union we had two fundamental objectives. Of first importance was to keep Russia as an effective fighting ally. We also wanted to use this new relationship to find a way of working together for peace on a live-and-let-live basis. People in this country and all over the world had hopes that this could be accomplished. The British and American Governments were well aware of the difficulties in attaining this objective.

During the war, Roosevelt and Churchill made every effort to talk things out with Stalin in order to arrive at some workable understanding on the basis of the principles of the Atlantic Charter.

When I was in Moscow there were indications that the Kremlin had two approaches to their postwar policies. In the many talks that I had with Stalin I felt that he himself was of two minds; one emphasized internal reconstruction and the other external expansion.

On the one hand they were discussing possible understandings with us which might result in increased trade with and loans from the West for the reconstruction of the terrible devastation left in the wake of the war. This would mean soft-pedaling for a time at least the Communist designs for world domination—much along the lines of the policies they had pursued between the two World Wars.

On the other hand, they were treating us in many ways as potential enemies. There were indications that they would take advantage of the Red army occupation of neighboring countries to maintain control, and they were supporting Communist parties in other countries to be in a position to seize control in the postwar turmoil.

The men of the Kremlin chose the second course.

In October of 1945, I went to see Stalin at his country place in Sochi in the Caucasus. After two long nights of arguments over the disagreements we were then having, he as much as told me in a moment of anger that he had decided to go his own way. As time went on, the imperialist plans of the men of the Kremlin became increasingly aggressive. They broke the agreements they had entered into. If they had carried out these agreements the world would be a different place today. They used the occupation of the Red Army to set up puppet governments. They established a network of subversion all over the world, inciting disorders and insurrections and exploiting weakness wherever it exists.

The one great thing, however, accomplished by our constant efforts during and since the war to reach an understanding with the Soviet Union was that they establish our moral position before the people of the world. Had these efforts not been made, many people would still be wondering whether we and not the Kremlin were to blame for the tensions that have developed.

The United Nations has provided the forum through which the designs and the duplicity of the Kremlin have been made crystal clear. The United Nations has been the medium through which the free nations have been drawn together. It is the medium through which the United States has been able to give leadership. And when it came to shameless aggression against the Republic of Korea, it was the medium through which we rallied 53 nations, all of the free nations, to face together this attempt to use force for conquest. We had built better than we knew. Never before in the history has there been such unanimity of world understanding and world opinion.

This was no accident. Step by step our policies had built strength and confidence among the free nations. As the Kremlin plan of action unfolded, we had helped other countries to resist and turn back aggression. We helped Greece put down Kremlin-inspired civil war. We have helped Western Europe to rebuild its economic life and suppress Communist subversion.

We took leadership in the organization of the North Atlantic Treaty. In a manner unprecedented, we have gone out to deal with the threat to our security at its source; we have not waited until it came to us. And let no man think it would not have come to us. Western Europe would not have survived Kremlin domination if it had not been for our prompt and imaginative action. With control of Europe the industrial capacity available to the Kremlin would have practically equaled ours. We might have faced an unmanageable situation. Instead today we are combining the potential of the North Atlantic community in the development of collective defense forces under our great Gen. Dwight Eisenhower.

In Korea we have faced force with force. We have learned from the bitter experience of the events which led to World War II that aggression must be dealt with at the very beginning or it will encourage further aggression. We are showing the Kremlin that the free world will not tolerate the use of force for conquest, that freemen have the will and ability to resist. Our action in Korea is giving confidence to other peoples who are under pressure that they can maintain their independence. We are destroying the myth that the Chinese Red armies are invincible. We are upsetting their timetable of attack in other areas of Asia.

But it is not our aim to bring on another world war. Our aim is to limit the conflict if we possibly can and deal with it successfully within Korea. In the meantime, we are converting our tremendous economic resources into military strength and are helping our friends and allies do the same. Before long, the free world will have the military strength to meet any threat with confidence. When we are strong enough, the Kremlin will not dare undertake further aggression.

As I say, we are using every means at our command to prevent another world war. No man with any understanding of history can say that there can be victory in a general war. There can be nothing but chaos and disaster. But there can be victory—and glorious victory—in preventing another world conflict. And that is the clear aim of American policy. Every step we have taken has this objective. Let no man take us off this course.

I want to discuss some of the alternatives that are being put forward with respect to Korea.

Some would have us abandon Korea. This would be an invitation to further aggression and we would soon find ourselves fighting elsewhere. Or, any idea that we can obtain a solution by buying off the Chinese Communists through appeasement and giving any reward whatsoever for aggression is unthinkable. In view of the misrepresentations and false statements that are being made about the policies of our Government, I want to state in the most emphatic terms that President Truman will never engage in appeasement or reward aggression. He rejects any such idea and so do all his advisers. This has been said time and time again. Thirdly, there are those who would involve us in a wider war in order to end the present conflict in Korea. Yet they have not explained how, when, and at what cost this wider conflict could be brought to a successful conclusion. They are ready to have us lose our allies with all of the world-wide consequences that would result. And they are ready to risk a total war. They say this is the necessary way to solve the Korean situation.

You remember the talk during the Greek civil war. People said that we were bogged down in Greece—there could be nothing but a stalemate. "How could the fighting be brought to a successful conclusion within Greece?" "We should either abandon Greece or carry the fight across the borders and attack the Communist bases in Yugoslavia." And yet the struggle was won on Greek soil. And don't let us overlook the fact that now Yugoslavia is joining the ranks of those who are resisting the Kremlin. We heard the same sort of thing during the Berlin airlift. There were those who could see no end to it. We were told either to get out or have a show-down.

In these cases, we pursued the same kind of determined and yet restrained policies that we are now pursuing. We must always remember that although the menace of war comes from the Kremlin, hasty and ill-conceived action on our part can lead to grave consequences. I would like to recall to you the words of Winston Churchill from his recent war memoirs:

"Those who are prone by temperament and character to seek sharp and clear-cut solutions of difficult and obscure problems, who are ready to fight whenever some challenge comes from a foreign power, have not always been right. On the other hand, those whose inclination is to * * * seek patiently and faithfully for peaceful compromise, are not always wrong. On the contrary, in the majority of instances they may be right, not only morally but from a practical standpoint. How many wars have been averted by patience and persisting good will. * * * How many wars have been precipitated by firebrands."

No one can foresee the future. Our men are joined in desperate battle in Korea. They are inflicting frightful casualties, estimated at the equivalent of the better part of a Chinese division a day. They are fighting to force the Chinese Reds to abandon the aggression. They are fighting to prevent the untold horrors to us and all mankind of another world war. Let all Americans give them their support. Let us pray for their success. It is shocking that some question the good faith of our allies who are fighting with us.

Let us think back a few years.

In 1940, the Greeks refused to appease, and faced alone invasion against overwhelming odds. The British came to their assistance with the small forces they had available in the Middle East. I was in Cairo in the spring of 1941 when the British troops returned from this honorable but unsuccessful expedition. I know the risks they took and the sacrifice they made to support their ally. Threatened as the Greek people still are, they have sent a token force to Korea. It is a token of their determination to stand with the free nations against aggression. It is a token of honor.

The Turks, under a similar threat of aggression at home, have sent a brigade which has won the respect of all.

The French have been fighting Communist aggression in Indochina for 4 years and have now 150,000 troops engaged in that conflict. Yet they have sent a small force to join us.

The British were quick to send their Pacific fleet and then troops, although they too are engaged against the Communists in Malaya.

A total of 13 nations have sent forces according to their situation and others are preparing to join. Although the preponderance of the forces is ours, we are not fighting alone in Korea. There have been times when other nations have fought alone. I was in England during the year when the British stood alone against the full force of Nazi power. The men and women of Britain stood firm with courage and determination. They took pride in the feeling that they were fighting not only for themselves, but for the freedom of other nations as well. Korea is a vital part, but only a part, of the world-wide struggle in which all free nations are engaged.

Let no man try to tell us that there are any safe or easy short cuts. The years ahead will be difficult. To achieve our objectives we must do many things that will mean many sacrifices. Military strength alone is not enough. Neither military strength nor political stability can be attained without an expanding economy in the free world. America has been the exponent of the concept of an expanding economy with increased productivity. It requires know-how and capital—these we must help to provide. We are all interdependent. The industrial countries need adequate food and increasing quantities of raw materials. The new nations of the east will need the know-how and economic assistance to expand production and to give promise for a decent life for their people. It is only on this basis that there can be political stability.

The resources of the free world are today vastly greater than those of the Soviet Union and its satellites. The Atlantic community alone has about three quarters of the heavy industry of the world, and over 400,000,000 of the most inventive, skillful, and productive people. But the life of the free world cannot survive if it is dismembered limb by limb. We Americans understand this. Strong as we are, we cannot survive alone. But we must use our strength to cement the unity and strength of the free nations.

We are engaged in a great enterprise—the building of a great alliance of freemen for human welfare and mutual security. With the success already achieved, we can have faith that the free nations working together can build the necessary strength and stability to withstand external aggression and internal subversion alike.

Don't let us either underrate or overrate the Soviet capabilities. Don't let us underrate their ruthlessness and determination; their skill in the techniques of subversion and in creating and exploiting weakness; their conviction that they are destined to dominate the world. They believe that freemen cannot stand together; that freemen cannot rule themselves; that free nations cannot be united, but will fight among themselves.

But we should not overrate the strength of Russia on which their operations are based. They are maintaining vast military forces by imposing a terrific burden on their economy and their people. You really have to go to Russia to understand how backward it is. The people have never known what we would consider a decent life. Men and women have to work hard and long hours for very little. But their equipment and organization are so poor that the productivity of industry and agriculture is far behind that of the West. After 35 years of rule, the Kremlin has not been able to gain the loyalty of the people. Stalin himself once admitted this when he told me during the war that the people were "fighting for their motherland, not for us." By "us" he meant, of course, the Kremlin. Russia is ruled by fear. The Kremlin fears the people, and the people fear the Kremlin. Whenever we hear of purges, it is an indication of internal tension. The unhappy people of the satellites crave only to be freed from the iron hand.

As the free world grows stronger, pressures will increase behind the iron curtain. The defection of Yugoslavia was primarily caused by the success of the Marshall plan. Tito saw that there was nothing to hope for but exploitation from the Kremlin in his alliance with Russia. With the improvement of conditions in Western Europe, he wanted economic association with the West. As the free countries become stronger and stronger, their very strength will act as a magnet on the enslaved peoples. There is a brittleness in any dictatorship, but one can never know when it will be strained to the breaking point.

The policies which we must follow have been laid out. We must pursue them unflinchingly.

Our men are fighting in Korea tonight to do their part in preventing another world war and to preserve our freedom. We must face the future, and the long future, with the same courage, determination, and perseverance. I am convinced that we can succeed, and I believe we will succeed.

As I have said, the American people have been magnificent during the past 5 years. It is inconceivable to me that anyone can defect us from our course. The job ahead is even more difficult. But the success we have already achieved in our endeavors gives promise for the future.

Let us not be confused by men of little faith in America's capabilities who say that we can't afford to do the things we clearly must to safeguard our security. Let us not be confused by those who are impatient and would lead us to take reckless steps. Let us not be confused by those who have no understanding of the strength of the great association of free nations that we are building. Let us closely examine what is being said so that we will not be misled by those who are distorting and falsifying the facts.

The wise statesmen of both our political parties have laid out the road to follow: Support the United Nations and its action in Korea; support the North Atlantic Treaty; vigorous and rapid action to rearm; aid to our friends and allies to equip adequately their military forces; work with other nations for an expanding world economy; help the new nations of the east to attain political and economic stability; and strive with all our strength to prevent another world war.

Of first importance is to attain unity of purpose at home for the world-wide struggle. We can then give effective inspiration and leadership for unity in the free world. In the great alliance of freemen we are building, we can have faith that we will rid the world of tyranny, that we can maintain peace, and that freedom will prevail.

First Anniversary of Frank Pace, Jr., as Secretary of the Army

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LYNDON B. JOHNSON
OF TEXAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, recently we passed an anniversary which I believe should be noted in the RECORD. April 12 marked the end of the first year of Frank Pace's service as Secretary of the Army. To my mind, it was a year of accomplishment of the highest order.

When Secretary Pace took over his duties in April 1950, the Army was still suffering from an era in which the Nation believed it could safely reduce its armed strength. All of the services suffered from that false belief, but the ground forces were hit the hardest of the three.

Mr. Pace gave the Army the type of leadership that was needed to launch the expansion program. During his year in office, the ground forces have doubled in strength, and a gigantic procurement program has been launched smoothly and efficiently.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Secretary Pace's Year," from the April 7 issue of the highly respected Army-Navy-Air Force Journal.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECRETARY PACE'S YEAR

When Frank Pace, Jr., took the oath of office as Secretary of the Army, on April 12, 1950, it cannot be said that the service was overly enthusiastic. In his previous position as Director of the Bureau of the Budget, during a period of economy, his diligent pursuit of those duties often conflicted with the interests of the forces of national defense. Happily for the country, however, both Mr. Pace's attitude toward the Army and the Army's regard for him have been modified greatly during the year he has been in office. In fact, there is now a great admiration, one for the other. Although Mr. Pace took over his position at a time when the Army's strength had suffered from an era of penny-pinching, he gave it real leadership and skilled administration through the Korean crisis precipitated only 2 months after he took over. During his year the Army has doubled in strength. A huge expansion and procurement program has been put under way smoothly and capably. Those who have worked closely with Mr. Pace admire particularly his ability not only to organize, but to use an organization efficiently. He is not an independent executive sternly running affairs his own way—he is part of his own organization, guiding it and using it. It is a recognition of this capacity of Mr. Pace's that has led the other Secretaries to choose him, even though he is not the senior member in service or years, as their chairman in the Joint Secretaries Organization, which he played a part in creating and which has quietly accomplished a great deal toward making unification work more smoothly and effectively. Mr. Pace is keenly aware that the success of an organization depends upon the individuals composing it. It is not unusual for him to call an officer informally and tell him that his Secretary is aware of a job well done and appreciates it. The fighting men should know that the project to establish a schedule of combat pay has had his earnest and diligent backing and that the delays which have beset it have not been of his making. Because he is modest and self-effacing, the country at large is probably not conscious of the part he has played in our defense build-up. But the service knows and has come to regard him highly for it.

Replacement of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES P. KEM
OF MISSOURI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, the administration is naive indeed if it entertains delusions that the people are not aware of the real issues involved in the firing of General MacArthur.

In this connection, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter from Mr. Frank W. Ahrens, of St. Louis, to the editor of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, which appeared in the April 29 issue of that newspaper.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROPAGANDA FED FOLK

To the EDITOR:

I, too, have read your recent editorials on the MacArthur, Asiatic, European situations, et al., and have read your editorials over a long period of years; also those of other papers. I wonder why editors and columnists seem to think it necessary to speak patronizingly to their readers.

No one, I think, may question the President's prerogative to dismiss MacArthur; one may question the wisdom of it.

MacArthur has not said he advocates the United States engaging in a war in China. The people of this Nation are being fed the same type of propaganda in behalf of England that they were fed in World War II in behalf of Russia. Some of us were far ahead of Roosevelt and his entourage then, as we are of Truman and his now.

We are not hysterical; we have pondered policies of recent administrations at length; we have reared our children to be loyal, upstanding, useful citizens, and we are sickened by the continuing stupid blunderings of our State Department in foreign policies—policies that bring about situations, as in Korea, where our sons are set up like tenpins to be bowled down by unnumbered Asiatic hordes, with nothing but stalemate in view, unless we seek the ultimate end of war—victory.

We agree with MacArthur, that Russia will go to war when and where she thinks it opportune; further, we think she does not now desire to do so, with the many internal problems she has on her hands. Regardless, though, we feel it better to meet the issue squarely now, and that we should have done so long since.

It would be interesting, indeed, to know percentagewise, the number of men that we have in this Korean mess, as compared separately by nations with the number of those of our "friendly" associates in the United Nations, and likewise, as to casualties, including deaths separately.

There comes a time when patience ceases to be a virtue—that time is long since passed.

FRANK W. AHRENS.

Thought Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I am including as part of my remarks, a timely editorial from the Cleveland Plain Dealer of May 1. We are rapidly indoctrinating this country to the Hitler-Goebbels techniques of controlling public opinion. Just this week I listened to a Government employee up in the military service remark that local civic organizations were being used to direct public thinking. What possible purpose can the Government have in the direction of public thought except as a means of supporting New Deal projects on a socialistic basis. The editorial follows:

THOUGHT CONTROL

A committee of Congress, established for the avowed purpose and investigating and, if possible, discrediting persons and organizations opposed to the administration's socialistic program, demanded that the Committee for Constitutional Government reveal the names of those who had purchased quantities of its books for subsequent distribution.

The committee, which was headed by the late Representative Frank Buchanan, was particularly anxious to find out who had purchased copies of the Road Ahead in which the author, John T. Flynn, exposes the socialistic influences which are behind the so-called Fair Deal's domestic program.

Quite properly, we believe, the request for this information was refused by the Committee for Constitutional Government through its executive secretary, Edward A. Rumely. Any citizen can walk into a store and buy a book without having some Government snooper asking him why he bought it and what he intends to do with it. So why should a citizen who buys 10 or 100 copies of the same book for distribution to his friends, employees, or mere acquaintances be subject to such harassment?

The Buchanan committee, however, cited, Rumely for contempt of Congress. He was recently convicted before a Federal court in the District of Columbia.

Rumely based his refusal to produce the records on constitutional grounds, namely, the guaranties of freedom of speech and press and of freedom from unreasonable searches and seizures. Moreover, he held it was not within the province of the committee, which was presumably investigating lobbying, to demand the names of the purchasers of books published by his organization.

But the Buchanan committee defined lobbying as "any attempt by individuals or group to influence Government decision." This prompted Editor and Publisher to ask: "If the court declares publication of a book is lobbying, then how long before magazine and newspaper articles are included?

"Here is an organization that happened to be registered as a lobbyist. Is the court going to declare because of that, it cannot publish opinions on legislation without revealing who else might subscribe to those views by buyng the book? Are then other publishers of similar views in books, magazines, and newspapers going to be required to register as lobbyists?"

The Rumely conviction is to be appealed. The higher courts, we hope, will take a broader view of the implications in this case. For if the conviction were sustaned, the way would surely be opened to the imposition of thought control regulations under which some Government agency would assert the right to harass and intimidate persons who read literature opposing Government programs.

Dismissal of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KATHARINE ST. GEORGE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, May 4, 1951

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include two articles by Mr. George Sokolsky.

One, under date line of May 3, explaining England's stand in Asia; the other, under the date line of May 4, showing how the simple methods employed by both England and Russia have never been seen through or understood by those in charge of our foreign policy:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of May 3, 1951]

THESE DAYS

(By George Sokolsky)

A byproduct of the MacArthur situation must be an investigation and restudy of our relations with Great Britain. For no matter how it is sliced, Gen. Douglas MacArthur is a victim of the constant pressure of the British upon our State Department and President to have him recalled. Now that he has been officially humiliated, his program is being officially adopted, even to the extent of giving Chiang Kai-shek $80,000,000.

The British attitude toward General MacArthur was in no manner a personal antipathy. MacArthur's attitude toward the Korean war ran counter to the British attitude, and they got their man.

But the American people have never had, from their own officials or the British, an explanation of precisely what the British position toward Asia is and why. Lewis W. Douglas, who is the foremost protagonist of British policy in this country, tried to explain it at the recent Associated Press luncheon. But what he said clarified nothing except that the British sought to keep India within the Commonwealth and, therefore, sacrificed both China and the United States to that purpose.

Mr. Douglas gave no explanation as to the morality of such a position nor did he quiver that such a course has already cost the lives of 10,500 of our sons.

This also appears in the picture and cannot be ignored: British policy in China since 1842 has always been to recognize the de facto ruler of an area, even if that ruler was in rebellion against the established and recognized government. The theory was that trade must go on.

This was one reason why the British rather than the Japanese and Russians were the most disliked foreigners in China for a century. The Chinese assumption was that the British were always seeking to keep China divided and weak. In the great boycott of 1925, the object of the Chinese was to bring the British to heel, and when by 1927 they could show an appreciable success in that enterprise, the authority of the British Empire was damaged, its prestige in Asia was demolished.

British policy in China has been and is mercantile policy. It is dominated by the great firms, Jardine, Matheson, the Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corp., the Chartered Bank, the P & O, the British-American Tobacco Co., and the shipping lines. These and other firms and the manufacturers who supply them have, in recent years, in effect been a cartel headed by Jardine's. They represent a huge investment and are paramount in empire trade.

They are willing to trade with anyone who can pay. This is, granted, a short-sighted policy, for when the Chinese Communists no longer need them, they will cast them aside. But who, on the other hand, can guarantee how long Soviet China will last and what its policies will be 10 years from now? Therefore, why not go forward with trade as long as possible and wherever it is available?

If the British can hold their east Asian trade profitably, great losses elsewhere may be offset. But this is to be observed, namely, that the British will never be able to trade in areas held by Chiang Kai-shek, for he will know how to impose a boycott on British goods, similar to the one he imposed between 1925 and 1927. Therefore, if Chiang Kai-shek is restored anywhere to the mainland, it will be American traders who will benefit.

Throughout World War II and thereafter, it has been British policy to keep American traders out of Asia. They regarded that as their sphere and even took the position that if the United States wanted to restore Great Britain, we ought to be sympathetic to their trading aspirations. Our State Department has on the whole been sympathetic to this British point of view, as I have pointed out on several occasions, particularly in connection with such products as pottery and chinaware.

The British therefore have been pursuing an advantage in the Communist antagonism to the United States and in stimulating the antagonism of the Indians toward us.

This is not altogether speculative because events and forces clarified since June 25, 1950, have established this pattern of activity. Even to this day, British trade has continued with the Chinese Communists, British military goods being delivered to them for use in Korea, not only against Americans but against the British contingents there.

[From the Washington Times-Herald of May 4, 1951]

THESE DAYS

(By George Sokolsky)

Alfred Kohlberg has a wicked, almost a sardonic sense of humor. He is the China lobby that the State Department talks so much about. But he is not registered as a lobbyist because he represents only himself, American citizen, and merchant, who gives of his time and money to good causes, one of them being a constant fight against communism.

So, Kohlberg noticed that the large foundations, looking for ways to expend inherited money, have been setting up institutes and such in our universities with the object of fixing it so that Americans will understand the Russians. He had not noticed that anybody was spending a dime on getting the Russians to understand the Americans. Apparently, that is unnecessary as Americans need not be understood by anybody. In fact, nobody is making any partciularly significant effort in that direction.

So, Kohlberg got the idea that he might go to Russia to see for himself and also maybe to tell a couple of Russians what goes here in the United States. Having no official position, being just a little American who pays his taxes and votes at elections, Kohlberg applied to the Russian Embassy for a blank on which to apply for a visa to the Soviet Union.

He got an answer, which I herewith quote in full:

"DEAR SIR: Your letter regarding your trip to the Soviet Union has been received. Although we comprehend the importance of this visit we regret to inform you that we are not in a position to assist you in this matter. Persons desiring to visit our country for private purposes have normally to enter the Soviet Union as tourists through the travel agency 'Intourist.' During the war this organization discontinued its work and has not resumed it up to the present time. Thus, your trip to the Soviet Union will become possible after the Intourist agency resumes its functions.

"Very truly yours,

"N. SAVCHENKO,
"Chief, Consular Division."

As there is no Intourist agency nobody can go to Russia except an official. Now, all these people who say there is no iron curtain have been made liars by Mr. N. Savchenko, who says there is one. It was pulled down for Americans when the Intourist travel agency left the United States.

Incidentally, that is a new dodge in international relations, the use of a travel agency to control the visits to a country. Soon, nobody will be able to visit China because there is no Chinese travel agency here, or Poland or Czechoslovakia for the same reason.

Kohlberg thinks the Russians are hard to understand. I do not think so. They do things simply. It is their simplicity which is confusing.

For instance, take their war in Korea. They direct it. They provide the arms, munitions, and experts. They arrange for the Chinese to come in after the Koreans are defeated, and for the Mongols and Buriats to come in after the Chinese are defeated. But Russian troops stay out. Therefore, the Russians are not in the war and Americans are warmongers. Nothing could be simpler.

Had we used Chiang Kai-shek's army of 600,000 as they used Mao Tse-tung's army, we would have been able to say that we are not at war but Chiang Kai-shek is at war. Could anything be simpler?

Similarly, the Russians wanted to get rid of MacArthur. Did they do anything about it? Not at all. That would have been too obvious. They stirred up the Indians, who stirred up the British. The Indians made an issue of MacArthur, and the British did not want to offend the Indians as Lewis Douglas told us at the Associated Press luncheon. He seemed to think that nothing mattered but keeping India in the British Commonwealth, not even our more than 10,500 dead sons. So the British put the pressure on Acheson, who put it on Marshall, who put it on Truman, who gave MacArthur the skids.

Could anything be simpler than that? Russians are not hard to understand. Anyone who has had a small girl in his household who knows how to play daddy off against mama ought to be able to understand a Russian. It is as childish as that—but it always works because papa loves Baby Snooks.

Railroad Retirement Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THRUSTON B. MORTON
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. MORTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement and testimony of Thomas Stack at hearings on railroad-retirement bills:

My name is Thomas Stack. I reside at 1104 West One Hundred and Fourth Place, Chicago, Ill. I am president of the National Railroad Pension Forum, Inc., a chartered organization under the laws of the State of Illinois, as a nonprofit educational group comprised of union and nonunion employees subject to the Railroad Retirement Act. We are the largest pension group in the country, with membership on 312 railroads and affiliated bureaus; 90 percent of our organization being members of the various crafts of the brotherhood.

I will try to cite the need for congressional action to remedy an act known as the Railroad Retirement Act that has become obsolete under present economic conditions; it has completely broken down. When the act was created in 1936 to become effective January 1, 1937, it was strictly a retirement system that was looked upon with pride by workers on the railroad, as it promised them security in old age. The tax rate was only 2¾ percent on payrolls up to $300 per month. This tax rate has now increased to 6 percent, and under the present planning will reach 6¼ percent of the payrolls up to $300 per month next January. This is matched by a similar amount by the carriers, so that there is paid for the account of each employee 12 percent monthly by payroll deductions to a system from which they will receive little or no benefits. Those who reach the age of 65 years, which is at present the retirement age, will not and cannot afford to retire on the meager pension they would receive, which would not suffice to give them subsistence during their declining years when medical care and sufferings attributed to age cause an added burden and strain on their financial conditions.

Recently the retirement board concluded their 1950 annual survey and attempted to show with charts and figures that the retirement system was still a success—giving the helping hand to a large segment of our population.

The average annuity or pension received today by the railroad employee is $83.38 per month, with less than 1 percent of the employees receiving the present maximum of $144 per month.

Now let us take a look at the survivor benefits carried under the same report. There are 72,700 aged widows who average $29.53 per month; there are 13,500 widowed mothers who average $27.41 per month; 44,900 children of deceased employees who average $16.93 per month; and 1,100 parents of deceased employees who average $16.53 per month. Are these figures anything to brag about when we have a 50-cent buying power on the present dollar?

In 1938, 1 year after the act went into effect, there were 38,000 employees over the age of 65 years who still continued to work; in 1950 we have 88,800 employees—or an increase of over 50,000—who are over the retirement age and still cannot afford to retire under present meager pensions they would receive, and if you will refer to page 14 of the said report you will find that 843 annuitants returned to work on the railroads as they could not meet their obligations on the small annuity they received. You gentlemen are familiar with the increased cost of living, but let me cite for the record a report from the United States Bureau of Labor statistics regarding the increase in cost of necessities of life between 1937 and November 15, 1950—released on January 12, 1951:

	1937	Nov. 15, 1950	Percent increase
Food	105.3	209.5	99.0
Wearing apparel	102.8	195.0	89.7
Fuel, electricity, and refrigeration	100.2	143.7	43.4
House furnishings	104.3	202.3	94.0
Miscellaneous	101.0	160.5	58.9

Those figures show an increase in living costs of at least 71 percent between 1937, when our act was formulated, and November 15, 1950.

Now, the retirement board always advise that they work on actuarial basis to protect the solvency of the fund. When the act originated it was based on a $3,500,000,000 payroll, which was the maximum payroll in 1937, and it was on this payroll that future obligations were figured. Last year the payrolls on the railroads were $5,030,000,000, and with the increase in salaries early in 1951 the payroll may reach $6,000,000,000 in 1951, so not alone has the tax which averaged 3 percent on the employee and 3 percent on the railroad during the first 10 years of operation doubled at the present time, but the payrolls of the railroads also have doubled which is prima facie evidence that the money or revenue taken in by the retirement board has also materially increased without additional obligation other than the 20-percent increase in pensions given to our employees under the Eightieth Congress, which was the first pension adjustment ever made under the system.

The retirement board still points out that they took on some 48,555 pensioners who paid nothing into the fund and gave them a pension. The average age of these men when taken over from the corporate payrolls was 74 years. There are some 6,960 still living with an average age of 86, but death is rapidly taking its toll and some 2,000 are dying each year, which satisfies the retirement board with the obligation they assumed; there is no longer a drain on the fund.

The railroad employee justly feels that he is either paying too much for what he receives, or is not getting sufficient benefits for what he pays. This Congress must do one of two things—either increase benefits and streamline the act to be useful and operated in the interest of those who pay the freight, or materially reduce the cost more appropriately with the small benefits derived from its operation.

In my capacity I have my hand at all times on the pulse of the rail worker. I have spent some 38 years with the industry myself. I receive thousands of letters on this subject of retirement from every State in the Union and possibly every railroad center of the country. My interests are not selfish and I do not recommend an exhorbitant increase for the widows or survivors when I know that the employee pays the bill and should receive first consideration. The retired worker should be our first consideration.

Two Great Leaders

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN P. SAYLOR
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I would like to include an editorial entitled "Two Great Leaders," which was published in the Johnstown Tribune, Johnstown, Pa., on Monday, April 30, 1951:

TWO GREAT LEADERS

Last week, in London, Winston Churchill said:

"We meet in a grave hour for our country. I cannot recall any period in my long life when mismanagement and incompetence have brought us into greater danger."

That statement was made by the man who took over the direction of Britain's affairs at the time of the Dunkerque evacuation, when Britain's fortunes were at their lowest ebb in the long history of that country. Now Churchill implies that even greater dangers may confront the British people.

"At home," said Churchill, "prices and taxes go up and up, abroad the influence of Britain goes down and down. In every quarter of the world we are regarded by our friends with anxiety, with wonder and pity; and by our enemies, including some of those countries we have helped most in the past like Egypt and Persia, we are regarded or treated with hostility or even contempt.

"Not one of them is so weak they cannot spare a quip or even a taunt for Britain. It is hard to believe that we are the same Nation that emerged from the great war respected and admired throughout the grand alliance for all that part we played, for a long time alone, in the defense of the cause of freedom."

We can well understand Churchill's complaint, for to a great degree it echoes our own. Less than 6 years ago the United States was the most powerful and respected nation in the world. Now it is daily insulted by the Soviet Union, which it saved from disaster in the world war; nations, like India, demand gratuities from us as the price of toleration, but trade respectfully with Red China and Red Russia; Europe declines to move in its own defense unless we provide the arms and many of the men; and in Korea we are hard pressed to turn back the assault of a country with incomparably fewer resources—aside from manpower—than our own.

What has brought this about in so few years? Our productive power is even greater than it was at the end of World War II. The courage of our citizenry is surely no less. Our ingenuity in every field has not deteriorated. We possess a preponderance in the most destructive weapon the mind of man ever conceived. The moral justification of the war we are fighting in Korea has been attested by half a hundred nations. Yet we have somehow lost the respect of the world.

It is full time for those who speak for America to speak firmly, as our Government should. They have been so bewitched by the plausible word "peace" that they neglect other words like dignity and courage and self-respect. There will be no peace in the world, we think, until those in charge of our affairs understand that peace cannot be bought by Marshall plans and point 4 programs and weak yielding to the bluster of the Kremlin tyrants.

That is the message MacArthur has brought to America. And the response shows conclusively that it is the message the United States has been waiting to hear. MacArthur and Churchill reflect the ancient traditions of their respective countries, and speak to the deepest feelings of their people. It would be well for the governments of both lands to listen attentively.

President Mistaken Again

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein an editorial from the Detroit Free Press of April 28, 1951, one of the largest papers published in Michigan.

It is evident that the President is completely in error and uninformed. Although the mistake is small, it further shakes the confidence and faith of the people in the President. The editorial mentioned above follows:

WHITE HOUSE INTELLECTUAL

President Truman's press agents have created a role of scholar and historian for him. This provides no end of fun for the country's professors of history and others who know better.

They are aware that no man, much less Harry Truman, can have such a letter-perfect familiarity with the manifold subjects on which he has latterly taken to holding forth. His performance, which has been impressive of the more google-eyed among Presidential biographers, obviously calls for a concentrated, specific briefing just before he erupts a new load of false erudition.

But whoever looks up the President's material ought to be a little more legible when writing out the notes. Still likening his misadventures with those of Presidents of the past, Mr. Truman told reporters they should read Lincoln Fires a General. The only book anyone can discover with a title something like that is Lincoln Finds a General.

From that he passed to the squabble between President Polk and Gen. Winfield Scott. Here his intellectual ghost didn't read far enough when picking material with which Mr. Truman could dazzle reporters. The whole text makes Scott out a man who had done a large work and merited large treatment. Whereas in dealing with the Polk administration, which Mr. Truman apparently was pointing to as paralleling his, the book says "there was nothing large about the administration * * * the confines of mediocrity hemmed it in."

It is contemptibly cheap pretending to be a profound scholar and lecturing to others as an authority. What the gag is we do not know but it makes the President increasingly ridiculous.

CARE

OF
HON. S. J. CRUMPACKER, JR.
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the La Porte (Ind.) Herald-Argus of March 27, 1951:

CARE

Any American who ever received a letter of thanks from a recipient of a CARE package in Europe will understand something of the meaning of this splendid nonprofit organization which has completed more than 5 years of service. Ten Million Ambassadors is the title of a new booklet about CARE; that's the number of CARE packages sent abroad in the 5 years.

During the years following 1945 when the World War ended CARE brought food, clothing, books and other supplies to millions in Europe who not only suffered extreme privations but lacked hope and morale so essential in rebuilding broken economies. A major force behind this voluntary good will movement was that people's minds and spirits in war-shattered areas had to be revived and given new life. They very thought that someone cared, someone across the ocean, did as much for the recipients as the food and clothing. Letters received from countless families breathed that message of thankfulness that someone did care.

While the economic situation in many European areas is notably better in 1951 than in 1945, there is a wide field in which CARE and other voluntary assistance groups can and must continue to function. As Director French, of CARE, writes there are still millions of "homeless, hungry, and bitter children all over the world" and "millions of sick and despairing men and women who need our help." CARE is only a drop in the proverbial bucket in meeting the need in areas where most of the population goes from the cradle to the grave without knowing the experience of a full stomach, but it is a factor and an important factor in holding back the flood of hunger and despair.

It is and has been entirely voluntary. People who send their money to CARE do so out of the fullness of their hearts, because they have compassion on their fellow man. Their gifts are gestures of good will which register among people of any race, color, or creed.

Rhode Island Independence Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. AIME J. FORAND
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, May 4 is a great day in the history of Rhode Island.

One hundred and seventy-five years ago today Rhode Island took a bold and very courageous step when it adopted its declaration of independence of England.

Under leave already granted me by the House, I include as a part of my remarks two articles on Rhode Island Independence Day which were written by members of my staff. They follow:

RHODE ISLAND INDEPENDENCE DAY

(By Naneen M. Wendler)

This year marks the one hundred and seventy-fifth anniversary of the independence of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations. On this day, May 4, all Rhode Islanders within the State and those throughout the country will join publicly or within their hearts to realize once again the full significance of Rhode Island Independence Day in this year, 1951.

We invite all of our friends to unite with us in voicing anew our esteem of those forefathers who valiantly brought into existence the Rhode Island declaration of independence.

We of Rhode Island are proud to observe our State's independence 2 months ahead of the date of our Nation's adoption of self-government, on July 4, because we can enjoy a twofold opportunity to promulgate our respect to the leaders of the American Revolution and to Roger Williams, our own champion of religious liberty and the true democratic government.

While in Massachusetts, Roger Williams' profound thinking and his determination to establish and fulfill his principle of separation of the church and State brought threats of his deportation to England and he fled to the nearby shores of Rhode Island, founding Providence, the capital city of our State, and becoming the first settler of Rhode Island.

Roger Williams is a man to remember among many men who fought against immense odds for their freedom and ours, and imbued their descendants with an intense regard for those achieved privileges that have kept us strong and enduring against many enemies.

This earnest man's resolute spirit and his love for his fellowman, English or Indian, had a pronounced effect on his contemporaries. These men sought to establish in Rhode Island a colony based upon civil and religious liberties, a doctrine foreign to the laws integrated in the charters of other colonies under English rule.

One of the heroic patriots of that era was Jonathan Arnold who, as the author of the Rhode Island declaration of independence, is worthy of our admiration as one who served zealously in the cause of freedom of thought in politics. Jonathan Arnold distinguished himself as a great statesman in the general assembly of the colony of Rhode Island. An eminent descendant of Arnold, now a United States Senator from Rhode Island, is the Honorable THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, a great-great-grandson, to whom Rhode Island is very much indebted.

After various intercolonial wars and conflicts with royal authority, the decisive step came on May 4, 1776. On that historic day the people of Rhode Island through their general assembly, and in opposition to the majority of the Thirteen Colonies, adopted this formal resolution renouncing allegiance to the British crown.

The general assembly by adopting the Rhode Island declaration of independence truly represented the people of that great State. This step was but the beginning of what has proven to be a government free from the control of others assuring the protection, safety, and happiness of the people.

Thus our people from the very first stage of the State's existence believed in representative government and in the exemplification of faith in the common man.

The wishes of the people of this colony for self-expression and self-control far exceeded the one concession—protection of religious beliefs—granted them in 1663 by King Charles of England. This royal charter, however, proved a primary victory for the colony and is the oldest constitutional charter in existence.

The Rhode Island declaration of independence was accepted by the Continental Congress 2 months after its inception as a model for our National Declaration of Independence.

The same qualities of courage and perseverance that have upheld the tenets of both of these illustrious documents are synonymous with the fortitude displayed today by the people of this Nation in the present crisis and will remain enduring for whatever other crises we may meet.

Rhode Island's generation of today is fully aware of the magnificent traditions that continue as valuable inspirations to us and we are especially honored each year to invite one and all to join us in our annual declaration in memoriam.

Let us keep in mind the impressive words contained in article I of the Constitution of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations:

"In order effectually to secure the religious and political freedom established by our venerated ancestors, and to preserve the same for our posterity, we do declare that the essential and unquestionable rights and principles hereinafter mentioned shall be established, maintained, and preserved, and shall be of paramount obligation in all legislative, judicial, and executive proceedings.

"SECTION 1. In the words of the Father of his Country, we declare that 'the basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and alter their constitutions of government; but that the constitution which at any time exists, till changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all.'"

RHODE ISLAND INDEPENDENCE DAY

(By Edward W. Heroux)

On the 4th of May 1776 the Rhode Island Assembly was truly the representative of the people, and the members of the legislature that adopted the resolution renouncing allegiance to the British King proved themselves faithful followers of Roger Williams. Like him, they were not afraid to take the initiative in leading the way to freedom.

Since that time Rhode Island has grown and progressed in historic achievements, in wealth, and in people. Though the State is small in area, its people are most hospitable.

Roger Williams was a believer in democratic government and rule by the people. He beckoned the spirit of freedom of thought in all things, religious and civil, and out of his ideas there developed a proud sovereign State. The stern puritanic spirit of New England never penetrated the State of Rhode Island. Rather, the dominating spirit is one of congeniality and resourcefulness. The beliefs and hopes of Roger Williams that "no person shall be in any way molested for any difference in matters of religion and every person may have and enjoy his own judgment and conveniences in matters of personal concernments" are still alive in our hearts.

Rhode Island still maintains the original principles of its founder, Roger Williams, in faith, in freedom of speech, in religious liberties, and in a democratic form of government.

In all the educational institutions of our country today there are evidences of the principles and rules that Roger Williams entertained and introduced to his followers.

American boys this very day are giving their lives to preserve the freedom and liberty that fills the heart of every American.

Ten Million Ambassadors

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN A. McGUIRE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Ten Million Ambassadors," which appeared recently in the New Haven (Conn.) Journal-Courier.

The editorial calls attention to the great variety of assistance CARE has sent to Europe during the past 5 years and the significance of these gifts as ambassadors of good will:

TEN MILLION AMBASSADORS

Not many of us, probably, could say if asked that CARE stands for Cooperative for American Remittances to Europe, Inc., but in the past 5 years the American people have sent 10,000,000 CARE packages to relieve suffering in all parts of the world. These gifts, we may be sure, have been eloquent ambassadors of good will. The CARE organization has signalized the fifth birthday by issuing an illustrated report.

General MacArthur says: "All the world knows the work of CARE in Europe where millions of life-giving packages have been distributed since the end of the war. The work of CARE in Japan, and now in the Philippines and Korea, may not be as well known in America, but this work, too, is a matter of gravest import if we are to continue to live in a free and democratic world. I highly recommend the work of CARE and urge its continued support by all Americans."

After World War I, Herbert Hoover's relief service had operated a type of package service to individuals abroad. CARE was born on November 27, 1945, as the child of 21 American organizations working in foreign relief after World War II.

CARE packages have contained not only food and clothing, but a great variety of other supplies, according to the most acute needs at various times and places. As a special measure to save the children of Europe, three new CARE packages—infant food, baby food and baby layettes—were early introductions and single-content packages of flour and lard were set up. Knitting wool, household linen, milk powder, textiles, seeds and many other necessaries followed. To help food production in the East, even plows and hand tools were sent. A Princess Elizabeth wedding gift campaign brought $80,000 in CARE packages distributed to needy widows in Britain. In recent years, CARE in cooperation with UNESCO has provided more than a million dollars worth of books and scientific equipment to more than 400 universities, medical schools, libraries and other institutions in 25 countries. These institutions are training doctors, engineers, farmers and others to help their own people.

Have we crossed the divide and is CARE no longer needed? The executive director reminds us that peace is not yet here. "There are still homeless, hungry and bitter children all over the world. There are still millions of sick and despairing men and women who need our help.

As President Truman has said, "The bridge which you, with the support of the American people, have forged across the two oceans needs to be maintained not only for the purpose of succoring human life but also for interpreting the American role in the world community."

A Couple of Questions for the Probers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN P. SAYLOR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I would like to include an editorial entitled "A Couple of Questions for the Probers," which was published in the Johnstown Democrat, Johnstown, Pa., on Wednesday, May 2, 1951:

A COUPLE OF QUESTIONS FOR THE PROBERS

Senate committee hearings on United States foreign policy—with special emphasis on the Far East—get going tomorrow with Gen. Douglas MacArthur as the first witness.

Unless General MacArthur specifically requests it, Thursday's session will be closed. Subsequent hearings, at which members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and other Government officials will testify, likewise will be conducted behind closed doors.

That is just as well. If the members of the Senate Foreign Relations and Armed Services Committees, sitting jointly, are to learn anything significant, it would seem to be obvious that precautions must be taken to avoid spilling all our secrets to the Commies.

The public, obviously, has a big stake in what goes on behind those closed doors. But the public has a bigger stake in the tragic consequences of the wholesale disclosure of military and diplomatic secrets—because they vitally affect the security not only of our fighting men, but of the Nation as a whole.

In an attempt to balance these considerations, a plan has been worked out whereby a transcript of the proceedings will be released to the press at the close of each session. That transcript will have been combed for information which properly must remain classified.

We sincerely hope that neither political party will regard these hearings in any narrow, partisan sense. These are matters which rise above political considerations. As we go into this inquiry, we should regard ourselves as Americans first and as Democrats and Republicans second.

We hope, however, that the necessary precaution of censorship will not be used as the vehicle for a white-wash or a cover-up, designed to protect either side. Both parties are represented on the investigating committees. Each must regard itself, in a sense, as the watchdog of the public interest.

It would be a mistake, moreover, to funnel this inquiry into the narrow confines of a MacArthur against Truman-Acheson valley. Personalities are the least important of the many vital problems that must be gone into.

In this connection, David Lawrence, editor of the United States News and World Report, has drawn up a number of challenging questions for which answers conscientiously ought to be sought.

"Let us have all the truth about the Attlee-Truman conference," suggests Mr. Lawrence, writing in the current issue of his magazine. He continues:

"Why did our President agree to allow Great Britain to continue to give aid and comfort to Red China?

"What kind of an alliance have we with Great Britain which permits her to ship war supplies to Red China while American boys are being killed with those munitions of war by the Red Chinese? [EDITOR'S NOTE: It was disclosed this week in the British House of Commons that Great Britain had exported goods worth more than $3,500,000 to Communist China during the past 3 months. The president of the British Board of Trade said there is 'no generally accepted definition of strategic materials,' but among the exports listed were such items as iron and steel manufacturers, vehicles (including locomotives, ships, and aircraft), electrical goods and apparatus, and chemicals, drugs, dyes, and colors.]

"What kind of support has India or the Arab countries given to the recent U. N. resolution that brands Red China as an aggressor?

"What has British diplomacy been doing to frustrate United States policies in the Far East?

"Is the dismissal of MacArthur at the behest of foreign governments an evidence that membership in the U. N. means submission by the United States to the dictation of other governments without so much as a formal vote in the U. N. to put each nation on record?

"What U. N. policies * * * did General MacArthur fail to support? When and where were those policies adopted? Can we find anywhere in the public record a statement of those policies of the U. N.? And, if done in secret, by what authority has the President of the United States made such agreements with foreign governments without submitting them to Congress?

"Why has the U. N. become a hotbed of collective treason to its own resolutions? Great Britain, by continuing her recognition of the Government of Red China, has made a scrap of paper of the resolution of the U. N. which branded Red China as an aggressor. Why does Great Britain continually propose that the aggressor be rewarded with a seat in the U. N.?

"Why did the United Nations call upon its members to supply troops to aid Korea and yet refuse to accept the troops of the Nationalist Government of China which has a seat in the U. N. and is a lawful member of that organization? Is that U. N. policy?

"Why do Great Britain, India, and other U. N. members disassociate themselves from our President's order of last June to the United States Navy to defend Formosa?

"Why, when our Government now sends a military mission to Formosa to train troops of the Nationalist Government for defense of the island, is there no U. N. support for that move or any proposal from America that our U. N. allies join in that mission? What kind of a U. N. policy is this?"

These additional questions come to mind:

"Did the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff ever agree with General MacArthur in his recommendations for the military conduct of the campaign in Korea? If so, when did the Joint Chiefs of Staff shift its ground? What considerations prompted the change of view?

Does Gen. Hoyt Vandenberg still believe, as he wrote in the Saturday Evening Post last February, that "isolating the battlefield from reinforcements is the prime function of tactical air, and I am simply stating the military fact that air power was rendered practically inoperative when the U. N., in an effort to avoid a diplomatic rupture with the Chinese Communists, halted offensive action at the Yalu River. * * *"?

What is the record of protests—through official channels—from General MacArthur to the American State Department's abandonment of Chiang Kai-shek while the Generalissimo still was fighting the Communists on the mainland of China?

What is the record of the United States State Department's moves which would have strengthened Russia's hand in Japan during the period General MacArthur so successfully administered the affairs of that enemy land? In the light of what has happened in China since then, is it logical to conclude that the situation in Japan might have been tipped against us, as it was in China, had not General MacArthur largely nullified State Department policy by virtually ignoring Russian demands for an important voice in administration of the islands?

Despite General MacArthur's admitted success in his role of United States proconsul in Japan, why was he removed from that post (which easily could have been divorced from his Korean duties) at the very time arrangements were being pressed for a peace treaty with Japan?

The Pentagon has announced that the President, in relieving General MacArthur, acted on the unanimous recommendations of his civilian and military advisers—including the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Was this unanimous consent the result of a formal meeting, or did the White House call the President's advisers one by one and ask, "You think General MacArthur ought to be fired, don't you?"

The summary dismissal of General MacArthur—without precedent in military history for one who had served so long and so faithfully—deprived him of the right to take formal leave of his troops, or to address a message to the Japanese people. Was this method of dismissal also approved by the President's civilian and military advisers—including the Joint Chiefs of Staff?

What circumstances surrounded the declassification of the top-secret report of the Wake Island meeting between President Truman and General MacArthur? By whose authority was the document released to the New York Times? In that report General MacArthur is said to have assured the President that the Chinese Communists would not enter the war. Did not Secretary of State Acheson express a similar view only a few weeks previously? What did State Department intelligence reports indicate concerning the possibility of Chinese Red intervention?

Was Gen. Omar Bradley, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, asked by the White House to make his Chicago address a day or two before General MacArthur arrived to speak before Congress? Was that Bradley speech cleared by the State and Defense Departments?

What is the whole story of the report of Lt. Gen. Albert C. Wedemeyer, who recommended 5 years ago that we give Chiang military aid and direction—a policy that now, belatedly, is being followed on Formosa? Why did the administration ignore General Wedemeyer's warning that Korea was threatened with Communist invasion?

On January 5, 1950, President Truman said in an official statement: "The United States Government will not provide military aid or advice to Chinese forces on Formosa." What has led to the change in the administration's policy?

On January 12, 1950, Secretary Acheson said, in a speech at the National Press Club: "[The United States] defense perimeter runs along the Aleutians to Japan and then goes to the Ryukyus * * * from the Ryukyus to the Philippine Islands. So far as the military security of other areas in the Pacific is concerned, it must be clear that no person can guarantee these areas against military attack." This line of defense did not include Korea. What is the Joint Chiefs of Staff's judgment as to the probability of this Acheson statement having encouraged Communist aggression against Korea?

In June 1949, at a congressional hearing, the members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff were asked individually whether the Chiefs of Staff advise the "withdrawal of troops from Korea at this time." Each answered affirmatively. Thirteen months later, when President Truman ordered United States troops back into Korea, were the Joint Chiefs of Staff consulted prior to the move? If so, what was their recommendation? If they urged a return to Korea, how do they justify that position with their earlier recommendation that we get out?

On March 20, 1947, Secretary Acheson testified at a congressional hearing: "The Chinese [Nationalist] Government * * * is not approaching collapse. It is not threatened by defeat by the Communists. The war with the Communists is going on much as it has for the last 20 years." How was it possible that our State Department could have been so ill-informed? How does Secretary of State Acheson account for his own overconfidence of the Nationalists' military might in light of his later insistence that Chiang's collapse was inevitable, and that United States policy must be to seek to force a coalition of Chiang's forces with those of the Chinese Communists?

What is the full story of General Marshall's mission to China? Is it true that he originally agreed with a Military Establishment recommendation that we should aid Chiang with arms, and that he later ditched this assessment of the situation and swung around to support the State Department's view that Chiang should take the Communists into his government?

Has the full story of Yalta, Tehran, Cairo, and Potsdam been told? Are there any secret agreements which have not yet been made public?

Have we made any secret commitments not to use the atom bomb or atomic shells or projectiles without prior approval from the United Nations or the military missions of nations with troops in Korea?

How far are the Joint Chiefs of Staff permitted to press, in foreign policy conferences at the White House level, the military realities involved in politico-military decisions? At what point are they forced to surrender to the view of the diplomatic branch?

Would it not be wise to have United States Marine Corps represented on the Joint Chiefs of Staff?

What assurances have the members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff that they will not be subjected to reprisals if they tell the investigating committee the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth? Is it possible that the example set in the ouster of Admiral Denfeld might not serve to seal the lips of the military men?

How can Secretary Acheson account for the fact that virtually every move we have made in the Far East in the last 5 years has resulted in a strengthening of the Communist cause? Is Secretary Acheson completely satisfied that some of our fatal steps have not been engineered by pro-Communists within the Department? There was one Alger Hiss, against whom Mr. Acheson refused to turn his back. Would Mr. Acheson care to state categorically that there are not others?

Out of Our Abundance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WAYNE N. ASPINALL

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, all too often we hear the hackneyed phrase "What can I do?" as an excuse for doing little or nothing. All too seldom we hear the phrase, "Well done, my good and faithful servant," which stands at the opposite pole. I should like to call to the attention of the Members a procedure which dissolves this paradox, and commits the heart to its charge of doing good. We are all aware of the simple letters "CARE" which shall be writ large in the annals of man when we all have gone to our last reward. We are all aware of the great humanitarian uplift of civilization involved in the 21 different organizations which have done so much in the name of Christian charity. Below is an editorial accounting of this organization and the inestimable contribution which it has made to the alleviation of the ills of man and his suffering. I add my "well done" to CARE and to the many peoples who originated this Christian idea and brought it to function. I commend the Daily Sentinel, of Grand Junction, Colo., for bringing it so concisely to the fore, and recommend it to all as proof of living our religious heritage which has had so much to do with the progress we have made in this world.

The editorial from the Daily Sentinel of April 15, 1951, follows:

OUT OF OUR ABUNDANCE

Ever since World War II came to an end, in fact before its close, Americans have been contributing to different organizations dedicated to the relief of misery in war-torn nations. One of the most well-known of these organized Good-Samaritan groups has become familiar to Americans under the name of CARE (representing 21 different organizations working for relief).

Because so many of us have been contributors to it we believe our readers will be interested in some portions of a CARE report recently released. Herein we find that our dollars have helped send 10,000,000 packages abroad—ten million ambassadors of good will, they may rightly be called. Through this package service Americans have shipped the meat equivalent of 26,000 head of cattle, 100,000 pigs, 230,000 canned whole turkeys and 230,000 plum puddings; 32,000,000 cups of sugar; flour for 33,000,000 loaves of bread; 23,000,000 pounds of butter, margarine, lard and cooking oil; coffee enough for 360,000,000 cups; 45,000,000 cups of tea and equal number of cups of cocoa; 56,000,000 quarts of milk; 26,000,000 bowls of rice; 1,680,000 cans of baby food and chocolate equaling 220,000,000 candy bars.

To this almost fabulous list of food supplies may be added great amounts of soap, blankets, shoe soles, towels, buttons, coal, plows, tools, books, nursing bottles and medical supplies. On the clothing side, we note that 426 miles (not yards) of woolen cloth, and 204,000 sweaters, scarves and pairs of socks have gone to warm the cold in many nations around the world.

Tragically, the need for such services as CARE has been rendering does not lessen. Each year since its organization more countries have been added to its lists, until now boxes with the welcome word CARE on their sides go to every continent. Korea is the latest war-victim beneficiary—but we fear it will not be the last.

Americans have a right to be proud of their postwar record of giving to the foreign needy. They would, on the other hand, have cause for deepest shame had they not shared their abundance with all these unfortunates. And the extent of the abundance with which our land is blessed may be realized from the fact that in all this giving we have actually deprived ourselves of nothing, but gained intangible rewards that cannot be measured.

Catholic Action Follows the Way of the Cross

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN A. McGUIRE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include in the RECORD the prize-winning oration for girls by Miss Nancy Jones, of the Academy of the Holy Cross, in the twentieth annual oratorial contest sponsored by the Catholic University Conference of Clerics and Religious held at the Catholic University gymnasium on April 15:

CATHOLIC ACTION FOLLOWS THE WAY OF THE CROSS

(By Miss Nancy Jones)

Scientific progress, outward evidence of social advancement, and the calendar mark the year 1951. Yes, centuries of time have altered the material scene, but time can never affect the spiritual. It is the atomic age, an era of jet-propelled speed reflected in the minds and bodies of men. The physical and mental make-up of the man of 1951 would be an improvement over that of Neolithic man, but the spiritual capacity is still the same—its purpose is still to know and love God. The accelerated pace of the twentieth century, perhaps, attempts to omit that part of man's construction which cannot be improved by experiment. Only a privileged few have the power to realize that the most important part of man—the soul—is immortal—it has always been—it will always be. It is the task of this privileged group to find the key to slowing down those absorbed in the atomic age for a picture of what they are missing. Finding this key is a continual search and it takes the spiritual scientist centuries back into history. The hope of this age lies in the kingdom of Jerusalem in the eyes of a carpenter from Nazareth. His life story offers abundant examples to those who desire lessons in Catholic action. His life is a tragedy that can never be equaled, but it is a tragedy that ends in a glorious triumph of Easter. His way—the way of the Cross—is the only way for those who would change the world!

It begins in a garden and the agony is at first not from physical pain, but from mental torture—it is the ever haunting suggestion of the "easy way out." It is a familiar story to you when faced with obstacles, ridicule, suffering. "Let this chalice pass from me."

You find it hard to face failure—you find it hard to forego a passion—you find it hard to accept humiliation. Is your answer one of hatred, bitterness, or despair, or is your answer as His was—"Not My will, but Thine be done"—accompanied by a ready acceptance of whatever the Father sees fit to send?

The poor, lacerated, thorn-crowned Christ looks with pleading, tear-dimmed eyes over the whole world. Are you he who condemns Him? Is it your denial of legitimate authority that crushes His as you seek to gain control of power, satisfaction of selfish whims, or the admiration of a fickle populace?

Or are you another Simon of Cyrene whose shoulder helps to bear the weight of the Cross? Is it your strength that lessens the ponderous weight of sin? Catholic action speaks louder than words. Your individual movements to give a hand to that which is all good can effect a united effort in your home, in your school, and your community.

In your home by the cheerful acceptance of tasks, by the avoidance of arguments, by contributing your share of all that makes for the happiness of every member, by encouraging family prayer, and family participation in the sacraments.

In your school are you another Simon by encouraging faithful observance of rules, by earnest and concentrated study, by participation and wholehearted support of every project, by helping those less gifted intellectual and social pursuits?

And in your community do you lead others by word and example to a fuller share of the mystical body of Christ by advancing parish activity, by strictly abiding by community laws?

As you follow Christ on His way to Calvary, your good example may attract a number of the on-looking crowd to the eternal riches of Catholicism.

Jesus falls—one, twice, thrice, and yet He rejects the warmth of the earth, slowly and deliberately returning to His feet. Is your battle of the spiritual over the material so perseveringly fought—the struggle against the warmth of earthly possessions? Can you rise as determinately above the intolerance of race and creed; can you place your feet in the bloodstained steps of the Divine Leader and put away the allurements of the world to accept the wood of the Cross that leads to eternal salvation?

Jesus encounters the minority of the passionate mob who believe. Again always ready to meet those who ask His help, He stops to comfort the weeping women. He who has been dragged through the very depths of humiliation and anguish; He who bears the crucifying weight of our sins, stops to think of others. "Weep not for Me, but for yourselves and for your children."

Perhaps you are having a hard time, perhaps everyone is against you, perhaps your allowance or income is small—so long as there is anyone in need, you have a divine responsibility to care for him, to pray for him, to comfort him, to contribute to his relief, directly or indirectly. The lay apostle must put the interests of God before those of his most earnest desires.

Or are you one of the jeering throng? Spineless, weak, unable to say "no" to the taunts of many? Your singular "no" echoing in the hearts of those attracted to good could initiate a positive stand against the jeers and outrages of communism. Your Catholic action could be and should be a shield against the words that drive the nails into the hands of the Saviour. Your "no" could be the Catholic's ringing answer to the iron curtain.

Patience, humility, fortitude, love—the very essence of these as He hangs from the cross, His arms outstretched to encircle and forgive. All powerful, omniscient, and yet He perseveres in the complete injustice of it. He died that you might live. Each one of us must die to himself that Christ might live and wax beautiful in the lives of others. Catholic action is in your hands, the responsibility is yours to accept as did the good thief; singular among many. The good thief found the truth. He was shown it by Him who is the way, the truth, the life. He found it because he stood alone. Can you stand alone in the face of immodest dress, drinking, and sinful conversation? Can you by the purity of your life influence others to recognize the true Christ and claim a remembrance in Paradise?

The road to Calvary is long—it is the span of a lifetime—your lifetime. It is a road that has been traveled down through the years, every minute, every second by those who have pledged themselves to take up Christ's work and to win all to His standards.

In the very first years of Boys Town, one evening Father Flanagan stood watching the setting autumn sun radiate the sky, and as he did so, he saw a sturdy young lad carrying a crippled boy in his arms, "Isn't he heavy, son?" he called. "He ain't heavy, Father, he's my brother."

This story, I think, is the twentieth century's reality of the cross. It is inspiration for all of us—individuals, families, communities, and nations. You as Simon must look to all as your brother and in reaching out a helping hand, lift the burden of your fellow men regardless of creed, color, or social standing. The way of the cross—your way—is the way of Catholic action.

Pennsylvania Federation of Young Republicans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN P. SAYLOR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, April 28, 1951, the southwest regional conference of the Pennsylvania Federation of Young Republicans was held at Johnstown, Pa. This conference was attended by over 300 delegates, representing a 22-county area of southwestern Pennsylvania. These young people, the leaders of the future, heard an inspiring address by the Honorable HORACE SEELEY-BROWN, Representative in Congress from the Second District of Connecticut.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include a copy of his address:

My fellow Americans, it is a particular pleasure for me to be with you here in Johnstown tonight. The honor of being able to share in this Southwest regional conference of Pennsylvania Young Republicans is one which I deeply appreciate.

As a former State chairman of the Connecticut Young Republicans, it is certainly inspiring for me to see you in action. I congratulate you for the effective way in which you maintain your organization, not just in the heat of the campaign, but in the long "between times" when the most valuable political work must be done.

I am especially happy to come to an area which is so well represented in the Congress of the United States. I can speak with both affection and pride of my Pennsylvania colleagues JIM VAN ZANDT, of the Altoona district; JOHN SAYLOR, of the Johnstown district; LOUIS GRAHAM, of the Beaver Falls, Butler County district; JIM FULTON, of the South Hills district; BOB CORBETT, of the North Borough district; HARMAR DENNY, of the East End Wilkinsburg district; CARROLL KEARNS, of the Erie-Sharon district; LEON GAVIN, of the Oil City district; ED SITTLER, of the Uniontown-Somerset district; and AL BUSH, of the Fifteenth Pennsylvania District.

Their splendid record as representatives of the people furnishes the opportunity for all of us to take a mead of pride in them as products of an active, hard-hitting, Young Republican organization.

Nor can I pass by the opportunity to say a word of the admiration which forward-looking Connecticut Republicans have, as have Republicans throughout the Nation, for your own vigorous, dauntless, and, above all, sound and sincere Senators ED MARTIN and JIM DUFF.

I come from a district where the election of a Congressman has been a nip-and-tuck proposition for most of the past 50 years. During the last 18 years only one Congressman from my district has ever been elected to succeed himself, and then only once, although three of us have been elected for two terms, but not consecutively.

You will appreciate, therefore, that my own campaign for reelection necessarily begins on the very day after I am first elected. There isn't any "me too" formula that works in the Second District of Connecticut. I must also add, that the people are too smart to go along with any blind and unreasoning opposition that is merely the outs against the ins.

I personally do not rely too much on political rallies, although, naturally, along with all political candidates, we have to take them in stride. I believe that as a party we must carry our Republican message more directly to the people.

During the past campaign, I called personally on thousands of men and women. I talked with them individually and in small groups.

I called upon housewives in their homes, and arranged for some of them to hold small informal meetings at which I talked in a conversational way, not a speech-making way, about their many problems. I learned, first-hand, of many of the things they were thinking about, of many of the things that were bothering them. Incidentally, each housewife received a Seely-Brown potholder as a reminder of our visit. I gave away 15,000 of these holders in person. Election night proved that my friends had taken heed of the slogan printed on each holder, "Make a note, remember to vote for SEELY-BROWN for Congress."

I am telling you these things about my own district, only because I am sure that you are greatly concerned about making the Republican Party the party of the majority of the people, and in making 1952 a Republican victory year. I believe my own experience as a candidate and as a Congressman may be of some help in this effort.

I am firmly convinced that, without the voting support of the women in my district, I would not have been elected. I believe that in every district, if we are going to elect a Republican Congress and a Republican President, we must convince the women that our Republican Party has the program and the candidates who are best qualified to give them that which they seek most from their Government—some assurance of peace and prosperity, and an aggressive regard for the lives and the livelihood of their families.

Right along this line, while we are talking about getting the voting support of the women, I would like to make an additional comment. I think we have been giving more lip service than sincere effort when it comes to admitting women to full partnership in the day-to-day activities of the Republican Party on every level. I fear we have been too backward about recognizing their qualifications and availability for many more positions in the party and in the Government than they are filling today. And I can say that, with no fear of being misunderstood, because my opponent last fall happended to be the only woman on the congressional ticket of any party in the last election in Connecticut.

Do you remember back to the election campaign of 1946? The Republican Party made a big mistake that time. Not about the slogan that summarized the thinking of so many thousands of people: "Have you had enough?" The votes on that election day told that most of the people believed that they had "had enough" of the Truman administration. So they elected a Republican Congress. Unfortunately, too many Republicans considered that election as a mandate to order a detour from the pathway of progress.

That attitude was a grievous mistake, a fatal error from the standpoint of the immediate fortunes of the Republican Party—worse, indeed, than the feeble and futile "me-too's" to which the people have so emphatically turned deaf ears in the last three presidential elections. So that when the 1948 election rolled around, the electorate did a little mental arithmetic saying nothing from nothing leaves—nothing—and returned Truman to office with a Democratic Congress. You ask—but why dwell on that?

We had better dwell on it. We had better give careful thought and make a careful analysis of the detailed returns of at least the last three elections. If we do, surely we can learn some things that will help us in the next one.

During my house-to-house campaign last fall—and I use the phrase literally—I found that the people without exception were sorely distressed about the way things were going in our Government. The war in Korea, into which we blundered, the threat of world war III, the inflation that always keeps rising prices several steps ahead of wage increases, the squandering of the billions that had been appropriated to provide the military preparedness that, when the need came, we didn't have—all these aroused the fury of the people, made them lose confidence in the Democratic administration; but at the same time, they had their doubts about the ability of the Republicans to do any better.

Well, for those who are in office, it is up to us to prove that the Republican Party does have the leadership and the program that will give to our Nation strength and unity and the opportunity to enjoy our freedom. I can say very truthfully that we have many good men and women on the Republican side, both in the Senate and in the House. We have powerful voices and able leaders outside of Congress. We need the help of all of them to make everyone in the party realize that the problems we must deal with are problems of 1951 not of 1898; that the war we must try to prevent is world war III, not the Spanish-American War. We've got to get rid of those whose great weakness is that for them the past has never stopped being the present.

So far as I am concerned, I consider my own best campaign procedure for election to the Eighty-third Congress, and the way in which I can serve my country and my party best, is to be just the best Congressman from the Second Connecticut District that I know how to be.

I don't consider that this means spending all of my time with my ear to the ground. Of course, I want to know at all times what the people of my district are thinking about. I want to know what's bothering them, what their problems are; and, if the last 2 weeks are any indication, I am certainly sure they'll continue to let me know, by letter and by telegram, and frequently by personal contact, how they feel about matters of current attention in the Government.

So that this won't be a one-way proposition, I propose to let them know, just as directly and as simply as I can, what I am doing in Washington, and why. For that purpose, we are publishing, from my office, the Seely-Brown Newsletter, which goes out every 4 or 5 weeks thus far, although soon it may be more frequently, to explain the matters of current debate, or of administrative action; to report how I voted upon each item of legislation, and a detailed explanation as to why I voted as I did; and to furnish, in the same style that those syndicated columns do, short tidbits of news to give the inside story on some items of interest.

These days of the Eighty-second Congress have been exciting times in Washington. In spite of the clashes of tempers and of emotions, that have attracted so much attention the country over, it is my opinion that we are closer to national unity to meet the crisis we are in, than presently appears. We have lost a great statesman and a great Republican, in Senator Vandenberg, who, in his days of strength, was an instrument in proposing and trying to bring about, without very much cooperation from the White House and the State Department, I might add, a real nonpartisan foreign policy. I use the term "nonpartisan" advisedly. Too many, when you speak of a bipartisan foreign policy, think it has to mean saying "Yes" to a bad administration program, with the formulating of which they have had nothing to say. By nonpartisan, I mean the product of the best judgment of the best minds of those in both parties, in the interest of national unity and the best interests of our country. Our policy abroad, whether for Asia or Europe, must be nonpartisan in conception, direction, and implementation.

This is one of the most pressing needs in Washington today. We could learn something valuable from our British allies on this point. Churchill and Morrison, Tory and Laborite, may fight savagely in Commons on the muddy footprints of socialism as it affects the lives of every Britisher; but when it comes to foreign affairs, they speak in unison as Englishmen.

The $100-a-plate Democratic speakers sent out from Washington are calling the Republicans "the war party" now. They're evidently adopting the old strategy of the prize ring: A good attack is the best defense.

We must face the uncertainties of the future without bitterness and without rancor, as General MacArthur so well said in his historic address at the joint meeting of Congress. He summarized for the Congress and for the people of this Nation, the facts, most of which were well known, about the decision which we must make regarding the situation in Asia. The President makes the foreign policy, and he is responsible for the political situation; and he is the Commander in Chief of our Armed Forces, and thus is in full charge of the military situation, as has become painfully apparent, not only by the exercising of his authority by the removal of MacArthur, but also by his making a political stooge out of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, General Bradley.

How, then, can the Republicans be "the war party," for going along with the recommendations of MacArthur, for steps to end the fighting in Korea with victory for the arms of the United Nations?

Need I remind you that the war started under a Democratic administration—as did World War I and World War II. But then it wasn't supposed to be a war, but only a police action; and perhaps that is why the President, as General MacArthur said in his speech to Congress, didn't consider it necessary to consult the supreme commander in the area affected, when military intervention to repel aggression was decided upon.

Except for the removal of our military strength in Southern Korea beginning in January 1950, the aggression of June 1950 couldn't have taken place, and no police action with 60,000 casualties would have been necessary.

Except for the mothballing of our aircraft carriers, and the practical dismantling of our Armed Forces under Secretary Louis Johnson's idea of economy, we could have stopped the aggression in Korea, before Red China could get into the picture. You will remember that another great commander was removed—Admiral Denfeld—because he told Congress he thought it was a mistake not to build the superaircraft carrier that Truman and Johnson had scrapped after the keel was laid. They broke Denfeld, but the carrier is being built now. We could have used it to good advantage, if we had it now.

They removed MacArthur, called him a warmonger, but it looks already as though at least two of the four steps that he recommended in Asia are about to be carried out—the strengthening of the Chinese Nationalists in Formosa and an economic blockade of Communist China. The Army is sending a military mission of 100 high-ranking officers to help the Chinese Nationalists, which may be just the beginning—and the British, so a dispatch from London says, are ready to needle the United Nations to invoke economic sanctions against Red China.

The point I would like to make, especially in the situation pertaining to war or peace which we face in the world today, is that no event—no act—stands by itself. Each is a part of a chain. Most of the troubles that we in the United States face today—the overhanging threat of world war III; the indecisiveness when thousands of lives are at stake—are part of a chain that began with bungling in high places in the administration in Washington.

In closing, let me say that our unfortunate policies of the past have brought us now to the brink of world-wide disaster. We are entering a long period in which we must subject ourselves to many restrictions which we as a people would not tolerate in more peaceful times.

All of us in every walk of life—in every profession or calling—must ask this question: "Am I going to lead in the scramble for the self-protection of my own special interest, or shall I stand up and dedicate my thinking, my action, and my prayers to the protection of my country?"

Stern policies lie ahead. As a legislator, it is my responsibility to insist that these policies be considered carefully in committee and the issues debated freely, fully, and without partisanship on the floor of the House.

Stern policies can be effective only if the public understands fully the reasons why these policies are needed. The people of our Republic have never been afraid of the truth.

The time is now. Our very survival is at stake.

I Want Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FREDERIC R. COUDERT, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. COUDERT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article written by a former Member of the House of Representatives and former Ambassador, the Honorable Herbert Pell:

I WANT PEACE

(By Herbert C. Pell)

(I know how easy it is for an ignorant politician to yell "Communist" when he is at a loss for an answer or desirous of covering himself with a smoke screen. That is why I write this personal note. I should be among the first to be destroyed by communism. I am nearly 70 and have never been in business. I have lived all my life on invested property as did my father and mother and my grandparents and most of my greatgrandparents before me. Economically I represent everything to which communism is hostile. I am one of the comparatively few Americans every one of whose ancestors became a citizen of the United States on July 4, 1776. I have always loved and enjoyed liberty. Since the day of my first effort in politics I have worked for personal freedom for all. I have lived in totalitarian countries and loath what I saw there. I know that a Communist government will inevitably degenerate into a totalitarian autocracy which is the opposite and the implacable enemy of everything I have enjoyed, of every material policy that has served me, of everything I have respected and of everything I have loved.)

I am for peace. I am for minding our own business. I am particularly opposed to a policy which boils down to an effort to impose American ideas and customs on other nations. This does not mean that we should not recognize the duties and responsibilities of our position.

We must properly understand the situation of the United States. This country is the leader of the free world which is a very different thing from being the free leader of the world. We are the first of a group of associates. We cannot act as the owner of slaves, as the paymaster of hirelings or as the dominator of satellites. The nations on our side are weaker and poorer than we are either because they are smaller or because they have suffered more, but they are not slaves, servants, or sycophants; they are free nations and can be led by their willing consent or not at all. We cannot treat them as tools to be broken in our interest. When we assume the burden of leadership, we assume at the same time a responsibility for the interest of those whom we lead. We cannot offend their conscience or sacrifice them for our own gain.

Are we to rush by ourselves all alone on a course of military adventure without the assistance, without even the sympathy of other nations which might have supported us in a less dashing policy. It is, of course, true that a leader must lead but another essential of leadership is to have followers. We cannot wisely ask the world to look to us for guidance if we obviously intend to consider no counsel but our own. The career of the Kaiser and of Hitler, as well as the example of Stalin should have taught us to consider the inevitable end of the largest and strongest lone wolf.

Intelligently we must recognize that the United States cannot be alone in the world. It cannot long remain prosperous in a company of ruined nations. So much is obvious. For a good many years to come, the core of individualist economy—if that economy is to survive at all—must be a prosperous United States. It is manifest that we cannot as a Nation continue as the leader and the bulwark of a civilization based on the assumption that peace is the normal condition of mankind if we persist in a policy of military adventure or turn ourselves into an armed camp.

If the United States is to be the first Nation of the future, if we are entering on the American century, let us hope—and do what we can to make it so—that the period of our leadership will be a period of peace, amity, and prosperity rather than a time of subordination for the world under the rule of a people themselves oppressed by the tools of their dominance.

Peace is not always easy to maintain: At the present moment its maintenance is and will be for sometime extremely difficult. As Governor Dewey once said, "We must wage peace."

Twice in our time we have seen that total war (and there is really no other kind possible) decides nothing, settles nothing, answers nothing, and leads to nothing. Winner and loser, both are vanquished. Is there a single nation on earth that got, by any imaginable system of accounting, a net gain out of either of the two wars we have lived through?

War is not a natural thing. It is the bankruptcy of leadership. It is the final and glaring proof that the governors of the world are not fit for their positions. Hatred of a foreign and unknown country is a drummed-up thing, and above all it is no essential part of patriotism, any more than hatred of your neighbors is an essential part of family love.

Peace is the only possible base for our civilization. It was built on peace and without peace it will die. War will ineluctably end the customs and the outlook and the way of life, the ideals and the national purposes which we inherited from our fathers to be held as a sacred trust for our children.

The inevitable result of war will be the complete destruction of everything that we value and the cutting of the taproots of democracy in the world. Manifestly with the effective end of prosperous democracy in the United States all freedom on earth must inevitably perish.

Can we afford to antagonize all other countries which normally would support us?

I have lived in totalitarian countries; I have seen independent nations lose their spiritual strength. I suggest an illustration which may at first appear unimportant. When I was a boy I traveled a great deal in Italy before the first war. I remember going to cafes in the summer, where the people sat around in groups up to a dozen at a table, all talking freely. I don't suppose 1 conversation in 20 had anything to do with politics. In 1938, I drove my son from Naples to Vintimiglia. The people still sat outside of cafes in summer, but they were at tables of two or three and their conversation was in whispers. Again, I believe that only a small proportion of these conversations were political, but the habit of fear controlled the minds of the people.

War will certainly destroy many forms of private property and of private investment and will practically annihilate all private business. From five to ten million at least of the best and most effective workers will be withdrawn from peaceful production. From fifteen to twenty more will be forced to devote their energies to the manufacture of articles of war. This will come pretty near to cutting our productive labor force in two. War priorities will reduce the manufacture of automobiles, houses, electric goods, roads, schools, hospitals, and everything else that we consume to the lowest possible level.

I have lived in countries where just this thing happened. I have gone through cities which I remembered as prosperous and active and found them like ghost towns with empty shops, hungry people, no traffic and above all, no hope and no liberty.

Another war with its crushing taxes will certainly mark the end of capitalism. Private capitalism depends on private investments and private investments depend on the willingness of people to forego present pleasures for future security and income. When my father forewent the expenditure of $100, he thought he was getting $5 a year for the rest of his life and $5 a year to be divided among his descendants for an indefinite time. Today the Government takes a great part of this return for income taxes and a lot of the capital in inheritance taxes. The result is that people will be less willing to save; less willing to give up present enjoyment for a much smaller ultimate gain. In the meanwhile factories must be erected; houses must be built; electricity and water supplied to new developing districts. Where is the money to come from? As these are necessities of life, it must obviously come from the State, which means socialism, and the administration of an increasing part of our economic structure by the Government.

It is quite certain that the Government will be obliged willy-nilly to do much more than this. It must direct the energies of the people into the canals which it will select. A man will not be able to build a hotdog stand or toy shop unless he can get materials allocated to him by the Government which practically means permission to go into the business, and he will not be allowed to do so, if the Government believes that a drug store or a fountain pen factory are more needed. With this extension of Government control of the economic lives of the community, there will inevitably come a system of censorship and the loss of all freedom of expression. We will be further and further from that idea of American liberty once expressed by an unknown cowboy, who said that he wanted to be able to look any man in the eye and tell him to go to hell.

Shortages inevitably mean rationing and rationing means Government control. But things will, and everybody knows it, go much further than that. With insufficiencies everywhere, the allocation of every short supply must be—or at least certainly will be—in the hands of the Government. Officials—wise or unwise—probably good men but not all-knowing, will have to decide what buildings shall be erected and what goods are to be produced. This is so obvious that no one can suggest any other policy. If there should be, as in the case of war there certainly will be, not enough steel to go around it would be obscenely indecent to allow one man to build himself a yacht merely because he could outbid the community.

There will be no field day for labor. There will be no overtime and no holidays taken at will when pockets get full, no shopping around for pleasant profitable or interesting jobs. Labor will be drafted in an all-out war and the workman will have no more freedom than the soldier. He will go where he is sent and do what he is told and get what the Government chooses to pay him and whatever that may be, it will not buy him very much.

All the improvements in labor conditions which I have seen coming in the last 50 years—many of which I fought for during the course of my career—will fall like trees in a hurricane. Strikes of laborers in factories will be as impossible as strikes of soldiers at the front. Anyone who is willing to think for 5 minutes must know all this and nobody thinking for a month can suggest anything else. I have seen this in other countries and I do not want to see it here.

Independent thought, independent expression will be crushed. The self-respect of free and thoughtful citizens will be destroyed by the continued knowledge that it is only at their own risk that they dare whisper any criticism of the elected officials of the Government. These would be the consequences of a great war.

Today, does any sane person believe that a conflict with Russia will mean anything but mutual destruction and ruin? Do we hope to overrun Russia as Germany was overrun and occupy it as Germany was occupied, and then build it again, as we are doing Germany and Japan into something very like what it was before? What do we plan to do with a victory?

It is manifest that a war with Russia will end in a collapse of common exhaustion. The representatives of a shattered Russia will meet the emissaries of a worn and exhausted United States and devise a means by which both can survive without continuing mutual slaughter and destruction. Is there any person in the world who imagines any other result possible?

Thirty years ago we tried to establish a democracy in Germany. The Germans are an educated and industrious people, accustomed to cooperation, but having had no experience in the workings of a democratic government, they were unable to maintain the structure of freedom and found themselves like the man in the Bible whose devil left him and returned with seven other spirits worse than himself. Are we going to make this same mistake again in dealing with Russia?

We are often told that we cannot negotiate with Russia. The Russian Government will not keep its word. Its guarantees and solemn promises mean little or nothing. Does any sane person believe that after wrecking the Russian Army, destroying the structure of the Russian Government, there will emerge from Russia a group of negotiators of greater integrity who will be more desirous of keeping their agreements and, what is equally important, will have the power to enforce them at home?

It would be absurd to imagine that such a negotiation would be an easy or routine affair.

Russia has experienced enormous changes in the last 30 years; it is certain that the course of change is not yet run. The centers of political power and economic interest are far from fixed. We cannot expect a treaty with the government of such a country to endure very long—the best that can be sensibly hoped is imperfect and temporary, but even a temporary calm will allow the billows raised by the earthquake of war to subside a little, and every bit of calm makes stronger the settlement and integralization which can be the foundation of something more solid.

Our negotiators will be in the position of Eliza crossing the river. Pursued by bloodhounds, she arrived at the Ohio. She jumped on a floating piece of ice which could give her no prolonged footing, but was at least solid enough to provide a place from which she could leap to a second and a third, hoping that a fourth would drift along and that eventually she would arrive on hard ground. The temporary security of a cake of ice, even though it only deferred ultimate disaster, kept open the possibility of at last reaching land. It was better than bloodhounds or cold water. She would of course have preferred to cross by a bridge or ferry boat, but no boat or bridge presenting itself, she took a poor chance rather than accept inevitable failure.

I am perfectly certain that our system—the American system which everybody knows and which no one can accurately define—is, of all social structures existing today, the one which is most capable of development; most able to maintain itself; and especially that it can with the fewest and least dangerous repercussions alter its course to meet the strains of changes in the social and economic balance. After all, it has lasted without fundamental alteration for a century and a half, which is more than can be said of any government in the history of the world—even those which like the British have accepted basic changes in time to avert bloody revolution.

One of the things which we have most certainly learned from history and from our own observation of Mussolini and of Hitler is that dictatorships are impermanent affairs. The only possible opposition to an autocrat is revolution. Therefore, it does not take long for every criticism to be suppressed as revolutionary. In a short time we hear of such absurdities as "capitalistic biology"—a recent Russian contribution, which shows that truth can always outrun satire.

Germany, in 1930, was as far ahead of the world in the study of atomic fission as is the United States today. After only 8 years of Hitler's government, the old and well integrated scientific world of Germany was shattered, and when called on to develop the atomic bomb, its disorganization was such that no effective progress could be made.

No dictatorship has ever been able to provide for an orderly succession of power. A dictator does not dare to make use of the best and strongest men. He fears that they will be intriguing for his place; that is why every dictatorship is weakened by sycophancy, nepotism, and bureaucracy.

Bodies can be enslaved; intellect can only be suppressed.

That is why I believe that time is on our side. In spite of crises and economic waves, which Communists believe will overwhelm us, it seems to me that if we hold firmly to real liberty and strive to extend it, it will be we, and not the worshippers of organization, who will most thrive. In the long run a people which controls its government will outlast a government which owns its people.

Our only peril comes from within ourselves; we may forget that our strength is liberty, and liberty is our strength. Thirty years ago I put into a Democratic State platform this phrase: "If the rights of the meanest and the most unpopular are traversed, the rights of all are in danger." Liberty cannot be a private possession, nor can it long be partial. It is universal and entire, or it will soon be nothing.

The real difficulty lies in the fact that the negotiators on both sides fear disapproval by the politicians at home. You can't buy a second-hand bicycle without some bargaining. The offers gradually come together, but there will never be any agreement if the seller fears he will be hanged as a traitor if he accepts a dime less than the original demand, and the buyer knows that he will be pilloried as an appeaser if he raises the bid by a quarter.

I do not know how it is in Russia, but in the United States today every person who dares to express the obvious fact that compromise is better than the best conceivable result of any possible war—which is the real belief of thinking Americans—finds himself attacked and stabbed on all sides by men sitting safely in public offices, who know very well that come what may, they will be safe from any enemy. Here, there, and everywhere you hear them shouting against compromise, calling the world to witness that their only desire is to shoulder a musket and face the wicked foe. It is only the superior quality of their patriotism that prevents them from selfishly indulging this wish. They must for the good of the Nation remain in public office while they cheer on the envied heroes.

Every radio blares hatred for the simple reason that it is profitable to do so. A radio commentator is paid according to the number of people who will listen to him, and particularly according to the number of hearers he can attract who are stupid enough to believe that Thing-a-bob Soap, or Somebody's Toothpaste, or What's-his-name's Breakfast Food is better than any other on the market, simply because it hires a brighter comedian or a more exciting commentator.

As such people obviously will not think clearly in their own interest when buying soap, toothpaste or breakfast food, it is extremely doub'ful if they will be willing to devote any serious thought to the public interest. They prefer phrases like "the best wash by gosh," or "hustle builds muscle" as guides to spending their own money, and want very little more for the formulation of their opinions. It is manifestly easier to excite such an audience than it is to force it to comprehend the simplest of reasoning.

This is why so many of the widely-heard commentators devote themselves to exaggeration and fear, and as far as I know, not one of them to advising calm consideration and certainly not one who dares to suggest asking the community to think for itself and answer the question—what we expect to do with a victory when we get one at enormous cost.

They have the effrontery to attack as cowards all who disagree with anything they shout.

The whole thing is contemptible. How much courage does it take for a Congressman or a Senator to yell for blood? Does a district attorney show a high quality of bravery when he howls against compromise? Right or wrong, no question of courage is involved. How much courage does anyone think it would take for me, 67 years old, living on an ample income quietly in the country, to clamor for gore, to demand the sacrifice of a million men 40 years younger than I am and then end my heroic address with a bitter note of regret that my years or my grapevines prevent me from joining the brave boys whom I envy. Such words do not come from the mouths of heroes or of patriots, but from the lips of self-seeking politicians hoping to ride into office on a wave of excitement that will conceal their own shortcomings. I have been in politics for 40 years. I was a Member of Congress 10 years before the oldest soldier drafted was born, and I know.

Most of the political shouters think they are backing a winning horse—that's all. Loathsome insects gather round anything that is rotten. Twenty-five years ago thousands of American politicians attacked the Catholics to get the Klan vote. Today they follow McCarthy. Twenty years ago they said as they drank their bootleg liquor, "There's one more election in prohibition." Today safe behind desks they think that war and hatred will keep their snouts in the public trough in 1952. It's as simple as that.

I am not one of those who appeal to fear, fear, fear. I say hope, hope, hope. In a speech which President Franklin Roosevelt prepared just before his death, he referred to "the impractical, unrealistic settlement of the differences between governments by the mass killings of peoples." We must hold to the old principles of our country which do not include fear of change, or mass terror, or dread of the future, or looking back to a golden age which is past forever. The people of this country need calmness and courage—not excitement and terror drummed into them by self-seeking politicians.

This is certainly a time for thought and not for emotion. In the most literal sense of the words I ask you for God's sake—for the sake of God, for the sake of your country if not for your own—to think.

I am for peace. I am on the side of the angels of God who sang "Peace on earth, good will to men." They were not popular with those who filled the inn and crowded Mary into the stables, but they were right all the same.

Why not negotiate now, while the young men are still alive?

Make It Easier on Voters

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WAYNE N. ASPINALL

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, in that we cannot forget that the world goes on even when we are having dramatic and important debates on policy overseas and, to some extent, policies at home, I should like to call attention to an editorial from the Durango Herald-Democrat, of Durango, Colo. This editorial brings into sharp focus a current maneuver or move which has as its purpose the realinement of political affiliations within our country. After many years, conservative Republicans are wooing the lady they not only scorned but cast out in the brash period of their youth; or, simply stated, some northern Republicans are making advances, apparently with consent, toward some southern Democrats. For the moment, no comment seems necessary as to the chance of success nor to the devious chain of casual factors which have led to the establishment of relations on an official level between the grandsons and granddaughters of one-time Hatfields and McCoys. Under leave to extend my remarks, I include a clear expression of the essentials of this courtship:

MAKE IT EASIER ON VOTERS

Senator Karl Mundt, South Dakota, Republican, and a handful of his party colleagues are trying to promote a new political alinement. They want the GOP and southern Democrats to join forces for the 1952 Presidential campaign.

The main ideas behind this move are these:

1. On most domestic issues, and even on some foreign ones, the Republicans and southern Democrats are kindred conservative spirits. The evidence of that is the Congressional Record, which reveals that the two groups vote together frequently in a sort of loose, informal coalition.

2. The promoters of a more formal tie-up believe that without it the election of a Republican as President will continue to be extremely difficult, if not impossible. They reason that a Democratic nominee who starts with the solid South in his pocket has an almost decisive advantage these days.

Mundt and his friends have stirred up a complex question. It's as important to the Democrats as it is to the Republicans. With their southern strength, the Democrats have been able in recent elections to retain the Presidency, and in all but 1946-48 to keep their hold on Congress.

Yet the existence of the division between the southerners and the northern Truman Democrats prevents the victorious party from carrying out the program of the administration. Domestically the President gets very little of what he wants. In the foreign field, he has the southerners with him on his most vital demands, but more and more they are veering away from him here, too.

What it amounts to is that the Democratic Party functions as a real unit only in campaign periods. In 1948, of course, even that wasn't true, for the Dixiecrat revolt brought considerable defection from the regular party ranks.

At all other times, the Democrats break into two distinct segments. And the administration wing of the party is, practically speaking, a minority which can get programs enacted only at the sufferance of its opposition.

It's an accepted fact that the Republicans and the southern Democrats rule Congress. They have the votes to block anything they wish, or to put across any legislation. They fail only when their coalition weakens.

Thus for the most part the conservatives are in the saddle, and yet they do not govern. That is, they do not control the White House.

A political realinement which would draw battle lines more clearly might seem highly desirable if it promised to end this virtual impasse in government. But there are many angles to the problem—too many for brief discussion here. More than a few United States political experts think it's really best that America's major parties remain as they are—a mixture of conservatives and liberals on both sides.

Whatever comes of MUNDT's coalition plan, the ordinary citizen has a right to hope for two things in the campaign of 1952. He ought to be given a clear choice between two reasonable alternatives in policy. And he should be able to feel that the winning party has the strength in Congress to enact into law the program it offers the people.

Truman-MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to permission granted, I am including as a part of these remarks an editorial entitled "Truman-MacArthur" written by the editor of the Mount Vernon Daily Herald, published in Mount Vernon, Wash., in its issue of May 1, 1951. The editorial follows:

TRUMAN-MACARTHUR

The Truman-MacArthur controversy over far-eastern political and military policies, brought suddenly to a head by the recent firing of the five-star general by a President who is regarded by countless millions of Americans as a far lesser light despite his high office, is steadily heading into deeper waters. Casting personalities aside, which should be done in justice to both aggressive men but which is extremely difficult to do, it is clear that MacArthur's return home and his historic address to Congress, bluntly criticizing the administration's foreign policies, and President Truman's stubborn determination to force his own views on the country, are swiftly driving us toward climactic national decisions. Public opinion may demonstrate as it is doing in no uncertain terms but Congress, as the parliamentary branch of our Government, will do the deciding.

Naturally, the Democrats, with some notable exceptions are rallying to a partisan defense of the head of their party in order to retain political power. Leaders who have opposed Truman politically again and again in Congress, now sensing danger of a complete party upset at the next election, are defending the President, Secretary of State Acheson, General Marshall, and other high brass, regardless of their own personal conscientious views. This is of course the danger and hazard of all representative government. General MacArthur is a Republican and his great influence and popularity constitute a menace to Democratic control, hence the Democrats have trained every party leader gun possible against him. In his speech before Congress and on different occasions since his return, he has told his audiences that he is not in politics and he has sought to appeal to the country on a non-partisan basis.

War is a common leveler. Foreign and military policies, vitally affecting the lives and fortunes of every one of us, should not be debased by political arguments and objectives. We do not all agree on governmental policies but most of us would rest content, if we were reasonably confident that Government were honest, fair, efficient, and devoted to the general welfare. In grave emergencies and national crises, involving bloodshed, painful sacrifices, high taxation, our country's future, we have a right to expect and demand bipartisan control of Government. The Truman government has given us none of it but has relied on small majorities in both Houses of Congress to force through whatever policies it chose.

President Truman is not entitled to public confidence on his record. He and his State Department and other advisers have bungled our Asiatic policies, brought us into a bloody war that gets us nowhere, turned over our diplomacy and military control to United Nations, involved us in a plan to finance and protect all of Western Europe and other large sections of the world, bled us white with excessive taxation, and finally kicked out our greatest military leader in the Pacific and the only tested statesman we have there. Winston Churchill, who doesn't pass opinions loosely, on his arrival here last week, proclaimed MacArthur as a "great soldier and a great statesman," the latter based on MacArthur's remarkable handling and restoration of Japan. Certainly President Truman cannot substitute for him or replace him with a man of equal caliber.

Senator TAFT, naturally a conservative, party leader of the 46 Republican Senators, last Friday launched a full-scale drive against the Truman conduct of our foreign affairs and military policies in a fiery 2-hour speech. He laid it on the line without mincing words and appealed to his fellow Senators to drop their politics and vote as they think best for the general welfare of their country. He wasn't seriously interrupted either because TAFT is undeniably one of the ablest and soundest Americans in Congress and usually knows exactly what he is talking about and is competent to back up his statements. Again yesterday he crossed bats with Secretary of State Acheson, whose removal he demands. We are headed toward the valley of decisions and the test in Congress is not far off. The field of argument is narrowing down to facts and proof of facts.

MacArthur is scheduled to appear before the Senate Armed Services Committee Thursday. The Democrats are still moving heaven and earth to hear MacArthur behind closed doors and using the customary excuse that information of benefit to the enemy might result from a public session. The real reason is that they fear MacArthur's blunt, independent statements and opinions and want to edit and censor the testimony before it is given to the American people. MacArthur is not a moron or a child. He knows better than any member of the committee what information should remain secret for military reasons. He is willing to testify at a public session and has so stated, but he also acknowledged that the committee's course is up to the committee.

What MacArthur says is of vital, if not tragic, importance to every citizen. He has been gagged once by our President, who should never try it again; neither should Congress. In view of General MacArthur's remarkable popularity, as shown by the vast demonstrations for him from coast to coast, nothing could sound the death knell of the Democratic Party under President Truman any more decisively than efforts to belittle and suppress MacArthur's statements and opinions. He bears a message to us from across the Pacific, where he has just concluded 14 years of brilliant service as a soldier and a statesman. We want to hear every bit of it and reach our own conclusions as free Americans.

Peace Rally of Prayer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following article from the Boston Daily Globe, Boston, Mass., Wednesday, May 2, 1951:

FIVE THOUSAND CATHOLIC WOMEN OF STATE STAGE PEACE RALLY OF PRAYER

In a stirring peace rally of prayers as a counterdemonstration to the Communist May day show of force, more than 5,000 members of the State Catholic Daughters of America lifted their voices at Mechanics Building last night in a recitation of the centuries-old rosary.

The large main hall of the building became a flower-bedecked cathedral as the ancient solemn Latin phrases of the benediction, and prayers and hymns resounded through the hall.

Archbishop Cushing, principal speaker, urged the women, who came from as far as Springfield, Provincetown, and Pittsfield, to pray for peace and to explore "some of the legal means by which peace may yet be organized on the face of the earth."

The services opened with a procession of more than 50 clergymen in white and black vestments, with 8 monsignori and Archbishop Cushing in the rich purple of their office.

The platform, backed by gray and yellow curtains, was banked with flowers, and a large white altar stood in the center.

Following the procession and the singing of hymns, Rt. Rev. Charles D. McInnis, pastor of the Church of the Presentation, Brighton, led the women in the recitation of the rosary.

Helen McGillvray, chairman of the rally, escorted by presidents of junior courts, crowned the statue of the Blessed Mother. Catherine Ann Dwyer, State regent, led the women in the act of consecration and dedication.

The rally ended with a pontifical benediction. The Massachusetts Catholic Daughters of America senior and junior choirs sang, under the direction of Rev. James J. Keating.

URGES WORK FOR PEACE

Archbishop Cushing, in his sermon, declared, "it is time that we respond to the call of the Holy Father for courage and clear thinking in the cause of peace; courage to break with outmoded patterns of the past, clear thinking to choose among the proposals for fashioning the future.

"To this end I urge that peace plans be made the principal subjects of your study and discussions in round tables, reading circles, study clubs for the months, perhaps the years that are ahead," he told the women.

Speaking of the efforts of Pope Pius XII for peace, and his clear leadership in proclaiming God's will and the church's prayer for peace, the archbishop said:

"Small wonder, then, that within the month the Holy Father has praised with warm and pointed tribute a group of people who have braved frequently intemperate criticism in order to explore, valiantly and with eager vision, some of the alternatives to war, some of the legal means by which peace may yet be organized on the face of the earth."

ONLY WAR HAD BUDGETS

He pointed out that hitherto only war had been organized; only war had budgets behind it; peace has been left to fend for itself—and even honorable efforts to organize peace were held suspect.

"I myself have frequently felt bound to speak in warning against excessive zeal or impractical dreams in the direction of too hasty acceptance of certain peace schemes," he continued.

"We have all been vigilant against the exploitation of human desires for peace by the disloyal or the anarchist. No one has been more vigilant in this respect than the Pope himself, and all right-thinking men must be grateful for the resolute, clean-cut manner in which the Holy See repudiated the dishonest Stockholm peace pledge and like pretended pleas for peace which are really invitations to the chaos that is communism.

"But we must be no less grateful for the clear foresight and forthright courage with which the Holy Father commends honest persons who dare depart from old familiar ways in order to discover, if God permits, whether new ways of world organization may not bring us the peace of which we have been defrauded to date."

In time of war, he said, prepare for peace. "Then is the time to direct all the alertness of our minds and the energies of our hearts toward the consideration of better ways than war—of higher levels than the battlefields—of more permanent methods than military campaigns as the means of securing our defense for the future and promoting prosperity in peace. These, as the Pope reminds us, will not come in a day and may not come in a lifetime, but come they will, nonetheless."

CUSTODIANS OF MORAL CODE

No group on earth has a greater stake in the achievement of a just and lasting peace than the Catholic Daughters of America, he said.

"As Catholics you are custodians of a dogmatic creed and a moral code which comprises the very heart of western civilization.

"As Daughters of America you are heirs of a way of life which, however imperfect, however open to healthy criticism and deserved rebuke on occasion, still represents the fairest and most enviable combination of spiritual riches and civic advantages.

"Both Christian civilization and the American way of life are in danger. And there is nothing that a devastating war would destroy which is more precious to you than these blessings to which you are bound by the twin virtues of religion and patriotism, the Catholic civilization and the American civil tradition."

The Catholic Daughters of America, he continued, "demand of their political and military leaders that they make common cause in the work of achieving peace, that they put aside armament races, universal permanent peacetime military conscription programs, balances of brutal power, and all the other age-old instruments of war.

"They demand a chance to venture, with caution, of course, but above all, with courage into new roads and new ways which God's providence is opening before us; ways of charity, of prudence, prosperity, and peace."

The cynic is wrong, he said. "Peace is possible. Peace under law is practical. The organization of the world for peace is as feasible as the organization for the peace of a city, a commonwealth, a nation, or a continent—provided only the same moral motives be operative; the same good will be present; the same graces receive the same cooperation. Peace will come because Christ has promised it."

American Mother of 1951

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAMILTON C. JONES
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. HAMILTON C. JONES. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the article from the Times-Herald of Washington, D. C., under date of May 1, 1951, setting forth the signal honor that has been bestowed upon Mrs. Mary Martin Sloop, of Crossnore, N. C., a most intelligent and splendid citizen of my district, by the American Mothers Committee of the Golden Rule Foundation, an organization devoted to the welfare of mothers and children. This most worthy organization has designated her as the American Mother of 1951.

The article is as follows:

Mrs. Mary Martin Sloop, of Crossnore, N. C., a 77-year-old doctor known as the Grand Lady of the Blue Ridge for her work with mountain children, was named today the American Mother of 1951.

Dr. Sloop was picked by the American Mothers Committee of the Golden Rule Foundation, an organization devoted to the welfare of mothers and children.

She is the wife of a country doctor, Dr. Eustace H. Sloop, and since 1911 has been practicing medicine with her husband.

She also founded Crossnore School for Underprivileged Children and has been credited with bringing good roads, modern farming methods, religious tolerance, a hospital and dental clinic, and vocational instruction to Avery County, N. C.

She has two children, both doctors. Dr. Emma Sloop Fink, herself a mother of three children, practices at Crossnore School, and Dr. William Martin Sloop runs a dental clinic for charity cases in the county.

The American Mothers Committee for North Carolina, which nominated Dr. Sloop for the national honor, wrote to the national committee: "She is considered by thousands of friends as the first citizen of North Carolina."

The North Carolina committee said more thn 5,000 letters were written in her behalf, including letters from governors, Senators, and other leaders outside North Carolina.

Dr. Sloop was 1 of 52 mothers nominated by committees in every State, the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico.

Mr. Speaker, may I add to this brief presentation on the very worthy career of Dr. Mary Martin Sloop that she is recognized by the people of North Carolina and especially the mountain people as having made a masterful contribution to the development of the education and general improvement of the living conditions throughout a wide section of North Carolina.

I have had the privilege of visiting Dr. and Mrs. Sloop at their home in Crossnore, and found by personal acquaintance that their life's work was ideal and that they were unsurpassed by any two people within my acquaintance in the high type of Christian service they are rendering our State and especially the western part of North Carolina. Their influence among the mountain people was most impressive and the school that they established was perfectly remarkable in the advanced progress it had made in a comparatively short period of time. I had the privilege of attending the sessions of the classes in the school and can bear personal witness to the fact that the young people of the mountains were being given a type of vocational instruction that is unsurpassed anywhere in the Nation.

It is most encouraging that in the selection of Mrs. Sloop as the American Mother of 1951, that the fine organization making the selection has continued to follow the rule that this honor should go only to those who have served their community or Nation in some outstanding way or through some outstanding service.

Mrs. Sloop, by her remarks when she was notified that she had been so signally honored, showed the high character of the person upon whom the distinction was bestowed. Her accepting words being:

I appreciate it more than I can say. I feel tremendously humble. My work was made possible through the wonderful help I had, the type of children—mountain children—that I had to deal with.

Squall or Tidal Wave?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, There is no doubt in the mind of any patriotic citizen that instead of the MacArthur "squall," there has been a "tidal wave of patriotism" which has already swept the country.

Under leave to extend heretofore granted, I am inserting in the RECORD an article by Felix Morley entitled "Squall or Tidal Wave?"

SQUALL OR TIDAL WAVE?

(By Felix Morley)

Though startled by the public response to General MacArthur, the more important henchmen of President Truman are not yet deeply disturbed.

They think that the popular manifestations are just a flash in the pan. They think this storm will quickly pass, and that summer skies will smile again on Harry and all his mink-coat entourage.

Some go further. Here in Washington they argue that by giving a good show, MacArthur is really helping the President. The demonstrations are seen as a safety valve, through which the mob blows off steam that might be explosive if bottled up.

That judgment, based on a wholly cynical view of human nature, could be correct. It may be that Americans, like the Romans in the days of their decadence, are now primarily interested in bread and circuses. It may be that millions of jobholders will never really bite the hand that feeds them and that MacArthur's return, in retrospect, will seem what the French call a divertissement.

Such a conclusion comes naturally to those who for over 18 years have increasingly assumed that the American people will meekly acept whatever the White House orders. When one considers how Americans have been cozened during these years—"again, and again, and again"—it would not be surprising if they should now once more slip back into that apathetic acceptance of guileful promises on which executive tyranny has ever based its Machiavellian build-up.

Yet there is something about the reception of MacArthur that really worries the bureaucrats, the Fair Deal columnists, the "intellectuals" and all those who cluster round the fringes of the welfare state.

There is anxiety in Washington because MacArthur promises nothing. He does not even ask to lead us to a promised land. He gives no assurance of peace, and even less of prosperity. He merely says that we are in a desperate fix—and people cheer him to the echo in response.

Here is a political anomaly, by current American standards. Washington at Valley Forge could call upon his ragged soldiers for ever greater sacrifice; Lincoln, with the Union tottering, could face up nobly to disaster; Churchill, with Britain's back against the wall, could call for blood and sweat and tears. But that is not the Democratic way of winning votes; that is not the Truman and the CIO technique.

Could it be that Americans are not really as interested in personal security as Mr. Truman thinks? Could it be that they are really ready to make sacrifices for the ideals that President Roosevelt put in mothballs 18 years ago? Could it be that Douglas MacArthur with his natural dignity and unaffected eloquence, really comes closer to the common man than all the condescending duplicity of the State Department?

Those are the questions that have been raised by the return of the general whom this administration has vainly sought to humiliate. He cannot give the answers. But the people will. It is for us to decide whether this is all just an emotional outburst, as the White House hopes, or actually the beginning of an American renaissance.

Periodically, in history, great waves of moral regeneration originate among the common people of this earth. If the conditions are right, and the provocation serious, these waves build up, roll on and eventually sweep the beaches clear of the garbage and refuse with which political tourists have littered the clean, white sand. And then, as after a squall, the sun comes out again.

The White House is betting that MacArthur has not launched a tidal wave. In this, as in other estimates of the American character, it could be wrong.

Price Controls on Meat

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. L. MILLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include some resolutions passed by the Nebraska Stock Growers Association, at their regional meeting held in North Platte, Nebr., April 26, 1951.

Mr. Speaker, the OPS order imposing ceiling prices on beef just will not work. It will penalize the livestock industry, dry up the source of supply, and cause black markets to flourish. The wisecracking DiSalle, who is the Price Stabilizer, may have the order working on paper, but there will be little or no meat at the counters.

It is my opinion the proper committee in the House ought to consider the resolution which was unanimously adopted in the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry May 2. It reads as follows:

Whereas the promulgation by the Office of Price Stabilization of ceiling price regulation 24, imposing ceiling prices on beef sold at wholesale, to become effective May 9, 1951, has resulted in livestock producers rushing their cattle to market before they are finished to their best marketable weights; and

Whereas such premature marketing will result in a loss of meat for consumers; and

Whereas the feeders who produce much of the meat supply will suffer severe losses; and

Whereas the announcement of further roll-backs in beef prices will have the effect of continued early marketing of meat animals; and

Whereas such continued early marketing and the resulting reduction in meat production will cause a severe famine leading to early rationing in the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, That said ceiling price regulation 24 establishing the proposed ceiling prices on beef sold at wholesale be rescinded without delay.

Mr. Speaker, if the DiSalle order is permitted to stand, it will mean rationing, and perhaps an attempt by the administration to go out on the ranges and bring the cattle in to market. That was suggested during the OPA days. Some of these orders coming out of the Office of Price Stabilization sound more and more like the orders devised by Moscow.

The resolutions adopted by the Nebraska Stock Growers Association follow:

RESOLUTION NO. 1—DECLARATION OF POLICY AND PROGRAM

To the fundamental American principles of democracy, as expressed in our two great declarations of American principles—the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States of America—we enthusiastically give our eternal allegiance. Those principles are America. They brought about the development of this country to the greatness that has been hers.

We abhor all efforts to take from us any one of the principles that make our country. We condemn every one and every effort to destroy or injure any one of these principles.

The current international crisis and the national emergency resulting therefrom is being felt by every individual and every home in the country. This serious problem confronting every American must be met with foresight, with fearlessness and with sound common sense.

Our Nation is preparing for a state of total mobilization for war; American boys are giving their lives on the battlefields of Korea. Yet with international diplomatic negotiations in full swing, a stalemate of power, politics appears to have been reached which may continue for years to come. Such a situation, if prolonged indefinitely, may tax the strength of this Nation beyond endurance unless a definite long-range policy is established by our Federal Government which will set up a sound and practical goal for which we must strive.

The productive ability of America under the free-enterprise system in all fields of endeavor stands today as the real bulwark against the aggression threatening our freedom. The American people can maintain this position only so long as the economy of this Nation remains strong. We cannot continue to make other nations strong by programs which will make our Nation weak.

On the home front we condemn waste and extravagance in our Federal Government; we oppose the principles of price controls, subsidy payments and other governmental regulations not compatible with our American way of life.

We, therefore, petition the Congress and the President of the United States to outline a policy and to establish certain definite principles indicating the extent to which this Nation will attempt to control through military influence: (1) The protection of this Nation and the hemisphere against aggression; (2) to prevent the growth of communistic influence throughout the world; and (3) a program consistent with the economic stability of the United States over a long period of time.

We believe this will contribute to the complete support of our citizenship and to the lasting protection of our freedom.

Attest: This is a true copy of a resolution adopted unanimously at the regional meeting of the Nebraska Stock Growers Association in session at North Platte, Nebr., April 26, 1951.

THE NEBRASKA STOCK GROWERS' ASSOCIATION,
W. A. JOHNSON, Secretary-Treasurer.

RESOLUTION NO. 2—CONTROLS

Whereas this country has, during the past few months, again entered upon a period of governmental controls over civilian life and economy; and

Whereas the experiences undergone during the similar period of controls throughout the wartime are still fresh in our minds, we now express our beliefs and our position upon these questions injected into our lives by the system of controls; and

Whereas we know, as we have always known and as experience has demonstrated, that the livestock industry is one element of our economy that is not susceptible to Government controls because they are neither practicable nor enforceable. And we further know that such efforts to control will certainly result in disruption of supplies and a disgraceful black-market conditions; and

Whereas, we know that not only is it impractical to establish or attempt to enforce ceiling prices on live animals but any effort to follow such a route would inevitably injure and retard production—and increased production is one of the two principal answers to the major questions; and

Whereas the other principal answer is economy in Government. To stabilize our economy, unnecessary expenditure of public funds by the Government must be stopped; and

Whereas, foolish regulation, such as the contemplated prohibition of calf slaughter, allocations and the threat or inspiration of rumors and threats of such regulations must be stopped. Every such regulation or threat is an obstacle to increased production and an influence toward reduced production when the opposite is the desired goal: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Nebraska Stock Growers Association is opposed to Government controls on our industry, as they are not only completely unenforceable but lead to confusion and shortages.

Attest: This is a true copy of a resolution adopted unanimously at the regional meeting in session at North Platte, Nebr., April 26, 1951, of the Nebraska Stock Growers Association.

THE NEBRASKA STOCK GROWERS ASSOCIATION,
W. A. JOHNSON,
Secretary-Treasurer.

RESOLUTION NO. 3—RANCH AND FARM LABOR

Whereas it is an obvious fact that the production of livestock is an essential industry because from livestock comes meat, leather, pharmaceutical supplies, and other strategic materials requisite to the success of the vast programs being undertaken by our country and the essential character of our industry must be recognized by the Government just as is every other industry engaged in the production of strategic materials; and

Whereas the adoption by this country of a program of military training and the mobilization of men for such military service creates a serious question affecting the ability of our industry to produce livestock in quantities required by the Nation; and

Whereas although we do not request or expect any special or particular treatment or consideration, we do request and expect treatment of our labor problems on the same basis as is accorded all other strategic industries: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Nebraska Stock Growers Association respectfully requests the Federal Government, the State, and the Selective Service Board, in its administration of the laws, present and to be adopted, relating to military service, give due consideration to the character of the work being done by men in our industry and that essential key men be not withdrawn from their important, strategic work for military service, just as such consideration is given to similar men in other strategic industries.

The Last Phase

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KATHARINE ST. GEORGE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, May 4, 1951

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an article by Edna Lonigan from the last issue of Human Events.

This article shows what sinister forces are at work in our Government and poses the question: Can the citizens themselves overcome these highly organized forces of evil?

The article follows:

THE LAST PHASE
(By Edna Lonigan)

I

General MacArthur's triumphant journey from Tokyo to the Halls of Congress is a political earthquake. But the line of cleavage is not between Republicans and Democrats. It is between the people and the mysterious entity called the Fair Deal.

The Truman administration started out as an era of good feeling. Those who did not like the New Deal were glad we had a homespun Missouri Democrat in place of Roosevelt. They liked his looks, his midwestern accent, his unexpected dignity in dealing with Congress, with the press, and with the chiefs of foreign nations.

The new President took up the task of international conferences where Roosevelt dropped it, and then, after Potsdam, said what most Americans wanted to hear, that he would go to no more such meetings.

But it soon became apparent that he followed Roosevelt's policies, and he clashed with Congress over price control.

Disillusionment with Soviet Russia set in and, when England announced that she could no longer support her commitments in Greece, we took over, under the Truman doctrine, promising to oppose military force with force, if any nation was threatened by the U. S. S. R.

The Greek-Turkish program changed rather suddenly into the Marshall plan for economic—not military—aid to all Europe. That evolved into a military alliance, then into arms for Europe, and finally into the plan to send troops to garrison duty there. But though we spent billions, Europe remained helpless against Communist assault.

Meanwhile China fell. We evacuated Korea, and announced that Formosa was not important to our defense line in the Pacific. Plans were made instead to extend the Marshall plan to a billion people in Asia and Africa. Then the Communists moved in to fill the military vacuum we had left.

The President decided to enter the war. After bloody fighting the general who had snatched victory from defeat was summarily dismissed. An outraged people bore him in triumphal procession half-way round the world. The President was booed in a Washington ball park.

It does not make sense.

II

Obviously something is needed to explain this strange performance—something more than mink coats, deep-freezers, or Pendergast politics.

There is a simple explanation. It is to be found in a speech of Earl Browder's which is reprinted in a report of the Committee on Un-American Activities in March 1944.

Browder told the American Communist movement it was to abandon the Communist Party and set to work, especially through the trade-unions, to form a mass organization with members throughout the United States.

The PAC under Sidney Hillman carried out the plan laid down by Browder. Of course, 98 percent of the trade-union members did not suspect that the Soviet Government had planned their organization, their policies, and even their publications.

The purpose of forming this mass organization was to build national unity, to preserve the gains of Tehran. It was to unite everyone—workers, farmers, managers, even financiers—in a drive on the Fascists and defeatists, those who doubted that the alliance with Soviet Russia could continue into peacetime.

Stalin and his advisers realized at Tehran that Roosevelt was dying, and that they must choose his successor, and get him elected, or they would lose all the gains the Hisses and others had won. The Soviet leaders also knew that Roosevelt had smashed the Democratic Party, and that whoever mustered the strongest political power could take it over and run it, under the old symbols.

The Communists then built up a network of local political machines in each congressional district, formed first about the labor unions, but gradually drawing in intellectuals, farmers, women, and religious groups. This was the familiar Popular Front, with which the Communists had softened up France under Blum, before the Nazi-Communist attack.

Truman was chosen as candidate for Vice President by Sidney Hillman, at the suggestion (according to Jonathan Daniels in his recent book A Man of Independence) of Max Lowenthal, who had known the Senator from Missouri for years through congressional investigations of the finances of the railroads.

The organizers of this coalition were ordered to abandon their revolutionary slogans and to concentrate on uniting all groups except the reactionaries, in order to better destroy the enemies of unity with the U. S. S. R. Their particular hates were Hoover, Farley, Byrnes, Forrestal, and—MacArthur.

William Z. Foster reported to the Cominform early in 1950 that this plan had succeeded far beyond all expectations. Its followers included members of all religions, all social classes.

This pattern of the popular front is the only concept that will explain the strange history of the Truman administration. If you examine our foreign policy, our unusual military ineptitude, each of our Presidential and congressional campaigns, the vagaries of our labor leaders, and the spread of defeatism and enervation in our literature, the pieces all fit. They fit the military needs of the Soviet Union, to divide us, to sow defeatism, and to make us spend ourselves into bankruptcy.

III

The American people have not had a government of their own since 1945. They could not get anything constructive accomplished in foreign or military affairs because they had no government to do it for them.

Their Government has been captured from within, by a few secret agents in key positions, as Norway was captured by a few Nazi agents placed in key positions by Hitler before his armies struck.

It is time we stopped talking of our present Government with words that apply only to an American Government. We need a new language to describe the Government we have today.

We do not have a President in the American sense, because there is no longer a balance between executive and legislative power. The office has grown until it doth bestride the narrow world like a colossus. We do not have departments or bureaus in the American sense, because Congress does not define their duties or set limits on their power. In a government by law, it is essential that the legislature, which does not benefit by adding bureaus or extending their power, should create and define all government agencies, as Madison pointed out in the Federalist Papers. We do not have a budget or appropriations in the American sense. When money is managed by the Government, all figures are lies.

Our present-day Government is like a great banyan tree, towering high above everything, and sending arms out to start new roots in organizations we still think of as private—the labor unions, colleges, women's clubs, churches, foundations, and business associations. This combine of public and private agencies, directed by a small inner group, now has almost complete control over the flow of news, ideas, and discussion in the press, movies, radio, and moving pictures, and the press of private organizations. It does not crudely forbid freedom of discussion. It merely jams the press and other media with banalities written or whispered by its hired ministry of enlightenment.

The American people never thought about how to manage such a combine. They did not know it was operating under the outward signs of their own kind of government. The Soviet leaders knew. They knew in 1943 they must take it over before we woke up.

IV

Defeat and total eradication of the Popular Front party in the United States is the first condition for any hope of peace, or of survival of the United States as a nation.

The opposition party so far has suffered only heartbreaking defeats. They are like Thor in the German fable, who put forth prodigious efforts to eat all the meat in the trough faster than his opponent, only to find his opponent consumed meat and bones and the trough itself. Thor did not know he was fighting not a mortal, but Loki, God of Fire.

The Popular Front in the United States cannot be defeated by any normal political strategy or party policy. It is a military organization to be defeated only as any usurping government is defeated by organizing the resistance.

Until a few weeks ago, the people were apathetic or cynical, there were no visible leaders, and all communication was blurred by the Government's propaganda skill.

Suddenly the President dismissed our foremost general; the people poured a tidal wave of letters and telegrams upon Congress. MacArthur's course led straight as an arrow to the Waldorf Towers, from which Herbert Hoover had been valiantly trying to arouse opposition to the sell-out of our country. Now we have an aroused nation and potential leadership.

The line of political cleavage is now clear—between a foreign policy that fits Soviet military needs and one that puts American security uppermost. At home the same cleavage runs between a governmental pyramid the Soviet agents can penetrate, and the simple American Government that foreign agents cannot manage. Congress has in the power of the purse the means to tear down the Bastille.

The Truman administration will use every ounce of its tremendous power to discredit MacArthur. They will try to break his heart as they did Forrestal's. Will they win? As Not Merely Gossip asked last week, Can leaders and the people together defeat the machine?

The answer turns on one fact. In the resistance every fighter counts. No one else counts. Every editor, every reporter, every clergyman, every club officer, every man in the street, must take his place in the ranks and do what is nearest him to win this battle.

If we fail—.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. L. MENDEL RIVERS

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I am privileged to include therewith an address by Brig. Gen. G. S. Meloy, Jr., delivered before the Sumter Guards, Charleston, S. C., on April 21, 1951.

Mr. Speaker, there is no military organization in this Nation with a more illustrious background than that of the Sumter Guards. Named for the distinguished Thomas Sumter, this organization has proudly and with honor lived up to the tradition of this hero's name. The Sumter Guards have borne the scars of every war in which our country has been involved, and today some of its membership are fighting beside other Americans in Korea.

Mr. Speaker, it was justly fitting that a hero of the Korean campaign address the guards on the occasion of their recent anniversary—an illustrious soldier, a great leader of men, and one bearing the scars of the Korean conflict, General Meloy. The general knows of the conditions existing over there, he knows of the thoughts in the minds of the soldiers and officers alike of this war. He shed his blood in Korea. Mr. Speaker, he has spoken with distinction, with authority, and as a great representative of a member of the greatest fighting team in the world. I take pleasure, therefore, in inserting his remarks, as follows:

KOREA

It is with many misgivings that I take on a job of trying to pinch-hit for Congressman RIVERS. I know you are disappointed that he is not here and he is sincerely sorry he is unable to come and asked me personally to express his regrets and apologies for having to fall out so suddenly.

As you know, public servants cannot always have a choice of appearances. Congressman RIVERS' job right now demands his presence in Washington, and he knows you prefer to have him perform his duty where he is most needed and will therefore excuse his absence.

In a talk like this I am always puzzled as to exactly what a particular audience is primarily interested in about Korea. Are they interested in a straight-out discussion of the various phases of military action; are they interested in what Korea itself is like, or are they interested primarily in how their own particular sons, brothers, husbands, or sweethearts get along in Korea? What is he up against? Questions that have been asked in previous talks seem to indicate that there is more interest in Korea and what it is like, and what our Army is like, and how our soldiers and sailors and airmen are existing in Korea than a straight-out military discussion, so I will try to discuss these last items. I shall, however, be glad to try to answer such questions as I may if you want to ask them at the end of the talk.

Taking these items in order the outstanding feature of Korea is its misery. It is hard to describe, and I guess these people have been living in misery, by our standards, for so long now that they probably do not know their misery. They run around barefooted in weather that would freeze us and I often wonder if they knew before we arrived that they should be cold. This misery is everywhere. The country is poor. The bare necessities of life are on a submarginal basis. Tomorrow's food is a problem that faces each individual in Korea each day. This misery has a direct bearing on the morale of the troops. If it were not for the inherent ability of the American soldier to accept hardships in his stride and even joke about it on occasion, the effect on the morale of the soldier would be pronounced. Just as a sample of what I mean, even in the rare instances when a soldier can avail himself of a rest period and get out from under fire he has no comfortable, pleasant place to go and relax. There is no place in Korea he can escape this national misery.

The Korean Peninsula is about 500 miles long and, roughly, about 150 miles wide, about the size of Florida. The comparison ends there. It is chuck-full of mountains. There are a few places which may not be truly mountainous, but even in these so-called flat places the flatness is relative, since here there are small abrupt hills which have a decisive influence on the tactical situation. Each of them can and do become critical tactical features. You have probably heard enough about how grave an obstacle the mountains are; how they influence the capabilities of our fighting forces and confine our maneuvers. One example shows how decided this is. Many a company attack in Korea is on a one-man front, due to the limitations imposed by the terrain.

Communications in Korea as far as roads and railroads are concerned are surprisingly good, although in very limited supply. They were built by the Japanese during their years of occupancy and have a definite military pattern, which, unfortunately, the Chinese and North Koreans have seen fit to avoid where they can. They could make this fighting a lot more convenient for our team if they wanted to.

Some of these roads and railroads are engineering marvels. The defiles and passes through which these roads and railroads go are challenges to the best engineering talent. As an outstanding example of railroad engineering, there is one place near Wonju where the railroad bed goes through a complete 360° spiral tunnel in order to climb over a pass.

Climate: You probably have some rough idea of the extremes of climate in Korea. You read about heat prostrations last summer. It was real heat, make no mistake. Salt tablets were a must in this humid, muggy heat. Suddenly our armies were thrust into a bitter winter condition. Fortunately, advanced planning gave them clothing and equipment to withstand this weather. Even so, the first subzero temperatures was almost as tough to face as the enemy night Banzai attacks.

Along with the new disadvantages of fighting in Korean winter came certain advantages. The rice paddies were frozen solid. Tanks, artillery, and trucks could get off the roads for better employment. Snow on the ground made it a lot more difficult for the Chinese Communists and North Korean Communists to take advantage of their natural ability at camouflage. Our planes could spot them with more facility, particularly the light planes from the artillery. Enemy casualties were inflicted in greater numbers.

The enemy's clothing was not satisfactory for the damp, wet cold of Korea. When it became wet it froze, and on occasions they had to break off the fight due to this one thing. Of course, winter brought disadvantages and hardships to us too. Daylight was at a premium. The nights were long and afforded the enemy greater opportunity to execute his characteristic night attacks. You could count on good visibility only from about 8 a. m. to 4:30 p. m. It became habitual for our forces to kill all possible during daylight hours and button up in tight perimeter for a fight for survival during darkness.

Medical care: Proper medical care became increasingly difficult. Wounded individuals who under normal conditions could be easily evacuated would die of shock in the severe cold before they could be evacuated to a warm-up tent. Other minor wounded cases would become severe cases from frostbite just because they couldn't give themselves the little extra care needed to prevent such a calamity.

What about this Eighth United States Army we have in Korea? You undoubtedly have read or heard repeated sensational stories as to cowardice, panic, abandonment of wounded, etc., by our forces. I want to say right now that these stories are the rare exceptions just as in the other wars the United States has fought. One of the greatest points of honor with a soldier is never to abandon his wounded if humanly possible.

As a matter of fact, I think when you consider the fighting conditions and adversities, the strangeness of the enemy, his unexpected battlefield diversions, the difficulty of identifying him and separating him from friends and refugees on many occasions, your Army has earned and merits all the praise you can bestow upon it. Individual and collective heroism has been an outstanding feature of your fighting forces ever since the Korean conflict started. Members of my old regiment, for instance, by the first part of November had earned 12 DSC's and 1 Medal of Honor. Eight were posthumous. That doesn't bespeak cowardice. I could go on at great length refuting these sensational reports which I feel are doing a disservice to home front morale. I know these stories are destructive to the soldiers' morale primarily because they don't understand them nor do they understand what they may have done to cause the remarks. Taken alone they are destructive and not constructive reporting. I do not advocate concealment of human frailties which have always existed. I ask only credit where credit is due and criticism of an objective and constructive kind.

The Second Division has come in for its share of unfortunate criticism and yet facts show that the heroic stand the Second Division has made on two different occasions has made possible the extrication of the Eighth Army from two desperate situations. The Twenty-third Infantry of the Second Division in one fight near Wonju was credited with the destruction of two Chinese divisions. This doesn't bespeak cowardice.

Your Eighth Army in Korea now is probably the finest combat force the United States has ever had. Lest you think I am prejudiced—I am—I would like to read a little statement about the army by Mr. S. L. A. Marshall. Here is what he says about it:

"I am frank to say that in my 34 years of knowledge of the American Army, I have never seen men who used their weapons as efficiently, who go into battle as nonchalantly, who take their losses as magnificently and who develop as much fire-power as the troops that we've got today in Korea. They are the best I have ever seen and I don't think we'll ever have anything better under the sun. I just wish that our people as a whole could begin to understand the resurrection of the old American fighting spirit under the conditions of the Korean battlefield."

The Eighth United States Army now fighting is stronger than it has ever been. It is better grouped, better supplied, and better equipped than ever before. The current fighting of the Eighth Army is as nearly a conventional offensive as the terrain permits. The offensive is a deliberate, cautious, forward movement with the avowed determination to destroy the enemy and at the same time maintain maximum security and minimum casualties for our own forces. The Eighth Army's morale is high, its confidence is high, and its battle wisdom is superior.

Morale as you know fluctuates with the tides of battle. Even at low ebb the morale of our soldier is an inspiring thing. He has questions even as you have questions. Back in late December and early January his big question was, What is the score? General Ridgway gave him the best answer I have ever heard and since you probably have some of those questions in your mind I would like to read parts of his answer to his troops to you:

"The real issues are whether or not the power of western civilization, as God has permitted it to flower in our own beloved lands, shall defy and defeat communism; whether the rule of men who shoot their prisoners, enslave their citizens, and deride the dignity of man shall displace the rule of those to whom the individual and his individual right are sacred whether we are to survive with God's hand to guide and lead us, or to perish in the dead existence of a Godless world.

"If these be true, and to me they are, beyond any possibility of challenge, then this has long since ceased to be a fight for freedom for our Korean Allies alone, and for their national survival. It has become, and it continues to be, a fight for our own freedom, for our own survival, in an honorable, independent national existence.

"In the final analysis, the issue now joined right here in Korea is whether communism or individual freedom shall prevail, and, make no mistake, whether the next flight of fear-driven people we have just witnessed across the Han River, and continue to witness in other areas, shall be checked and defeated overseas or permitted, step by step, to close in on our own homelands and at some future time, however distant, to engulf our own loved ones in all its misery and despair."

As I said, the morale and esprit of the American soldier under the adversities and hardships of combat is inspiring. I will never cease to get stimulation and inspiration from it. The further forward you go in battle the higher that morale is, and the guy right up under the guns catching all kinds of hell probably has the firmest, strongest, and highest type of morale. He is a comfort and a tower of strength to his commander. I have never seen him have anything but an optimistic view, regardless of the situation, and when you have one of those boys say to you, "Quit worrying, colonel, we can take care of these ———," the biggest worry of the commander is: Am I doing right by that fellow; are my judgments and decisions to his best interest. You can't help but feel humble in the face of your responsibilities to this American soldier.

Naturally, his world is a small world. He is constantly faced with hardships and adversities and death, but he isn't tormented by the added worries imposed on a higher commander. He accepts with understanding these hardships; he jokes about them; he kids and rags his buddies about them. A new unit coming in is always told they better send a battalion in to take over a job a platoon has just been doing. His battle testing has proven that he can take it; that he can dish it out and that the pal on his right and left can do the same. There exists a perfect comradeship; a mutual confidence in each other; a respect and team play that you will find no place else except on the battle front. That comrade lasts forever.

I know I am fumbling for words to express my admiration and heartfelt respect for this American fighting man. I can't describe it, but I know in my heart and I want to assure you that he has got what it takes, and don't worry about his ability to dish it out. His worm's-eye view of the battlefield is best illustrated by a story from the One Hundred and First Airborne Division after their heroic stand at Bastogne.

That, in brief, is the picture of the morale of this Eighth Army, and I don't think it will ever come apart at the seams so don't worry about it.

The third item you would like to know is how that brother, son, husband, or sweetheart of yours lives. Well, he is living a rugged life, outdoors, good weather and bad, hot or cold, rain, snow, or sunshine, and he has good clothing, and he has it with him, but he doesn't carry any more with him than is absolutely necessary. He knows that his own individual mobility and the amount of ammunition that he carries means more to his continued livelihood and well-being than anything else. By choice, he frequently carries extra ammunition rather than a blanket.

It is surprising, not surprising either, considering the fact that he is an American, but his ingenuity in providing himself such personal comforts as he can is outstanding. He can dig a hole in the ground and put a roof over it and line it and live in it and keep warm and dry where you wouldn't believe it possible.

He is being well fed—hot meals, chicken in the foxholes, is not unusual. When he doesn't have hot food he knows why, but he has this excellent food with surprising regularity under the most difficult terrain conditions. In fact, he almost has too much food.

He has the finest medical care in the world. Our medical record in Korea is outstanding. Statistics indicate that 98 out of every 100 men who reach hospital care are saved. This would be an outstanding record even with the superior communication facilities which exist in the United States, much less under the communication hazards which exist in Korea.

A bath unit is always available someplace in the regional areas. Since we as a Nation take more baths than any other people in the world you can see what a fine morale factor this is. The American soldier doesn't like to stay dirty, and he will take a bath if he can even with the enemy shooting at him.

Mail service is excellent. Only once, to my knowledge, has it broken down and that was during the evacuation from Hungnam. You can probably give me an individual case where the mail service seemed unsatisfactory. But I can probably show you that the individual concerned had moved around so frequently that in spite of all efforts delivery of mail to him has been difficult.

I hope I have covered some of the things you would like to know about Korea, and what it is like; what our troops are like, and how they live. As I said if there are particular questions unanswered I will be glad to answer them either from the floor or individually later on.

There is one final thought, admonition, or whatever you choose to call it, I want to leave with you. Having recently returned from the Far East Command, I perhaps am overly conscious of a complacency and apathy that seems to exist here at home toward the grave peril which threatens the United States. Our blood pressure seems to fluctuate with the military situation in Korea. Stalin and the other leaders in the Kremlin would like nothing better than to see us fall back into a business-as-usual attitude. One of his many offensives against our democratic way of life is to lull us into a false sense of security so that at a time and place of his own choosing he can really clobber us. Make no mistakes—we are communism's No. 1 enemy.

America is in grave peril. It is immediate and it is real, and the danger comes from a single source—communism. This threat from communism is insidious because in so many ways it is not obvious, and because its fighting threat right now is so many miles away that the great gravity of our peril is not immediately before us. We can't afford to lower our guard for a minute, and we should all be praying to our God that the shooting war will stay a long ways from our borders, and that never will any of you people sitting right here be forced to flee as terrified refugees down the roads of our country pursued by a ruthless Communist enemy. The privileges we enjoy here in the United States must be guarded and defended to be preserved. We can lose all we cherish by default if we aren't careful.

The records show the Sumter Guards have never defaulted in their duty to their country.

Stop Rising Prices and Black Markets

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS B. HELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, there is a growing fear throughout the entire country that the price-control situation is getting out of hand. Millions of families, particularly in the low-income group, are clamoring for decisive action and effective control of the cost of food and other essentials of life. We must give our people the fullest measure of economic protection before it is too late. We cannot allow our economic system to become undermined.

The problem of price control has been of great and continued concern to me ever since the start of the Korean war. I had hoped that legislation would be enacted whereby the price line would be held firmly, but by now it is common knowledge that the price and wage-control law enacted last year is seriously defective in many respects. I have waited patiently for genuinely effective legislation which would serve as a real weapon against the steadily rising cost of living. I thought it would be no more than fair to give the new agency, entrusted with price stabilization, an opportunity to get itself organized and show what it can do.

Frankly, I was dissatisfied with the legislation enacted last year and I am still dissatisfied with it today. I did not believe then that it was strong enough to stem the tide of rising prices, and I do not believe so today. The fact remains that due to the restrictions and limitations of the law, particularly where it concerns the problem of food prices, the price stabilization agency has not been able to obtain concrete results in the way of controlling the situation, let alone a rollback in prices to pre-Korean levels. Generally, I am in accord with the program of broad controls proposed by President Truman on April 26, except in certain respects where I believe the President's program does not go far enough in trying to check high prices.

Mr. Speaker, the people of my district are for the most part wage-earners. They are hard-working, law-abiding citizens. I have talked with a goodly number of them in recent weeks and found that only in a few rare cases have they received any wage increases during the past year. On one occasion, I asked my wife to invite about 15 housewives, representing a fair cross-section of the district, for a chat at my home concerning the problem of the high cost of living. I found that all of them bitterly complained of the situation and of the difficulties they encounter in coping with this problem.

A check of statistics on the cost of living and wages, as measured by official Government agencies, will show that the cost of living index has been increasing more rapidly than the wage index. But we must not also overlook the fact that there are millions of people whose incomes are fixed in the form of set salaries, pensions, or annuities, and that these people are being seriously affected and their standard of living is being cut down considerably. In fact, one need not make a lengthy study of price and wage statistics to become convinced of the continued rise in prices and the diminishing quantity of goods we are able to purchase for our dollars these days. Just speak to any housewife, any shopper in the grocery store, any wage-earner paying the family bills.

As prices continue to creep steadily upward, we are being told that by midsummer or fall it is hoped that prices may become "stabilized." Even if this should prove to be so, it will be of small comfort to the housewife struggling to make ends meet because it merely means that prices will be stabilized at existing or higher levels. Actually, what the country needs is a rollback of prices to the level existing in June of 1950.

I am firmly convinced that the time is ripe—in fact, long overdue—to correct past mistakes by enacting and maintaining a system of price control that would serve as a real economic protection for the people of this country. We talk about helping people all over the world attain a certain degree of economic independence and happiness—a cause with which I heartily agree—but let us not ignore the economic interests and problems of our people as well.

Much as we dislike controls, whether political or economic, in our democratic way of life, it is clear, however, that under the present emergency we cannot escape controls entirely. In times of great peril to our Nation, we would be derelict in our duty if we failed to do everything in our power to insure the safety of our country and the security of its citizens. Economic dislocations of a serious nature are as detrimental in their effects on ultimate victory, as are losses on the field of battle. When an entire economy is adversely affected, as is the situation now, the Government must use its authority to keep prices down in order not to sap our economic strength, our vitality, and our well-being. The future economic stability of this country and, for that matter, the future of the entire free world, depends upon our ability to successfully stop the march of inflation.

Mr. Speaker, it is for these reasons that I am today introducing a resolution to roll back prices to the level of June 1950. There is too much profiteering going on now, which, in turn, is leading to a revival of the black market. Let us take the necessary precautions before it gets entirely out of hand. It is high time that we make it clear to those engaging in such nefarious acts that the public-be-damned attitude of quick profits and black-marketing are unsound economically, morally, or patriotically. Such acts are immoral and repulsive to our innate sense of decency and to our American way of life.

We have an obligation to the people whom we represent here. It is our responsibility to enable the people of this country to live a healthy and secure life in a free society—free also from economic chaos and instability. Through the establishment of effective price controls we shall afford our citizenry the fullest measure of economic protection against greedy chiselers and profiteering parasites. Delay only helps the hoarders, the black-marketers, and all those who stand to benefit by weakening the most valuable asset this country possesses—the people of the United States.

"Reds Win Greatest Victory," Representative Hoffman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. TIMOTHY P. SHEEHAN
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. SHEEHAN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to call to the attention of my colleagues in the House a statement by Congressman RICHARD W. HOFFMAN, of the Tenth District of Illinois, which appeared in the Chicago Herald-American of April 12:

REDS WIN GREATEST VICTORY
(By Hon. RICHARD W. HOFFMAN)

WASHINGTON, April 12.—At 1 a. m. yesterday Russia and Communist China, after failing to break America's defense line in Korea, scored their greatest victory of the Korean campaign right here in Washington.

This crushing defeat, that hits all Americans alike, is the result of the President's action in removing Gen. Douglas MacArthur from command in the Pacific and relieving him of all active military duties.

There is no question what the reaction of our people will be after the initial shock of Mr. Truman's announcement.

Neither they nor Congress will stand idly by while the most tragic mistake in American military policy since the cashiering of Gen. Billy Mitchell takes place. Communists here and abroad will be delighted.

The removal of General MacArthur from Japan, where he has won the affection and respect of our recent enemies, seriously jeopardizes hope for an early and effective peace with the Japanese and at the same time removes from Tokyo the greatest enemy of Soviet encroachment in the Far East.

European chancelleries will be pleased, because the ouster of our great military strategist, whose exploits in the Pacific in World War II can never be forgotten, plays into the hands of England's Labor Government's foreign policy.

There will be temporary joy in the inner clique at the White House, where Dean Acheson now apparently has cinched the role of President in chief and dictates every move of the nominal Commander in Chief who used his authority to retire the heroic commander of our forces in the Orient.

While there is no question of the President's right to retire General MacArthur, under the strict interpretation of the law, his action is as serious as if President Lincoln had removed Grant while the Union troops were in front of Richmond or if the Continental Congress had ordered George Washington to turn in his sword during the tragic winter at Valley Forge.

America's enemies, including many of its so-called allies, are having their hour of triumph right now. They are warned to enjoy it to the utmost while they can because the wrath of the American people is certain to make itself felt in world-shaking terms that will show the present administration that this time it has overstepped all the bounds of decency and common sense in the conduct of our foreign affairs.

No Time Should Be Lost in Amending the Railroad Retirement Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, on May 3, I appeared before a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare in support of amendments to the Railroad Retirement Act.

My statement follows:

Mr. Chairman, first, let me express my appreciation for the opportunity of appearing before you this morning.

As some of you know, I represent a heavily populated railroad district in central Pennsylvania. Without fear of contradiction, on a percentage basis, it is my belief that I have more active and retired railroaders in my congressional district than any other Member of Congress. In the city of Altoona, Pa., alone, out of a population of about 85,000, it is common knowledge that a great percentage of the wage earners are employed by the Pennsylvania Railroad.

With the convening of the Eighty-second Congress I, like many other Members of Congress, introduced bills designed to liberalize the Railroad Retirement Act and to increase benefits to not only annuitants and pensioners but also to widows and other survivors. These bills were among some fifty similar measures that had been pending in the Eighty-first Congress and which have been reintroduced in the present session.

It may surprise you when I say that I have retired employees and survivors of deceased employees in my congressional district who are actually hungry and living under conditions that you and I would find repugnant to the American way of life. These people are the victims of a frozen income over which they have no control. Congress, as custodian of the Railroad Retirement Fund is obligated to provide relief to these people through sound amendments to the Railroad Retirement Act.

According to the Railroad Retirement Board, the average age of the disabled and retired annuitant is 70.2 years and the pensioner 81.9 years; while the average of the widow is 72.8 years. The average monthly benefit received by the annuitant is $82.81 monthly; the pensioner $70.80 monthly; and the widow $29.59 monthly.

Keeping in mind the present scale of benefits, it may be well to look at the cost-of-living figures as furnished by the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the United States Department of Labor. As of November 15, 1950, or about 6 months ago, the cost of living had increased 71 percent over the cost of living in 1937, the year the Railroad Retirement Act became effective.

For an illustration, food had increased 99 percent, wearing apparel 89.7 percent, rent 24.3 percent, fuel, electricity, etc., 43.4 percent, house furnishings 94 percent, and miscellaneous 58.9 percent. As I stated, prices of every-day commodities have increased during that period.

While these increases in the cost of living were mounting during the period from 1937 to 1951, the recipients of railroad-retirement benefits received but one increase—the 20 percent granted by the Eightieth Congress. The widows, however, received no increase.

It may be well for me to remind you at this point that the 1937 or 1939 dollar is not the same dollar in value that these retired railroaders or their survivors receive today. It can truthfully be said that they are the victims of not only the high cost of living, but an inflated dollar.

I am fully familiar with the actuarial studies made from time to time regarding the solvency of the railroad retirement fund. While conflicting information has been received as to the ability of the fund to stand an increase in benefits, it is the general opinion that the fund is capable of absorbing a reasonable increase when you take into consideration the increased income of the fund, resulting from increased wages and high employment in the railroad industry.

In appearing before you this morning, I am mindful of the fact that you are surrounded by experts who have given and will give testimony on every phase of the Railroad Retirement Act. I am not here in behalf of any particular bill, because I have no pride of authorship, but am only interested in amending the Railroad Retirement Act so as to relieve the distress that prevails today among annuitants, pensioners, widows, and survivors of retired railroad employees.

No time should be lost by Congress in taking action to relieve the plight of these deserving Americans. Therefore, I hope that you will report favorably the best possible bill liberalizing the Railroad Retirement Act, and at the same time maintaining the solvency of the retirement fund.

In conclusion, the eyes of thousands of retired railroaders and their survivors residing in my congressional district, are focused on the Congress of the United States, hopeful that we, the representatives of the American people, as custodian of the railroad retirement fund financed solely by the employer and employee, will take prompt action in amending the existing law.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON CANFIELD
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letters:

PATERSON, N. J., April 12, 1951.

Hon. GORDON CANFIELD,
Member of Congress,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR GORDON: These must be busy days for you. Enclosed is a copy of a letter to the President of the United States. This is the first time I have ever written to any President, but I hope that millions of Americans will do so and that you will have a part in organizing such an effort so that the ideas of the people will be registered with the President.

I believe that the Congress should give General MacArthur a hearing and do everything possible to restore him to his command in Tokyo where he has done such a marvelous job.

Very best wishes to you.

Yours very truly,

JACOB STAM,
Counselor at Law.

APRIL 12, 1951.

HON. HARRY S. TRUMAN,
President of the United States,
White House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In my humble opinion, Gen. Douglas MacArthur should be restored to his command in Tokyo. I cannot help but compare the situation in Germany and in Japan. There comes to mind years of bickering with the Soviets in Germany; constant advantage to them; the Berlin airlift; poor progress; unsettled conditions. By contrast General MacArthur has wonderfully controlled Soviet and Communist attempts to take charge in Japan. In my opinion, he has done a masterly job, both in Japan and in Korea. He should be restored; he should be given a free hand, not only by the United Nations, but especially by our Government.

That authority should include the right to encourage and help Gen. Chiang Kai-shek and to direct the activities of our long-time Chinese Nationalist friends against the Chinese Reds.

My brother and his wife were put to death by the sword wielded by young Communist bandits in China in December 1934. I volunteered for service and served in the First World War for almost a year. Our oldest son served in the United States Navy for 2 years and was badly burned and wounded on a destroyer off Okinawa. Even as you, Mr. President, we know something of the cost of war, and because we live in a God-blessed, free land feel it right to urge this course of action upon you.

I would not close, Mr. President, without assuring you of my prayers for you and to say that I frequently asked my family, associates, and friends to pray for you in accordance with Paul's word to Timothy as it is written down at I Timothy 2: 1-4:

"I exhort therefore, that, first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men; For kings, and for all that are in authority; that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty. For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour; Who will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth."

With best wishes for your health and happiness, I am,

Sincerely yours,

JACOB STAM.

Vermont State Legislature Opposes St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, recently the Vermont State Legislature defeated a resolution in favor of immediate construction of the St. Lawrence seaway. In doing so Vermont joins the long list of State legislatures who have refused to sanction the construction of this international ditch commonly called the St. Lawrence seaway project.

The action of the Vermont Legislature is described in the April 19 edition of the Enterprise and Vermonter published at Vergennes, Vt. The editorial follows:

VERMONT NOT ALONE

The real purpose of the resolution favoring the St. Lawrence seaway, which the Vermont House defeated last week, has not been widely publicized. According to reports current around the State House, this resolution was designed as political ammunition to be used by Senator AIKEN in the fight to enact legislation authorizing this billion-dollar project in the United States Senate.

If the resolution had passed, Senator AIKEN could have said that his State through its legislature approved the project. Now he will be in the position of a Senator advocating a project which his State, through its representatives has refused to approve. The result is bound to weaken the Senator's influence on the St. Lawrence seaway bill.

It is interesting to note that Vermont is not the only State, whose legislature has acted on this highly controversial project. On February 28 of this year, the House of Delegates of Maryland passed and sent to both Houses of Congress a resolution requesting the United States Congress "not to enact any legislation or make any appropriations for the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway."

Can the Traffic in Strategic War Materials With Our Enemies Be Stopped?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. USHER L. BURDICK

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker—

SEC. 1304. During any period in which the Armed Forces of the United States are actively engaged in hostilities while carrying out any decision of the Security Council of the United Nations, no economic or financial assistance shall be provided, out of any funds appropriated to carry out the purposes of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended, or any other act to provide economic or financial assistance (other than military assistance) to foreign countries, to any country whose trade with the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics or any of its satellite countries (including Communist China and Communist North Korea) is found by the National Security Council to be contrary to the security interests of the United States.

This act may be cited as the "Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1951." (Approved September 27, 1950.)

The above law provides that power to say whether or not these transactions with our enemies are detrimental to the security of the United States rests with the National Security Council. That Council is composed of Harry Truman, President; Alben Barkley, Vice President; Dean Acheson, Secretary of State; and George C. Marshall, Secretary of Defense.

As soon as it was definitely known in this country that Great Britain was trading in strategic materials with the Soviet Union or Red China, this Board, headed by the President, should have acted. That it has been known for months is common knowledge in this country and now Great Britain admits it in Parliament. But still no announcement that this action is detrimental to the security of the United States has been made by this National Security Council. The law passed September 27, 1950, is meaningless unless this Council acts. The blame for this unlawful action on the part of Great Britain is now definitely fixed on the shoulders of our own National Security Council.

The President says he wants to end the war in Korea, but if Great Britain can trade in strategic war materials like rubber and steel, with the apparent consent of the United States, this war will not end and the materials now going to Red China will be shot right back at us and thousands more of our boys will die. What reason can this Council give for this stupid action against the security of the United States?

The administration pleads for unity—they say our people must not be divided, but the people of the United States are not dumb and they never can be united behind a bunch of administrators who can see nothing wrong with England's selling rubber and steel to Red China.

MacArthur's plan of blockading the China coast was rejected by the President and it seems clear now that if any such blockade had been inaugurated, England would be the first nation caught in the net. Apparently Acheson could not stand to see England held up to the nations of the world as a nation of perfidy and dishonor, and the only out was to fire MacArthur.

The United Nations is showing signs of putting an embargo on this material to Red China, but it is shameful to see the top officers of this Government fail to put a stop to this criminal business, when they have the power to make a declaration.

Under these circumstances, does the President think he can get more appropriations from Congress to assist Great Britain? If he can, this Congress is as dumb as many people think it is.

State Aid Frauds Total 1 Out of 15—Two Thousand in Illinois Surveyed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES B. BROWNSON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. BROWNSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am including the following article taken from the Chicago Daily News of April 30, 1951, which points up the need for a prompt enactment of H. R. 2738, that I introduced February 19, or one of the identical bills, H. R. 3341, by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON], or H. R. 3768, introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED]:

STATE AID FRAUDS TOTAL 1 OUT OF 15—TWO THOUSAND IN ILLINOIS SURVEYED—THREE-MILLION-DOLLAR LOSS YEARLY INDICATED

(By Jay McMullen)

One of every fifteen cases on the State's aid-to-children and general relief rolls was found to be a definite fraud, a survey by the A. C. Nielsen Co. indicated Monday.

The Nielsen Co., market research firm, found in a survey of 2,032 sample cases that—

State-wide ineligibility in the $36,000,000-a-year general relief program amounted to 6.7 percent.

In the $23,000,000 annual aid-to-dependent children program, ineligibility was 6.4 percent.

These figures include only clear-cut cases of total ineligibility, according to Art Nielsen, Jr., administrative vice president of the firm.

They do not include many cases where recipients were obviously receiving more money than they were entitled to under their relief budget.

Nor do they include those in which the level of spending indicated income not reported to welfare officials, said Nielsen.

"Even if we suspected that the case was ineligible, we did not class it that way unless we had some definite proof," Nielsen added.

"The ineligibility figure would have been somewhat higher if we had counted these," he continued.

"We found it a common circumstance where we suspected something but couldn't prove it."

However, Nielsen said, "we feel the program is well administered, even if we did find places where it has slipped."

Nielsen pointed out that the Illinois Public Aid Commission already had removed some of the ineligible cases involved by the time the Nielsen Co. investigators started their job.

The survey covered cases on the relief rolls in January.

Nielsen and Warren Cordell, also a vice president, conducted the survey on behalf of the public aid commission.

They will submit a report on their findings to the commission by Monday, May 7. It will include the following major reasons for ineligibility: No evidence of need; unreported resources, primarily from employment; relatives living in the home who should contribute to the support of the family.

Cordell said the firm's 75 investigators who made the 2-month survey found many welfare recipients were making no attempts to support themselves.

"Their level of ambition is so low they get by on their public assistance," he said. "Many are living in filth."

On the other hand, Cordell emphasized that many of those on the rolls are really in dire circumstances. He cited the case of a man who draws a $12-13-a-month food order and who was found living in a piano box on a dump heap.

Projection of the survey figures would indicate that the taxpayers lose around $3,000,000 each year in definite ineligibility in the two programs.

The aid-to-dependent-children program is run by county welfare offices under supervision of the public aid commission.

General relief is administered in Chicago by the Chicago welfare department and down-State by the township supervisors.

Nielsen reported that after the survey started in Chicago it "caused a flurry of housecleaning" down-State by the township supervisors.

"They had already knocked some off the rolls," he said.

"Investigators found that more often than not the case worker had been around to see the recipient just ahead of them."

However, Nielsen explained that cases on the rolls in January of this year were investigated and included in the statictics whether they had been cut off the rolls or not after that time.

The township supervisors came in for special criticism from investigators.

Many were found to be carrying their "relief offices" in their hats. Many so-called records on clients were mere slips of paper.

"Some had no records," Nielsen said.

Nielsen praised both the Cook County welfare department and the Chicago welfare department for their administrative methods.

"Records in Cook County were thorough," he said. "We think they're doing a conscientious job."

"General relief rolls in the Chicago welfare department were complete, if not as up-to-date as the county's," he said. "Case workers had the information, but for economy reasons only make official notations every 6 months."

"We saw no signs of any more leniency among Cook County workers than among those down-State," he added.

Figures on ineligibility varied little between down-State and Chicago.

General relief, down-State, 7.1 percent; Chicago and Cook County, 6.5 percent. Aid to children, down-State, 7.1 percent; Chicago and Cook County, 5.9 percent.

There were 36,000 general relief cases in the State, involving an estimated 81,000 persons; and 23,600 ADC cases with 84,300 persons.

Cordell said "investigators learned one of the great difficulties in the way of proper administration of relief is the impossibility of setting up a clear-cut definition of need."

Cordell found that some of the families surveyed had been on relief most of their adult lives.

"They don't know anything else," he said.

In one general relief case a crippled woman had been on the rolls 19 years, another woman 14 years.

RFC

OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me previously, I should like to insert into the RECORD the following article by Mr. J. Webb Saffold:

RFC

(By J. Webb Saffold)

Judging from the evidence brought out by the Fulbright committee of Congress investigating the RFC loan mess, those initials now stands for rackets for conspirators, and have so stood for some years behind the backs of the people where money was wasted or stolen. The RFC should have been abolished after the depression of the thirties which spawned it, but no emergency agency of the Federal Government that offers opportunity for juicy jobs and free access to the people's pocketbook is ever abolished except by laws especially passed for that purpose. Just try and get such a law passed through Congress under the "Snare Deal" bureaucracy.

The RFC was created by—then—President Herbert Hoover for the one purpose of loaning money to banks that would otherwise fail. It was a temporary expedient and served its purpose, but it was never intended to be misused as a free-for-bingo racket. No banks are failing now, on the contrary, they are bulging with money to loan all over the country, so much so that the Government has had to tighten credit rules in an alleged gesture to prevent more inflation. The one business of Government is to govern, not to horn in on the legitimate field of private business, and one thing is certain as death and taxes; if your Government stays in the loan business you will have corruption in both Government and business.

A former member of the "Snare Deal" Justice (?) Department has organized a committee to fight the abolition of the RFC because he says it will be a death blow to thousands of small-business enterprises. Why should it? If these small-business enterprises cannot negotiate loans on their merits from private banks only too willing to loan them money, why should all the people of this racket-ridden Nation loan money on unsound propositions? What sort of hand-out "Snare Deal" socialism is that? As long as you have a Government loan pool you will have a long list standing in line waiting to get in on the gravy. That means you will have the 5 percenters and the influence peddlers doing a land-office business for lush fees and you will be a party to more corruption paid for with your money.

Three balls, hanging over a Government doorway, look very bad to the people who are taxed unmercifully to pay for the plunder. A total of the multimillions lost for us by the RFC might shock you especially in the face of mounting taxes. In fact a grand total of the people's money wasted regularly by Government spending would stagger you if you could know it, but there is little chance that you ever will. And all this slimy sludge is red meat for the Russian propaganda mill.

It isn't only the loan seekers or suckers who walk into the clutches of the Washington fixers who get rooked for $100,000 fees. From where I sit it looks as if this entire Nation is in a Washington fix to the tune of one hundred billions and much worse. When this flying-saucer inflation crashes in a "Snare Deal" superdepression, we the people will lose our American way of life and our freedom, and that is no fantastic impossibility. Eric Johnston, Economic Stabilizer, says: "Inflation is as great a threat to us as Russia."

In theory, ours is a Government by, for, and of the people, but this is only in vote-getting election oratory. In factual practice, it is a Government, by, for, and of the socialistic "Snare Deal" politicians and you do not have one word to say about how your money will be squandered after it has been extracted from you in ever-rising taxes. Things like this RFC mink stink are the handwriting on the walls of our political Babylon on the Potomac. They mean that unless the people of this Nation clean house in Washington from top to bottom and do it now there will be no house left to clean, and Stalin will move in and take over the site.

Then the initials RFC will stand for "resigned for communism."

Put Freedom First

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RUTH THOMPSON
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, May 4, 1951

Miss THOMPSON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the address given by Otto A. Seyferth, president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, at the first general session of that great body on April 30.

It has been a great honor for the Ninth District of Michigan and especially the city of Muskegon to have the national Chamber of Commerce select as its President one of our own residents. We are especially proud of the able and effective manner in which Otto Seyferth has fulfilled his duties in that post. I have known and respected him for over 25 years and my high regard for his integrity was confirmed by the great speech which he delivered last Monday. As a forthright appraisal of our way of life, it can be read by all Americans with real benefit.

The speech follows:

The dramatic scene with which we have opened this convention served to emphasize two things. Two things of importance to us at this moment.

First, that our institutions, our prosperity, and our whole way of life are based upon the fundamental concept of human freedom.

Second, that these concepts were fostered and dreamed about and written into our fundamental documents by men of affairs—by businessmen.

In late years there has developed a tendency, fostered by so-called intellectuals, to ascribe to men of business only low and sordid motives. The falsity of this superficial attitude is attested daily by the public service and the self-sacrifice which businessmen make in defense of freedom. Historically, it is also attested by the fact that it was busy men of affairs who laid the foundations for our freedom.

It was Franklin, a printer, a capitalist, a man of many commercial interests; it was John Hancock, merchant on a large scale; it was George Washington, a busy planter and dealer in real estate; it was Alexander Hamilton, a brilliant banker and financial genius; it was Livingston, and Gerry, and Mason—and so on and on through a long list of men who were busily engaged in large affairs of trade and commerce and industry.

It was these men who were not only motivated by lofty ideals but who set forth those ideals in practical terms for you and me in the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution, and the Bill of Rights.

And, finally, it was these same men who pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor so that you and I might enjoy the priceless boon of freedom.

It has been my privilege to serve as your president during a year of stress and uncertainty. I came to this moment, grateful for the privilege of serving, and inspired anew by a belief in this institution, and by a strengthened devotion to the cause of freedom.

It is fitting that our theme for this assembly should be put freedom first. That strikes to the heart of all our efforts, and goes to the fundamental matter of the attitude each of us has toward freedom, the conviction each of us holds as to the place of freedom in our lives.

Is it first—or is it secondary to other things? If it is secondary, then we are not free.

Every person in this great Nation would choose wisely, you and I would choose wisely, if we knew we were faced with the choice between freedom and slavery. If we knew. But this we often do not know. Day by day we make decisions which vitally affect our freedom—without knowing or understanding that it is freedom truly that is at stake.

We take freedom for granted, because we were born free.

Indeed, we are so free that we scarcely understand the meaning of freedom. It is our natural habitat. We accept it as we do the air we breathe, the water we drink. We do not marvel at the air—until through some accident we face suffocation. We take water for granted—until we are perishing of thirst.

And so with freedom. We accept it, we enjoy it, we waste it—and sometimes we lose it.

Freedom cannot be taken for granted. It must first of all be earned. Then it must be zealously guarded. It must be held high in our hearts, as a sacred thing. It must be worked for; it must be sacrificed for.

And it must never be translated into terms of privilege or benefit. When a people begin to ask "What does freedom get me? What can I get out of it? What does my government do for me?"—then that people is on the way to losing its freedom.

We read much these days of crime and corruption. Some of it is due, no doubt, to normal human depravity—to greed, to ruthless disregard for the rights of others. But some of it stems from our widespread modern adoption of an ancient fallacy—namely that somebody, some undefined force or power—the world or the government—owes us something.

The world owes us a living; the government owes us an education, or medical care, or free insurance, or special privilege.

So we phrase a new and degrading philosophy. The old adventurous desire for opportunity becomes dormant. The pioneer spirit that raised this country generation by generation to higher and higher levels—the spirit of git up and git—is being replaced by the new, regressive philosophy of lie down and take.

Where in all the present confusion and clamor is there one clear, confident voice, reiterating the age-old doctrines of thrift, and work, and pride of craftmanship?

And yet over and over again the annals of human experience have shown that freedom is not what people get; it is what they give. To receive one must first give.

When people demand and accept material considerations at the hands of the State, their freedom is reduced in proportion to the so-called benefits conferred.

A bread-and-the-circus concept of Government leads finally to bankruptcy of freedom and to the eclipse of human rights within the black shadow of dictatorship.

But "you can't eat freedom." So goes a current cynicism, uttered by those who believe that it is a function of the State to insure the economic welfare of every citizen.

You can't eat freedom, they say—and by the same token you can't eat faith and honor and decency; you can't eat the consolations of religion; you can't eat beautiful music; you can't eat the glory of a sunset; you can't eat belief in the goodness of God.

You can't eat most of those deep promptings of the spirit which are the real mainsprings of human endeavor and progress. But life would be a bleak and sorry thing without them.

As a practical matter, in passing, let it be noted that as to the question of eating, always and everywhere men have eaten best in countries and epochs where they had the greatest freedom, and worst when they were most governed and least free. Sooner or later the bread of the state is the bread of bitterness.

I am thinking, however, not of the actual hunger that arises from want or privation, but of the false hungers that beset us—the hunger for special privilege, for so-called benefits, for synthetic honors, for inside information that may lead to gain, all secured, not through normal creative and competitive processes, but by special legislation or bureaucratic dispensation, often obtained through pressure, which favors one group, one class or one section, more than others.

And whether that group be labor or agriculture or business or any other, the principle is wrong, the practice is dangerous.

When government becomes a mere focal point for a struggle between mutually antagonistic elements of the economic and social structure of a nation; when the test of political success is not, what can I do for my country but rather, what can I wrangle for myself—then the safety of the Nation is insecure; and the foundations of freedom are weakened.

For the essence of freedom is, first of all, solvency, and second, equal treatment, equal justice, for all. To the extent these are impaired or disregarded, the strength of a nation is lessened and freedom itself is rendered less secure.

Solvency. When the free and riotous spenders of other people's money hear anyone speak of governmental solvency they are apt to scorn him as a mere money grubber who is concerned only with keeping down taxes.

A case can be made, of course—a good, sound, defensible case—for keeping taxes in a proper relationship to our ability to pay and the ability of the economy to absorb their impact. But that is not my concern at the moment.

I'm speaking of solvency now as an emblem and a guaranty of freedom. My concern is that the people of this country be brought to realize that continued deficits lead either to bankruptcy or inflation, and that in either case the dollars they have worked to earn and save will shrink in value or become worthless.

When that happens, liberty will also shrink, for freedom is tied to solvency, and solvency is tied to the value of our money.

There once was a man named Lenin. He would qualify, I suppose, as an expert on the technique of destroying governments. He once wrote out a formula for the overthrow of a government like ours—and the very first step, he said, is to debase its currency.

Keep that in mind, please: If you want to destroy a nation, first destroy the value of its money.

Lenin knew the relationship between solvency and freedom. Dictatorships are simply receiverships. When a government is insolvent, then like any other institution that is dependent upon fiscal management, it is ripe for receivership. But among governments receivership takes the form of dictatorship.

Freedom therefore, we can clearly see, is tied to solvency. If we put freedom first we will be concerned about the state of our finances and the value of our currency—not merely as fiscal affairs, not merely as a matter of higher taxes, or of profit and loss, but because they are the very emblem and the foundation of freedom itself.

But do we really place freedom first? Or are we more concerned about other things?

Businessmen who run to Washington for help when they are in trouble, who expect the Government to make loans at lower rates and upon security private bankers would not dare to accept because of the very restrictions that have been placed upon them by the Government—are they concerned first with freedom?

Industrialists who hire Washington lawyers of alleged inside influence, and let them expend extravagant sums, or "loan" thousands of dollars to purchase mink coats for the White House employed wives of supposed insiders, all for the purpose of wangling Government money for private—do such men put freedom first?

The labor leader who says that government is merely a mechanism for getting things done, and who uses political power and political pressure to secure advantages, not necessarily for those who labor, but for himself as a labor manipulator—does he put freedom first?

The agricultural groups who demand that their industry be treated as a perpetual charity case, with prices artificially supported at arbitrary levels through subsidies that are paid for out of the Public Treasury—do they put freedom first?

The school teacher or superintendent or college president or professional agitator who aids the States in shirking their duty by working for Federal hand-outs to education; hand-outs that can result only in the long run in ruinous Federal controls upon academic freedom—do such people put freedom first?

The very large number of people who seek and accept subsidies from the Federal Government, either directly or indirectly, thus helping to add to the burden of debt and insecurity—do they put freedom first?

The politicians who see in a national emergency not an occasion for the exercise of statesmanship, but only an opportunity for making political capital for themselves or their party—do they put freedom first?

All these questions, ladies and gentlemen, lead to another one—a deeper one. I refer to the question of national morality.

The indifferent attitude we exhibit toward freedom is but an outgrowth of our attitude toward one of the essential ingredients of freedom, which is the integrity and honor and elemental decency of the citizens of a country.

What has happened to us? That we still possess the valor of our revolutionary fathers, our fighting men are demonstrating daily in the hills of Korea. But what of our moral fiber?

Of course it has for many years been set the worst possible kind of high-level example. When we elect men to high office, we realize that they are still men, subject to human frailties and prone to error, like all the rest of us.

But we expect, and we have a right to expect, that such men will honor their office. We expect, and we have a right to expect, that they and their employees and their families will set for the Nation an example of decency and dignity and devotion.

When that fails, when grabbing for the fast dollar becomes standard procedure in high places through the formative years of a whole generation, something happens to the moral tone, to the ethical sensibilities, of a people.

When people are taught that the world owes them a living, that if they do not succeed it is somehow not their fault but some one else's, and that some one else must be punished and have his property taken away from him in order to compensate the unsuccessful—when this happens, all under the guise of legality, another nick has been hacked into the fine edge of our moral perceptions.

All this, and more, has been happening. What is the result?

The result is that we seem as a people to have grown callous to moral issues.

If scandalous revelations are made regarding one of the Government's top financial agencies, indicating the use of improper influence by persons closely connected with high authorities, it is shrugged off without condemnation.

If there is revelation of the wholesale and shameless protection of racketeering in many of our larger cities, the country shrugs its shoulders at another amusing bit of political villainy.

In the name of heaven, how much longer shall we go on at this moral level?

If we are to put freedom first we must start by putting first those elements of character upon which freedom rests—and these are decency, and honor, and integrity, and faith.

We need, and need desperately, a new moral awakening. We condemn the Russians for their materialism—and yet we ourselves have for many years now been living in a largely materialistic atmosphere.

To be an American citizen was once a cherished end in itself. Now we measure the value of that citizenship in terms of material advantage—in terms of so-called social benefits, in terms of subsidies, in terms of hand-outs, in terms of special privilege.

This is not to decry social benefits, nor to discount physical comforts. Indeed, it is of the essence and nature of our political and economic system that it supplies more of the good things of life—the material things, I mean—to more people, and at less cost, than any other system in the world, now or heretofore, through all recorded history.

The fruits of freedom and of production prove that statement. Men fix their own levels under our system, in accordance with their endowments and their willingness to work. The opportunities are wider, the rewards greater, and life is more free and full here under our system than under any other system or in any other country known to man.

My quarrel in what I am here saying is not with those who would better the physical lot of mankind, but with those who would make of material things the be-all and end-all, the touchstone, so to speak, of political and economic life.

They forget that it was written: Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.

I want to assert solemnly, here at the inaugural session of this great convention of businessmen, that what this country needs desperately in this hour of its history is to get back to God.

This Nation was founded upon moral and religious principles. The literature of our revolution was no hodgepodge of dialectic materialism. It abounds in sincere and eloquent professions of faith.

Our deepest convictions with respect to political freedom and economic opportunity have always gone hand in hand with a profound sense of dependence upon the divine will.

Our deep-held concept of man's brotherhood under the Stars and Stripes of freedom has always been part and parcel of our belief in God's fatherhood and the mystic symbolism of Calvary.

Now we have drifted away from that standard. Faced with a materialistic philosophy that opposes ours, we have ended by adopting many clichés out of the very doctrines we detest.

For many years now the professional cynics and the self-professed sophisticates, terms which usually mean simply men without principle, for many years such people have been working to instill a breakdown in the moral values of a dubious and frightened generation.

And as a result we are reaping the whirlwind of indifference and disregard when the very foundations of our national safety are threatened.

But despite all this I am not an apostle of despair. There is too much latent decency and common sense in the American people for us to allow ourselves to be submerged in what can be, what must be, only a temporary wave of materialism.

Already there are hopeful signs of a moral awakening. Some people are shocked and angry and morally aroused. The pendulum of cynic indifference may well have swung so far that it needs but a touch to send it swinging the other way. Here at the mid-century we may well be at a pivot point in time that will mark the lasting, spiritual rebirth of a great nation.

May heaven grant it. If ever there is to be peace and stability in the world, there must be a mighty America, an evil-hating, God-fearing America, clothed in the armor of decency and righteousness, and holding the sword of faith. There can be no peace without a vision of the Eternal.

American freedom is a spiritual tradition—born, nurtured, disciplined, and sustained not alone by economic systems, not alone by political parties, not alone by the devotion of good citizenship, but by God himself, working through the hearts of men seeking truth.

As a keynote to this convention, and as a call to our deepest moral convictions, I hold up to you the twin ideal, one and inseparable, of God and human freedom.

In our moral attitudes, in our judgments upon ourselves, in our aims at human progress in a troubled world, let us get back to God.

In our political concepts, in our great task of keeping and preserving the finest set of values ever vouchsafed a people under self-government, let us put freedom first.

Dilatory Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I submit the following for insertion in the RECORD:

DILATORY DEFENSE

(By M. A. Hollengreen, chairman, Committee on Government Relations, president, Landis Tool Co., before the forty-ninth spring meeting of the National Machine Tool Builders' Association, Edgewater Beach Hotel, Chicago, Ill., May 3, 1951)

It is hardly necessary for me to remind any machine-tool builder of the fact that a modern war or defense program requires an enormous number of new metalworking machines of all types.

The record of World War II, still fresh in our memories, amply substantiates that statement. In 1940 the United States had installed in all of its vast metalworking industry, 1,247,000 power-driven metalworking tools. These figures, as it happens, do not include presses, shears, and brakes.

In the 6 years from 1940 to 1945, inclusive, beginning with our own defense program in 1940 and the needs of the war program in late '41 and subsequent years, the United States machine-tool industry produced 1,093,000 metal-cutting machine tools. In other words, the Nation practically doubled the number of machines in its metalworking plants in order to produce the weapons that were necessary to win World War II.

If we take into account the fact that the machines produced during the war were far more productive than those already installed in American industry, it is clear that we actually more than doubled the metal-cutting capacity of this Nation in order to win the war.

The industry met this enormous demand by practically doubling its output from year to year. Thus in 1939 the output was $200,000,000, which was the best year the industry had had to that date. This production was required by the expansion of airplane engine builders at home, in France, and England. In 1940 with the impetus of the American defense program, the industry more than doubled its output to $440,000,000.

This first expansion is not too difficult to attain, as you know. It means instituting a second shift on the bottleneck machines in the plant; it means working full time and it means diluting the skilled labor force with some learners.

In 1941 the industry almost doubled its output again, going to $775,000,000. We were beginning to subcontract then, to run two full shifts, each operating overtime, and to add substantially to the machine tools and plant capacity in the industry itself.

In 1942 we reached the amazing output of $1,300,000,000 and in 1943 almost duplicated the performance with $1,180,000,000. By that time the greatest demand of the war program had been met and in 1944, output fell off to about $497,000,000. Note, however, that this is still more than twice the output of any peacetime year.

Even in 1945 the industry was called on for a production of $423,700,00.

At no time during the war period, due to the fact that our industry actually went to war almost 3 years before Pearl Harbor, did the backlog of unfilled orders of the industry exceed 12 months' production. As the demand increased, the capacity of the industry kept step with it. Nevertheless, even in those days we were subjected to some very savage criticism as being the bottleneck of the defense program.

In view of this tremendous need for metalworking machines as part of a program of national defense, it should be perfectly obvious to anyone, whether inside or outside of the machine-tool industry, that the production of machine tools is literally the foundation of a defense effort.

But we do not need to go back to the experience of World War II. This industry now has a backlog of unfilled orders equivalent to 18 months' production at the present rate of output. Practically all of this is for the defense program. Firm orders that are being held by machine tool builders, who are afraid to accept them, probably amount to another 5 months' production. And machine tools for many defense projects are still to be ordered.

Unfortunately, this industry dwindled in size after World War II. The demand for machine tools fell off steadily from 1946 to a low in 1949. In 1947 we produced $306,000,000 worth of metal cutting machine tools. The competition of the enormous Government surplus dumped on the market at 15 cents on the dollar began to be severely felt by the industry and output went off to $288,000,000 in 1948. In 1949 it was only $249,150,000.

If we correct this figure for the increased cost of materials and consequently the higher price of machine tools, it will be seen that we produced about the same number of machine tools in 1949 as we had in the depression year of 1938.

The first few months of 1950 were better for those of us who were getting orders for the new designs of the automobile industry. Yet in June 1950, many machine-tool builders were working 30 or 40 hours a week and had laid off all of their men up to the veterans of 13 and 14 years' experience. The situation had been highly competitive, with over 40 companies changing hands and over 20 of them going completely out of existence. This represents an extremely serious loss of capacity in the industry. Employment in June 1950 was only 37,700 wage earners.

The industry is now shipping at the rate of about $540,000,000 per year. But if we correct for the value of the dollar, we find that this represents about half of the number of machines we shipped in 1940—the year before Pearl Harbor.

The inability of the machine-tool industry to meet the needs of the present defense programs is not only due to loss of capacity but due to the following obstacles:

1. Difficulty in holding trained men—and in employing new men.

2. Difficulty in getting materials and components without a blanket priority.

3. Great delay in securing certificates of necessity to permit the 5-year amortization of investment in additional facilities.

4. Lack of money to finance a larger inventory and increased manufacturing facilities.

5. Worst of all: uncertainty as to the price ceiling on machine tools.

The first thing the machine-tool builder needed was to increase his hours and then to hire more manpower. I need hardly tell you what he found. He found himself in competition with the producers of civilian goods who were expanding their plants, with new defense plants that were starting up in various parts of the country where machine-tool builders are located, and he found that they were in position to pay wage rates 50 percent or 100 percent higher than those that he can pay. In many cases his utmost efforts resulted in his hiring fewer people than he was losing, so that instead of gaining manpower he lost manpower week by week and month by month. The men he loses are trained men, the only men or women he can hire are untrained. That situation still persists.

The second thing the machine-tool builder needed was material. He had for 4 years been depleting his inventory, because of declining demand, and because of the highly competitive conditions within the industry. As a consequence, your Government relations committee consulted Mr. Harrison on October 2, shortly after he was appointed Administrator of the National Production Authority. Mr. Harrison felt that the priority regulation No. 2, which was about to issue, would amply meet the needs of the industry. In that he was mistaken.

The priority order provided that the Defense Department and the Atomic Energy Commission could authorize the use of a DO (defense order) rating and that their sources might extend that rating, but for production materials only. As an afterthought, the order did provide that with the permission of the contracting officer the contractor or subcontractor might apply this rating to machine tools, but only to an order for a machine tool which threatened to become the bottleneck of the entire program, and this was restricted to a certain maximum dollar value of purchases. This dollar limitation was quickly exhausted by the Defense Department and its prime contractors, and as a consequence the orders placed by the sub and sub-subcontractors of every degree came to us unrated, although they were for the defense program.

The industry had civilian unrated orders which had to be completed because they were already in the process of manufacture. It had unrated orders for the defense program. It also had a rapidly growing number of rated defense orders. According to regulations it could buy material with a rating only for part of its production.

This, as we pointed out to Mr. Harrison and his associates repeatedly, just does not work in a machine tool plant. A machine tool builder, for the most part, builds his machines in lots. He buys a quantity of material and fabricates it in the best quantities for production efficiency to reduce his costs. He does not know on whose machine this part of a steel bar will eventually be used as a shaft. He cannot go to a steel warehouse and say "send me a ton of steel, 60 percent rated and 40 percent unrated."

Your committee made the obvious suggestion that machine tool builders should be given a blanket priority for the purchase of materials as they were in the defense program that preceded World War II. Actually, a blanket priority was made available to us in September 1940—over a year before Pearl Harbor.

Mr. Harrison stated that machine tools are no more essential than pots and kettles and pans. He said that if machine tool builders got a blanket priority everyone would want it.

He later expressed the opinion that as a Nation we have more machine tool capacity to cut up materials than we have materials to cut up.

The refusal of the National Production Authority to give this essential industry a rating is especially hard to understand in view of the fact that the industry only uses about two-tenths of one percent of the Nation's steel production, a little over 1 percent of the antifriction bearing production, and even smaller portions of other scarce materials. Giving the industry a blanket priority would have no visible effect on the materials shortages in the Nation.

Your committee then persuaded Mr. Harrison to appoint a Machine Tool Industry Advisory Committee, which would submit a report on the condition of the industry. This advisory committee first met on October 25 under the chairmanship of Mr. H. B. McCoy, Assistant Administrator for Industry Operations of NPA. The advisory committee was asked to confirm its verbal recommendations to Mr. McCoy in writing and submitted a formal report on November 8 to Mr. Harrison and Mr. McCoy. The subcommittee or task committee had further meetings with Mr. McCoy on October 20 and December 13. The full committee met with Mr. Harrison and Mr. McCoy on December 28.

About the only outcome of these discussions was the decision to reinstate pool orders like those which we knew during World War II and of which I shall speak at greater length later on.

Your Government Relations Committee then tried to bring a clear understanding of this emergency to the Armed Services, to Mr. Charles E. Wilson, head of the Office of Defense Mobilization, to Lt. Gen. Lucius Clay, who was at that time associated with him, both of whom we saw on February 22 of this year. Mr. Wilson commented that the machine-tool industry is only one of about 7,000 that are having trouble.

Only in some of the uniformed services did we find any conception of what this Nation has to do in the way of machine-tool production to make its defense program a reality.

The machine-tool builder still does not have a blanket priority with which to buy materials for the great expansion of his inventory and of his output. He is in competition for scarce materials with some of the largest industries on the face of the earth, and he has frequently held dozens of finished machines on his assembly floor, unable to ship them because on one he lacked a limit switch, on another he had no hydraulic pump, and on another no sheet-steel guards, etc.

Let it be clearly stated, as all of you know, that a machine-tool builder who buys raw materials for a lot of machines, cannot possibly successfully operate under the priority system that has been set up and which is now in force. He cannot place purchase orders that are partly rated and partly unrated because his sources can readily deliver all of their production to customers whose orders are entirely rated. Yet under Order M–1, 30 percent of the machine tool builder's output is for unrated civilian and foreign orders. He will be expected to continue the shipment of machines on unrated orders.

The controlled materials plan will help him only in his purchase of steel plate, bars, castings, and forgings. On all his other purchases he still has this jumbled priority situation.

The combination of manpower shortages and the absence of a blanket priority for raw materials has effectively checked the expansion of this industry and these difficulties still persist. How about expansion of plant?

Congress has made provision for certificates of necessity which are to be issued to those industries who must expand in order to play their proper part in the defense program, but for some reason the application of machine-tool builders have received very scant attention at the hands of the gentlemen in charge of this procedure. An application filed on November 16 finally issued on April 12, 5 months later, and even as recently as the beginning of April we were informed that Mr. Manly Fleischmann, the present Administrator of the National Production Authority, was making a study to decide whether or not the machine-tool industry is essential in the defense program.

For the most part these certificates permit the 5-year amortization of only a fraction of the facility, that is from 65 percent to 85 percent, on the theory that the facility will have a residual value after the defense program is over. You can readily understand why the incentive hardly makes a strong appeal to a machine-tool builder when there is so great a delay in getting constructive action from Washington. Certainly no machine-tool builder is safe in going ahead if he is using his own money in the expansion of his facilities until the certificate of necessity has actually been issued to him. In November 1940—over a year before we entered the Second World War—certificates of necessity were available for 100 percent of the capital invested in the expansion of machine-tool facilities.

The next thing the industry needed was money. After this highly competitive period, machine-tool builders who experienced the exactions of the excess-profits tax and renegotiation during World War II had very little financial strength with which to face these new and greater responsibilities. The answer to that problem has not yet been found, except to the extent that every machine-tool builder can borrow from his own commercial bank. The pool contracts that have been issued do not give him 30 percent cash with order as was the case in World War II. The Comptroller General has ruled that a commercial bank that loans money on the proceeds of a Government contract as security, will be responsible for any arrears in which the borrower might fall with regard to the United States Treasury in future years. So the banks are refusing to make such loans. Your committee has discussed this problem with officials of the Federal Reserve System, who are sponsoring legislation to eliminate this recourse against the commercial bank. This legislation is still pending.

The General Services Administration has offered its cooperation in guaranteeing loans made by commercial banks, but when a machine-tool builder has borrowed money from a bank and then wants to make a second loan guaranteed by the Government, the banker refuses it for the simple reason that the guaranteed loan would then take precedence over the original loan, and the banker's own unsecured loan would become a junior obligation.

One thing has been accomplished and that is to start the process of sending pool contracts to machine-tool builders. Unfortunately, the RFC being in disfavor, the matter was referred to the General Services Administration. This department of the Government had no funds in its budget for this activity and got $100,000,000 from the emergency funds of the President. But the General Accounting Office insists that they must have on hand funds equal to the face value of the pool contracts issued. So they can issue contracts only to a total value of $100,000,000, unless an appropriation now pending in Congress is passed.

It is hoped that eventually 75 percent of the machine-tool industry will have pool orders. The General Services Administration has said quite frankly that it is not their policy to pay cash with the pool contract.

In World War II the Defense Plant Corporation of the RFC advanced 30 percent cash with pool orders. Failure to do so at this time will make the pool order of very little value to machine-tool builders. In many cases they cannot finance the increased inventory needed to expand their production.

Our friend, Mr. Marshall Smith, Director of the Machinery Division of the National Production Authority, who will report to you at this meeting, can give you additional information with regard to pool contracts.

The nature of a pool contract is widely misunderstood. In fact, even Mr. Jesse Larson, Administrator of the General Services Administration, does not understand it. In a news release issued when the first pool contracts were mailed he said that these contracts will result in a pool or reserve of machine tools that can be drawn on by contractors when they need machine tools instead of waiting for the machine to be built. As all of us know, the pool contract will be cut back if substitute customers are not found for the machines.

Very few machines were actually taken by the Defense Plant Corporation under the pool orders of World War II. Those pool contracts cost only a fraction of 1 percent of their total face value.

It is not intended to build up a pool or reserve of finished machines.

A pool order is an underwriting of a certain number of machines. You put them out at the end of your production schedule, which for most of us would be about 20 months out. They may then be assigned to rated or unrated orders received after April 1, 1951, or the date of the pool contract, whichever is later. To the extent that unrated orders may be given machines from the pool, they acquire a priority, which means that by the time you start work on your pool order machines, about 18 to 24 months from now, you can buy all of your materials with a priority. It is nice to know that your worst problem will be solved a year and a half from now, if you are not particularly concerned about the defense of the Nation.

Pool contracts do have the advantage that if the bottom drops out of the defense program and some of these machines are in process of manufacture and have not yet been assigned to substitute customers, you will not suffer any serious loss as your manufacturing costs will be defrayed by the General Services Administration.

The industry will appreciate pool contracts—when they are finally issued to the companies that will get them—but be it clearly stated that they do not solve the industry's material problem. Giving a machine-tool builder a pool contract that will help him 2 years from now is like giving a drowning man a towel.

One serious problem connected with the pool contract is the fact that appendix A, which lists the machine tools to be built, puts the machine-tool builder in the embarrassing position of being offered a very large order for machines at a price which is to be controlled by the Office of Price Stabilization, since no machine can be billed to the Government at a higher price than the legal ceiling. In other words, he undertakes to make the machines but he doesn't know what the price is going to be and he is not going to be allowed to set the price himself; someone else is going to do that for him.

This leads me to another great problem of the industry—and that is price. The general price ceiling announced on January 26, 1951, provides that your ceiling price is the price at which you delivered a machine between December 19, 1950, and January 25, 1951. Unfortunately, the machine-tool builder delivers a machine very long after he quotes on it. Some of these machines were quoted on in early 1950, some in late 1949. These quotations may have been based on price lists established in 1947, 1948, or 1949. This general price ceiling therefore constituted a roll back of from 3 month to 3 years, depending on the period of delivery in that plant on that particular type of machine and what the date of the price list was when the quotation was made, or the order taken.

Your Government relations committee has had meetings with Office of Price Stabilization on January 9, March 21, March 29, and April 13, and we are still working hard to try to arrive at a price ceiling which may reasonably be applied to the machine-tool industry. It is expected that an order like the CPA Regulation 136 covering all machinery will be issued next and that this will have a 30-day period of grace. In other words, the machine-tool builder will not be compelled to conform to that order for 30 days after the date on which it issues. Within that period of time, it is our hope that a regulation applying only to machine tools, like OPA 67, can be written.

The great difficulty is that the Office of Price Stabilization insists that we must begin in all of these orders with the basic principle of rolling back prices to pre-Korea, that is to June 1950. This plunges the machine-tool builder back into an obsolete cost-price ratio which guarantees substantial losses.

However, the Office of Price Stabilization will permit the addition to these prices of actual dollar increases in costs, but only of certain items of cost. You must understand that other items of cost may not be included, for reasons that I do not understand. For instance the following increases in items of cost may not be considered: Added insurance; duplication of jigs, fixtures, and patterns in order to increase output; increased clerical help, except as included in factory labor, campaigns for bond sales, Red Cross, etc.; multiple shift operations; training new help.

Overtime premiums, shift premiums, and the much higher costs that result from subcontracting, may eventually be allowed. These items are under discussion. There will probably be restrictions on them. There seems to be a feeling in Washington that they might be indulged in to an excessive extent, thus increasing over-all costs and the resultant prices.

As you know, the industry cannot produce the machine tools needed in a reasonable time without subcontracting. The distribution of part of the load to many small metalworking plants that can make parts, or subassemblies, or complete machine tools, is definitely in the national interest. It will not only increase machine-tool production, it will lessen the number of men laid off in American industry because of the defense program.

In May 1941 machine-tool builders had already closed subcontracts to build 44 types of complete machine tools, to say nothing of the hundreds of subcontracts to make parts and subassemblies.

Yet the Office of Price Stabilization is trying to find some basis for restricting the extent of our subcontracting.

Under the impact of this price philosophy machine-tool builders, to an ever-widening extent, feel unable to accept orders, because they already have an average 18 months' backlog of unfilled firm orders and they realize that they do not know today at what prices these orders must be delivered. Due to the philosophy the Office of Price Stabilization is trying to apply to the machine-tool industry, practically every company in this industry could be subjected to heavy potential losses if not outright bankruptcy.

Machine-tool builders to an ever-widening extent are reluctant to quote for exactly the same reason, and to an ever-growing extent are telling their customers, "I will give you this price for estimating purposes, but I will have to confirm or amend it later on when I know what my ceiling price is going to be."

Above all, gentlemen, let me point out to you that the importance of this appalling situation is not that it inflicts a hardship on the machine-tool industry.

The importance of this situation is that we are engaging in a colossal bluff and trying to threaten Russia with a defense program that is little more than words. The very foundation of that defense program is not being laid.

The importance of this situation lies in the fact that our failure to increase the output of machine tools is jeopardizing the very safety of the United States and its future survival as a free Nation.

Government Requisition or Purchase of Privately Owned Ships

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement by Sterling F. Stoudenmire, Jr.:

STATEMENT ON BEHALF OF WATERMAN STEAMSHIP CORP. BEFORE THE SENATE SUBCOMMITTEE ON INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS RE H. R. 3880, INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS BILL, 1952

Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee, my name is Sterling F. Stoudenmire, Jr., assistant general counsel of Waterman Steamship Corp., of Mobile, Ala. This statement is being submitted for your consideration in connection with H. R. 3880, the independent offices appropriations bill for 1952.

Waterman Steamship Corp. was organized in 1919 under the laws of the State of Alabama. Waterman and its affiliates own at the present time 45 dry-cargo, C–2 type, war-built vessels purchased from the United States Maritime Commission under the provisions of the Merchant Ship Sales Act of 1946. Most of these vessels were purchased from the Maritime Commission approximately 5 years ago. They are operated in both the domestic and foreign trades of the United States. Waterman does not have an operating-differential subsidy, nor does it have any vessels that were built with the aid of a construction-differential subsidy.

The purpose of this statement is to express our views with respect to a provision in H. R. 3880 which, if passed by the House and concurred in by the Senate, we respectfully submit would result in a serious and unfair economic injury, not only to our corporation, but to the entire American merchant marine.

Commencing on line 5, page 49, and running through line 13, page 50, the House bill includes a provision which would limit the amount which may be paid by the United States to the owner of any vessel which was previously sold by the United States, in the event the United States should at any time in the future requisition or purchase the title to such vessel, or charter it for Government use. The amount which the United States would be permitted to pay for any such vessel is restricted to the owner's depreciated book value thereof. If the cost of the vessel should be fully depreciated, this could result in the owner receiving absolutely no compensation for the requisition or use of his vessel.

Our company respectfully submits that it is extremely unfair and unreasonable for the Congress to enact any legislation which would attempt to direct and limit the payment for privately owned property taken for public use by any agency of the United States, particularly in the manner proposed by the provision of H. R. 3880 referred to above.

The Ship Sales Act of 1946 became law on March 8, 1946, more than 5 years ago, and after the Congress had deliberated and carefully considered such legislation for many months. Hundreds of vessels have been sold under the provisions of that act to both citizens of the United States and to foreigners, upon equal terms and conditions, and at the same prices. The Ship Sales Act, under which all Government-owned, war-built, surplus vessels were sold, contains no provision similar to that proposed by the House in H. R. 3880. Such a limitation as proposed in the House bill was considered by both Houses of Congress at the time of the enactment of the Ship Sales Act and was rejected. Waterman Steamship Corp., in reliance on the provisions of the Ship Sales Act, has invested almost $50,000,000 in vessels sold thereunder and have, naturally, assumed all the ordinary business risks inherent in the investment of so large a sum of money. Most of our ships were purchased shortly after the enactment of the Ship Sales Act, and it seems grossly unfair and unreasonable at this time, 5 years later, to impose an arbitrary provision such as is proposed in the House bill, which is bound to have the effect of beclouding the title to all vessels sold to citizens under that act.

The Merchant Marine Act of 1936, as amended, provides in section 902 for the payment of just compensation to any citizen whose privately owned vessels are requisitioned by the Government. This section of the 1936 act has been law for more than 15 years and has stood the test of World War II and the scrutiny of the courts of the land in those instances where resort to the courts has been necessary. Certainly there should be no such radical change in that provision of the law by writing into an appropriation act legislation of the nature included in H. R. 3880. The "just compensation" referred to in section 902 of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 is in accord with the requirement of the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States which provides that citizens shall be paid just compensation for any private property taken for public use. There is a serious question as to whether or not the provision in H. R. 3880, here discussed, does not contravene this requirement of the Constitution, and if this provision is enacted into law, it can only result in inviting inordinate litigation in the courts of the United States.

It is true that section 802 of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 provides that in those cases where vessels are built with a construction-differential subsidy, the owner or purchaser thereof shall be paid therefor, in the event the United States requisitions or purchases such vessels, the depreciated construction cost thereof. However, this is a provision of law that is a contractual prerequisite to the construction of a new vessel whereby the Government pays part of the construction cost. It is not at all applicable to the situation intended to be covered by the Ship Sales Act of 1946 whereby large numbers of war-built vessels built for specific wartime uses were to be disposed of, and which vessels were not designed in accordance with the desires of any particular operator or for any particular use other than war use. As pointed out, one who purchases a vessel with a construction-differential subsidy enters into an agreement at the time the sales contract is executed, agreeing that in consideration of receiving a subsidy, that if the United States requisition the vessel at some later date, the owner will receive only his depreciated cost as just compensation therefor. But, in that situation the purchaser obtains title to a new vessel and one that is designed especially for his particular needs. Furthermore, the vessel would not come into existence at all but for such a contract. The Ship Sales Act was entirely different, as it was intended, among other things, to establish an orderly manner for the disposition of an extremely large number of war-built surplus vessels.

The latter act does not impose a condition that the purchasers of vessels thereunder must agree to terms similar to those required by section 802 of the Merchant Marine Act, and those who purchased vessels under the Ship Sales Act are entitled to rely on the good faith of the Government that the terms and conditions under which those vessels were purchased shall not now be changed or modified.

As already pointed out, in addition to the many hundreds of war-built surplus vessels sold by the Government under the Ship Sales Act to American citizens, many other hundreds of the same type vessels were sold under that act to foreigners at the same prices and upon the same terms. Vessels which have been sold to foreigners cannot now be made subject to the provision incorporated in H. R. 3880 with respect to the compensation to be paid citizens for vessels, if requisitioned for title or use, inasmuch as the vessels of foreigners are not subject to requisition by the United States—and hence, the enactment of this legislation would seriously and unjustly discriminate against United States citizens as opposed to foreigners who purchased the same type vessels under the same circumstances. In this connection, it should be noted that section 6 (b) of the Merchant Ship Sales Act of 1946 provides:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of law, no war-built vessel shall be sold to any person not a citizen of the United States, except in accordance with subsection (a), or upon terms or conditions more favorable than those at which such war-built vessel is offered to a citizen of the United States."

It is obvious that if the provision of the House bill here discussed is enacted, the result will be that vessels sold under the Ship Sales Act to foreigners will have been sold on terms and conditions considerably more favorable than were similar vessels sold by our Government to its own citizens.

To our company it is grossly unfair for the Congress to attempt by ex post facto legislation to change the terms and conditions under which surplus property was purchased from the Government in good faith by its citizens and with the risk of large capital investments.

Risking a large capital investment in the purchase of vessels, the purchaser thereof is entitled to enjoy the benefits of any appreciation in value to the same extent that he takes a risk in the depreciation of the market value thereof.

If the provision in the House bill becomes law, it is bound to result in placing a cloud on the title of every vessel sold under the provisions of the Merchant Ship Sales Act of 1946 to United States citizens, and, even though the United States never finds it necessary to requisition or purchase such vessels, the sales price thereof on the open market will be greatly affected by the shadow which will follow the vessel constantly thereafter.

It seems palpable that if the proviso under discussion be enacted into law the whole fundamental theory of just compensation will be emasculated in this instance. The effect of the provision attempts to deny to the courts the inherent constitutional duty to determine just compensation in accordance with settled principles of law, and will eliminate from consideration all of the factors involved in measuring just compensation, save one. With due respect, this company submits that the courts must of necessity conclude any such legislation runs counter to the Constitution.

The Senate Appropriations Committee on April 30, 1951, reported out H. R. 3587 (third supplemental appropriation bill for 1951). An identical provision to that included in H. R. 3880 and here discussed was provided in H. R. 3587 as passed by the House, however, the Senate committee, after hearings thereon, deleted the same provision from H. R. 3587. It is hoped this committee will take the same consistent action and delete the language in H. R. 3880 commencing in line 5, page 49, and continuing through line 13 on page 50.

Address of Hon. Theodore Francis Green, of Rhode Island

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, the senior Senator from Rhode Island, the Honorable THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, delivered a startling speech last evening to the Washington Chapter of the Providence College Alumni at the Wardman Park Hotel. It was on the occasion of the celebration of the one hundred and seventy-fifth anniversary of the independence of Rhode Island and, in my opinion, was one of the finest addresses touching on Rhode Island history that it has ever been my privilege to listen to. His address follows:

ADDRESS OF UNITED STATES SENATOR THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN AT A DINNER OF PROVIDENCE COLLEGE CLUB OF WASHINGTON, D. C., MAY 3, 1951

Mr. Toastmaster, Mr. Attorney General, Senator PASTORE, Congressman FORAND, Congressman FOGARTY, reverend fathers, distinguished guests, and fellow alumni of Providence College, it is a great satisfactoion to be able to address you in this fashion and I thank you in behalf of myself and my colleagues in the Congress for the honor you do us in giving this dinner here tonight. It is good to be with you again as I have been on a number of other occasions. I have many friends whom I highly respect to whose mental and moral development Providence College has contributed greatly. I follow with interest new developments at the college. There seem to follow in quick succession something new every year. Now we all look forward to many Providence College men going to the defense of their country as officers because of the training they will receive under the ROTC unit which will be established at the college next September.

Tomorrow, May 4, will be a great anniversary, of significance not to Rhode Island alone, but to this whole country of ours. In fact, if we stay here after midnight, we then can say today is that anniversary. I hasten to assure you that I shall not keep you here that long, though it is an anniversary worthy of a hearty and prolonged celebration.

One hundred and seventy-five years ago on May 4, 1776, a declaration of independence from the British Empire was officially adopted by the legislature of its smallest colony, with the longest name, the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations. This was just 2 months before the Federal Declaration of Independence, and, since Rhode Island is still very much alive, constitutes it the oldest sovereign State in the Western Hemisphere. Think of the audacity of that little colony which thus singlehanded defied the greatest power then on earth. Its courage was rewarded in that the defiance was successful.

This was the crowning act of a series of events which also give Rhode Island a unique place in the American Revolution. Rhode Island contributed one of her sons, Esek Hopkins, as the first commander in chief of the American Navy and another of her sons, Nathanael Greene, as the major general who, next to Washington, commanded the American Army. It is, therefore, with State pride that we celebrate this anniversary of the declaration of independence, and perhaps I may be pardoned if I add with personal pride that it was my great-great-grandfather Jonathan Arnold who drafted that courageous and historic document and moved its adoption in the General Assembly.

It will help us to understand better the significance of this action if we look back for a short while on the founding of our State, which in itself has a place in the immortal experiments of mankind. As we look around our troubled world today, we find added reason for paying homage to Roger Williams who carried on that lively experiment. The experiment has been, if not entirely successful, at least successful beyond the dreams of any of his contemporaries.

He lit a beacon which needs to be kept lighted to guide the erring steps of nations, some of which are wandering far from the principles our founder laid down as the true essentials of good government.

In a sense, Roger Williams himself produced America. Where but in Williams' concept of government and society do we find expressed the fundamentals on which our democracy is based? It was Williams, and he alone who, of all the leaders in colonial America, envisioned the ideal society which we should seek here—which, in truth, has been sought ever since.

In establishing Rhode Island, Williams created a community not to be confused with its neighbors. Rhode Island never was on the same basis as its fellow Colonies. Some of those Colonies were founded in the interest of business. Others were founded merely because of religious differences. Only in Rhode Island was there a forthright attempt to establish a new kind of religious and governmental society—one which rejected European political systems and all the remnants of them which persisted in all the other Colonies.

Williams was directly responsible for this establishment of a true democracy. He was the first to clarify, and the first to incorporate in fact, the principles of a democratic government. Here men were regarded as equal; here the "natural rights" of man were recognized; here the consent of the governed was essential to the government; and here, not least of all, authority recognized the right of rebellion.

All of these principles are challened today, not only passively by those who do not agree fully with them, but actively by those who set up a form of government in direct denial of these rights. These rights are challenged actively now more than at any time since they were enunciated by Williams. That spirit of Williams was the spirit of Rhode Island and became the spirit of America. It is for America, this land of the free, to keep that beacon shining. It calls for many sacrifices in the future. It is worth all of those sacrifices. Unless we are ready to make them, we renounce our heritage; we are faithless to our glorious past. Let us therefore gird up our loins to fight if necessary for the fundamental principles on which the State of Rhode Island was founded. Roger Williams not only proclaimed these principles. He was the first who put them into practice in an actual human experiment. The experiment was at the time called a "lively experiment." Let us resolve not to abandon it as dead, but to carry it on to its complete fulfillment.

The principles of Roger Williams on which our State was founded distinguished it from all the other Colonies and gradually became an American tradition, which had spread far and wide through America by the time of the American Revolution.

The years leading up to that revolution were troubled times for the little Colony of Rhode Island. The break became wider and wider between the mother country and the various Colonies, but nowhere did the love of civil liberty manifest itself more clearly, and nowhere was it incorporated into deeds earlier than in Rhode Island the birthplace of religious liberty. It was our general assembly which adopted the first resolution denying the right of any other power to levy taxes upon the colony. Our Governor was the only one who refused to take oath to support the Stamp Act. Our citizens committed the first overt act of violence by destroying the British sloop Liberty, at Newport. Our citizens occasioned the first bloodshed when burning the British schooner Gaspee at Providence.

It must be remembered that all the Colonies did not favor independence so early as Rhode Island did. It must also be remembered that all the people of Rhode Island itself did not act in unison in supporting the leaders whom we now revere. There were seven of the Colonies who protested against independence as late as March 1776, namely, Maryland, Delaware, Pennsylvania, New York, and New Jersey, compactly situated together, North Carolina in the South, and New Hampshire in the North. It must also be remembered that this declaration of independence by Rhode Island was not the first indication of her desire for independence. The resolution the Rhode Island General Assembly passed on the Stamp Act on December 16, 1765, was nearly equivalent to a declaration of independence. It refused adherence to any tax laws but its own. In fact, this independence as to tax laws dated back to the year 1732–33 when the colony in its petition to the English House of Commons first proclaimed the principle "no taxation without representation," and this as you remember became the war cry of the Revolution.

The attack on the St. John in 1764, the burning of the Maidstones boat on Newport Common in 1765, the capture and destruction of the sloop Liberty in Newport Harbor in 1769 all were indications of the growing popular feeling against England.

Between these dates Governor Ward in a letter to his son wrote, "These Colonies are destined to an early independence and you will live to see my words verified." He was the Governor, alone of all the governors of American Colonies, who refused to take oath to support the Stamp Act. These and many other acts against the authority of England were far in advance of what occurred in any of the other Colonies, and the declaration of independence was a climax of a whole series of statesman-like moves toward the Revolution which Rhode Island helped to bring about.

Some 2 years before this Declaration of Independence, Rhode Island made the first unofficial suggestion for a permanent Congress of American Colonies, and the first official call for a Continental Congress was voted at a Providence town meeting 3 days later.

About a year later, Commodore Abraham Whipple was placed in command of the first colonial Navy and in a sharp action defeated the British frigate Rose. This was the first naval action of the Revolution and the origin of the Continental Navy. There were so many privateers who sailed out from Narragansett Bay that Providence was given in England the nickname of Hornets' Nest.

Rhode Island contributed in every way to the Revolution both in men any money. As a matter of cold fact, there were only 4 States which contributed as much as Rhode Island in spite of her small size, and in proportion to population none could compare with her. Look at the States bordering on this city of Washington: Maryland, with four times as large a population as Rhode Island, contributed only two-thirds as much; Virginia, with eight times as large a population, contributed only one-half as much.

I might go on and on with a number of honorable firsts which can be claimed by Rhode Island, but I shall only mention one more. Rhode Island not only gave the Continental Navy its first commander in chief, but also gave the Continental Army its greatest leader under Washington, namely, Nathanael Greene, who served with him continuously for the 8 years of the war a glorious record of winning campaigns though losing battles.

Traditions connected with the founding of our State and later with its Declaration of Independence are a moving force in themselves. It is important for us to keep alive the remembrance of days such as this, to recur to their incidents and to draw inspiration from their example. The value of tradition to the citizens of a community like ours is real. The influence of tradition is good. Especially now, when the character of the population in our community is changing, it is important to emphasize our traditions, and a special duty devolves upon the descendants of the original stock to transmit to newcomers that patriotic enthusiasm which helps us all to live up to the obligations of citizenship. Those who have bidden goodby to the old home in the old country should realize, now that they have chosen here a new and lasting home and country, that here also land and sea are haunted by traditions no less picturesque than those of the old world. There is a work-a-day Rhine and there is a legendary Rhine. So there is a Narragansett Bay churned by the paddle wheels of excursion boats and there is a Narragansett Bay lapping the dream shores of happy-hunting grounds. Tales of heroism and daring can be found in our picturesque Rhode Island history to match any in the annals of old England. There should be awakened in Providence a civic pride comparable to that in antique Athens, or in medieval Florence or Nuremburg, or in modern Paris. They make an appeal to the eye of the lover of beauty. But the city of Providence, the home of Providence College, makes an even greater appeal to the heart of the lover of freedom. And it is as true now as in the day of Alcaeus that stones and wood cannot be fashioned by artisans to form a state, but where there are men who know how to take care of themselves, there is a state, even without cities or walls.

The Decisive Battle

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following interesting article from the Telegram-News, Lynn, Mass., Wednesday, May 2, 1951:

COMMUNISTS PAY PRICE

For the Communists the current price of Korean real estate is 1,875 casualties per mile.

The deepest Red penetration in the current offensive is 40 miles. The United Nations high command in Tokyo figures the enemy has suffered 75,000 men killed, wounded, and captured since the start of the attack. That figures out to 1,875 casualties per mile.

A United Press dispatch from Tokyo says there is far more at stake in this battle than appears on the surface. The Communists struck the U. N. lines on April 22 with a "first wave" of about 300,000 men. One out of every four of those men now is out of action, and the battle is not over.

"If the expected second attack by a fresh 300,000 men is repulsed as bloodily," writes

UP War Correspondent Peter Kalischer, "it may well dislocate the entire Communist plan for the conquest of Asia. It will also give the Russians something to think about in Europe. The terrible punishment suffered in the last 9 days has brought the Chinese up against the hard facts of military life."

There is a general feeling that if the Russians decided to start world war III in Europe they would sweep to the English Channel in a couple of weeks. It is understood Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower dissents from that viewpoint provided he has enough weapons and airplanes. He thinks a sturdy delaying action could be fought and that it might be possible, with a comparatively small force, to hold a bridgehead in western France from which the allied powers could reconquer the continent.

The same principle would be applied in that battle as is being applied today in Korea—firepower versus manpower—with the difference that the Russians would have more and better equipment than the Chinese Communists.

That is why Lt. Gen. Matthew B. Ridgway said that the present battle may well be the decisive one in Korea. He did not explain his reasons, but they are obvious in the face of the Communist casualty rate. A stunning defeat for the Chinese Reds would cause plenty of thinking in Peiping and, more important, Moscow.

Peiping would ask itself whether there was any point in sacrificing any more men when the over-all objective—driving the U. N. army out of Korea—was becoming more distant by the day.

Moscow would ask itself whether it was worth while to pour any more guns and planes down the drain.

If those two questions arise, there might be a negotiated peace.

Universal Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. KELLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I am including a letter from Mr. John T. Jones, director of Labor's Non-Partisan League. This letter deals with the universal military training bill and presents a viewpoint that is generally overlooked today in the hysteria and confusion that has been engendered over the building up of our Armed Forces. It is well that we should stop, look, and listen before we adopt a measure which is so far-reaching and runs counter to all of our American concepts.

The letter follows:

LABOR'S NONPARTISAN LEAGUE,
Washington, D. C., April 24, 1951.

To all the officers and members United Mine Workers of America, Greetings:

Your attention is called to the passage of Senate bill No. 1, the universal military training and draft bill, passed by the Eighty-second Congress. It is now in conference between committees of the two Houses and will be returned for final vote in the near future.

This bill is a momentous one. It deals with the individual life of every young American. It decides who shall be obligated by law to give up a normal life as a free man, don a military uniform and obey without question the commands of a military caste, who will possess the power of life and death over each inducted citizen. It takes the 18-year-old boy away from the influence of the home, the church, and the school. He will be trained to kill and destroy during a period of life when his character is being molded. He will cease to till the land, man the mines and mills, go to school. For six formative years, he will be under military control. He will be unable to enter business, accept a permanent job, marry, raise a family or build a home, except at the risk of having his plans disrupted, his home life broken up, and his business ruined by the orders of a dominant, ruthless military caste who, until now, has had no place in the peacetime American way of life. This bill will form "a poor man's army" since every prospective college student will take an examination prepared by the military and be exempt from service by the local draft board, at their option.

This law cannot go into effect until a period of peace and tranquillity settles upon the land. Experts predict 10 years of unsettled existence for this Nation. So why the great rush for universal military training? Because the ruthless military mind behind this totally foreign legislation is taking advantage of the average citizen, his worry, his feeling of insecurity and general lack of knowledge, to jam down his throat this despotic, totalitarian power. This power can be exercised at any moment to sweep away every vestige of individual liberty and put every young man in America at the arbitrary disposal of the military Mussolinis who rule with an iron hand.

The United Mine Workers of America have opposed universal military training ever since our union was formed. The sons and grandsons of those pioneers in the labor movement are surely no less determined to defend their precious liberties than their forefathers. One by one we are losing our freedoms in the name of expediency. We are forgetting that eternal vigilance is still the price of liberty.

The House bill provides that 6 months hence, a universal military training bill written by a commission, shall be studied and approved by the Armed Services Committee and submitted to the House for consideration and debate. Every local union and every member of the United Mine Workers of America is asked to write their Congressman requesting him to oppose any conference report which contains universal military training legislation.

Fraternally yours,
JOHN T. JONES, Director.

Henry Wallace Advised China Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, how large a part, I wonder, did Henry Wallace play in the disastrous American policy decisions regarding China—particularly those made by President Truman late in 1945?

I believe it would be highly enlightening to the American people, and entirely relevant to the broad issues of the present far eastern situation, to have the answer to that question.

In his testimony on the opening day of the current hearings being conducted by the other body, General MacArthur testified that as far as any consultation on the future of China by Washington authorities, outside of the legislative branch, the answer is in the negative; my views have never been required.

More specifically, the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] asked:

Has the State Department ever consulted with you when they were sending General Marshall or General Hurley, or sending the others over there?

General MacArthur's answer was:

None whatsoever.

Questioned by the senior Senator from Wisconsin, General MacArthur offered these views:

It is my own personal opinion that the greatest political mistake we made in a hundred years in the Pacific, was in allowing the Communists to grow in power in China.

I think, at one stroke, we undid everything, starting from John Hay, through Taft, Leonard Wood, Woodrow Wilson, Henry Stimson, and all those great architects of our Pacific policy.

I believe it was fundamental, and I believe we will pay for it for a century.

Asked what he would have done or advised under the circumstances that existed back there in 1945, General MacArthur replied:

I would have given such assistance to the conservative government of China as to have checked the growing tide of communism. A very little help and assistance, in my belief, at that time, would have accomplished the purpose.

Thereupon the senior Senator from Wisconsin asked specifically about the efforts, launched in 1945, to effect a coalition of the Chinese Nationalist Government and the Chinese Communists. He asked General MacArthur:

Would you have sought to have gotten those two forces together? Would you have amalgamated the Commies and Nationalists, have gotten them together?

General MacArthur's response was as emphatic as it was brief:

Just about as much chance as getting them together as that oil and water will mix.

As I reminded the House in an address on April 16, 1951, General MacArthur "is no Johnny-come-lately so far as recognizing the menace in the Far East," or so far as his views on the coalition policy adopted in 1945 is concerned.

I recalled that in 1947 General MacArthur had said to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JUDD], during the latter's visit to Tokyo:

Our failure to help the government of China effectively at the end of the war, with its otherwise insuperable problems, particularly the Communist rebellion, will turn out, I fear, to be the single greatest blunder in the history of the United States. For the first time in our relations with Asia, we confused the paramount strategic interests of the United States in that area with an internal purification problem in China.

In his current testimony General MacArthur recalled that he had also given his views, in written form, to the House Foreign Affairs Committee in the spring of 1948 at the committee's invitation. I quoted this statement at length in my April 16 address. I now repeat just one paragraph, since it is the crux of his appraisal of the American blunder in the Far East:

The international aspect of the Chinese problem unfortunately has become somewhat clouded by demands for internal reform. Desirable as such reform may be, its importance is but secondary to the issue of civil strife now engulfing the land, and the two issues are as impossible of synchronization as it would be to alter the structural design of a house while the same was being consumed by flame. Friendly and searching as our interest may be in the reformation of China's institutions and practices to bring them closer into line with our own concept of liberty and justice, and right and wrong, the maintenance of China's integrity against destructive forces which threaten her engulfment is of infinitely more immediate concern. For with the firm maintenance of such integrity, reform will gradually take place in the evolutionary processes of China's future.

This is the counsel of General MacArthur, in 1947 and 1948, given when it was solicited by a Member and a committee of this House. But what about the executive branch and the Department of State late in 1945, when the fatal policy of attempted coalition of Nationalists and Communists was being forged? We know that they did not solicit General MacArthur's counsel. Whose counsel was sought?

You will recall that Maj. Gen. Patrick J. Hurley resigned late in 1945 in indignation, charging that—

The professional Foreign Service men—

That is of our own State Department—

sided with the Chinese Communist armed party and the imperialist bloc of nations whose policy it was to keep China divided against herself. Our professional diplomats continuously advised the Communists that my efforts in preventing the collapse of the Nationalist Government did not represent the policy of the United States. These same professionals openly advised the Communist armed party to decline unification with the National Army unless the Chinese Communists were given control.

In the interim between the resignation of General Hurley and the assignment of General Marshall to China to work for "unification" in that country—including in that unification the Chinese Communists who were specifically mentioned in the President's instructions to General Marshall—to whom did the President of the United States turn for counsel? Not to General MacArthur, certainly. The identity of all of his advisers at this critical, interim stage of policy making is obscure, but here is one significant clue:

At that very time a responsible national news magazine reported:

Commerce Secretary Wallace, who went on a special mission to China in 1944 for the late President Roosevelt, has been a constant adviser to President Truman on Chinese relations since the Hurley explosion. It was Wallace who first tried to get Chungking and the Communists together.

Now precisely what were Henry Wallace's qualifications for this role of "constant adviser to President Truman on Chinese relations"?

Well, as already indicated, he had gone to China in 1944 on a special mission for President Roosevelt.

Henry Wallace was in China exactly 4 days on that trip. Thereupon he became an expert on Chinese relations.

Mr. Wallace was accompanied on this 4-day study of wartime China's problems by John Carter Vincent, director of the Far Eastern Office of the State Department.

We have no record of the counsel which Mr. Wallace gave President Truman in those crucial decision-shaping days of late 1945. But from two sources we do know something of Henry Wallace's views and conclusions—or confirmed preconceptions—regarding his trip to China.

In January 1950, the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR] made public a summary of the Wallace report which he had received from Mr. Wallace.

Here are a few noteworthy extracts.

Mr. Wallace said that principal topics discussed with President Chiang Kai-shek included:

Chinese Government-Communist relations, in regard to which Chiang showed himself so prejudiced against the Communists that there seemed little prospect of satisfactory or enduring settlement as a result of the negotiations now under way in Chungking.

Need for reform in China, particularly agrarian reform, to which Chiang agreed without much indication of personal interest.

Mr. Wallace drew some conclusions:

Chiang, at best, is a short-term investment. It is not believed that he has the intelligence or political strength to run postwar China. The leaders of postwar China will be brought forward by evolution or revolution, and it now seems more likely the latter.

Our policy at the present time should not be limited to support of Chiang. * * *

We can, as an alternative, support those elements which are capable of forming a new coalition, better able to carry the war to a conclusion and better qualified for the postwar needs of China.

Then Mr. Wallace made a recommendation which unquestionably is the germ of tactic which President Truman, a year and one-half later, in December 1945, incorporated in his instructions to General Marshall. Wallace wrote in his 1944 summary of his report:

The emergence of such a coalition could be aided by the manner of alloting both American military aid and economic aid, and by the formulation and statement of American political aims and sympathies, both in China and in regions adjacent to China. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 96, part 1, page 599.)

Compare this with the following from President Truman's letter—December 15, 1945—of instruction to General Marshall upon his appointment as special representative of the President to China:

I desire that you endeavor to persuade the Chinese Government to call a national conference of representatives of the major political elements to bring about the unification of China. * * *

It is my understanding that there is now in session in Chungking a Peoples' Consultative Council made up of representatives of the various political elements, including the Chinese Communists. The meeting of this council should furnish you with a convenient opportunity for discussions with the various political leaders.

* * * Particularly you may state (to Chiang Kai-shek and other Chinese leaders) in connection with the Chinese desire for credits, technical assistance in the economic field, and military assistance (I have in mind the proposed U. S. military advisory group which I have approved in principle), that a China disunited and torn by civil strife could not be considered realistically as a proper place for American assistance along the lines enumerated. (United States Relations With China, pp. 605-606.)

There is another, and in some respects more revealing, source of insight into the "realistic" qualifications which Henry Wallace possessed as an adviser to President Truman, particularly so far as his estimate of communism in China was concerned. This source is the "Summary Notes of Conversations" between Mr. Wallace and President Chiang, June 21-24, 1944, found in pages 549-559 of the China White Paper of August 1949.

Here are some of the more enlightening excerpts:

He—

said that the Chinese people did not regard the Communists as Chinese, but regarded them as internationalists, subject to the orders of the Third International. Mr. Wallace mentioned the fact that the Third International had been dissolved but President Chiang indicated that the situation had not been altered by that fact (pp. 552-553).

He—

said that the Communists desired a breakdown of Chinese resistance against the Japanese because this would strengthen their own position. Mr. Wallace expressed amazement at this statement. President Chiang admitted that the Communists desire the defeat of Japan but that they were now convinced that this defeat could be accomplished without Chinese resistance. They therefore hoped for the collapse of the Kuomintang prior to the end of the war because such a collapse would enable them to seize power, whereas, if the Kuomintang continued in power until peace the Communists would have no opportunity to supplant it. President Chiang referred to the clever Communist propaganda to the effect that they were not tied to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, that they were in fact nothing more than agrarian democrats. As a mattter of fact, the Communists follow the orders of the Third International. The Chinese Government cannot openly criticize the Communists for their connection with the Third International because it is afraid of offending the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. Mr. Wallace referred to the patriotic attitude of the Communists in the United States and said that he could not understand the attitude of the Chinese Communists, as described by President Chiang. President Chiang said that this difference in the attitude of the American and Chinese Communists might be explained by the fact that there was no possibility of the American Communists seizing power, whereas the Chinese Communists definitely desired to do so in China (p. 553).

Thus did the hard-headed battler of the Communists since the 1920's try to lead the visionary Wallace by the hand to a better acquaintance with the facts of life. He did not get far. Wallace commented, later in the same conversation, and "if, as President Chiang stated, the Chinese Communists were linked with the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, then there was even greater need for settlement" (p. 554).

The following day, according to Vincent's notes, Wallace took the tack with Chiang that "we are not interested in 'Chinese Communists' but are interested in the prosecution of the war." In that connection, Vincent adds a significant parenthetical note:

He—

and Mr. Vincent had decided upon this line of approach the night before in order to avoid further lengthy discussion of the Communists per se.

Even so, Mr. Wallace did not keep Chiang entirely away from the subject. The Generalissimo complained with obvious justification:

Much pressure has been brought to bear by the United States Government to have the Chinese Government reach a settlement with the Communists but the United States Government has exerted no pressure upon the Communists (p. 555).

To which I might add that Chiang, in 1944, "hadn't seen anything yet," along that line.

Mr. Wallace offered the gratuitous advice to Chiang that "there should be no situation in China which might lead to conflict with the U. S. S. R." At the same time he explained that the United States could not be expected to be a party to negotiations between China and the USSR, which takes on the character of a masterpiece of irony in view of what President Roosevelt subsequently agreed to, in the way of the betrayal of China, less than a year later at Yalta.

Mr. Wallace also gave Chiang the benefit of his wisdom on the subject of communism. He said, according to Mr. Vincent's notes, that "insofar as the Communists have power and influence it is due to economic conditions," and Mr. Vincent chimed in that "the best defense against communism in China was agrarian reform."

On the way to the airport to see Mr. Wallace off, President Chiang gave him his estimate of the Communists:

He—

Chiang—

feels that the Chinese Communists are not men of good faith. Their signature is no good. He would not like to see the President blamed for Communist failure to carry out commitments. The Generalissimo is a true friend who knows the Chinese Communists through and through and thinks that no matter what the Communists say they will do, it will not be carried out in which case the President's prestige would suffer a great loss. The Generalissimo wants the President to know that the conflict between the Communists and the Central Government is not like that between capitalism and labor in the United States—the situations are not analogous (p. 559).

The President then, of course, was Franklin D. Roosevelt. Judging from the decisions made by his successor, President Truman, and by the policy of appeasement toward the Chinese Communists carried out on Truman's instructions by General Marshall, Mr. Wallace, as constant adviser to President Truman in those critical decision days of late 1945 did not convince Mr. Truman of the soundness of Chiang Kai-shek's counsel. We know, of course, that Mr. Wallace wasn't convinced himself.

It is a curious sequel to this ill-fated relationship between Mr. Wallace and Mr. Truman in the China-policy-shaping days of late 1945, that when, as Chiang had predicted, his prestige began to suffer loss through the faithlessness of the Chinese Communists, Mr. Truman undertook to pretend that he had never favored including Chinese Communists in the Chinese Government.

The New York Times for March 12, 1948, quoted the President as saying, at a press conference, in answer to the direct question that if it was or had been American policy to favor inclusion of Communists in the Chinese Government "it was news to him." Yet the day before the same newspaper quoted Secretary of State Marshall as saying that the United States Government still favored broadening the base of the Chinese Government to include Communists.

Of such confusion and contradictions, was born our present tragic situation in the Far East. How lamentable that Wallace-Marshall-Truman shaped the decisive policy in 1945, when no one in the administration thought to consult General MacArthur.

Polish Independence Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an interesting article that appeared in the Daily Evening Item of Lynn, Mass., on May 3, 1951:

POLISH INDEPENDENCE DAY

May 3, 1791, is a date comparable in Polish history to July 4, 1776, in American annals. Just 160 years ago today Poland's Constitution was reformed by men of vigor, character, and capacity in its Diet who took advantage of favorable international developments to do away with its old, out-moded government.

The death of Frederick the Great in 1786 loosened the bonds of the alliance between Prussia and Russia. Russia undertook with Austria a war against Turkey, and Russia at the same time was attacked by Sweden. Prussia invited Poland to forsake her Russian alliance and offered to place 40,000 at her disposal.

But these advantageous external developments were useless so long as Poland was hampered by her anarchical constitution. The strong men in the Diet, taking advantage of an Easter recess when the malcontents were out of town, demanded reforms. King Stanislaus exhorted the deputies to accept the new constitution, and a brand-new era dawned for the Poles.

The change converted Poland into a hereditary limited monarchy. Invidious class distinctions were abolished. The towns got full administrative and judicial autonomy and a certain measure of parliamentary representation. The peasants were placed under the protection of the law, and their serfdom mitigated. Absolute religious toleration was established.

While Poland has seen many sorrowful days in the years which have intervened, 1791 stands out as a red-letter year in her history. Here in Lynn residents of Polish birth or descent will celebrate the anniversary Sunday with appropriate ceremonies. Their fellow citizens of good will will join with them in their prayers for a brighter day for their valiant homeland.

Equal Opportunity in Employment for the Physically Handicapped

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE R. HOEY
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. HOEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an essay written by George Kosciusko Weaver, who resides at 621 North Main Street, Louisburg, N. C., and is a member of the senior class of the W. R. Mills School, Louisburg, N. C. This essay is entitled "Equal Opportunity in Employment for the Physically Handicapped," and it won second prize in the contest conducted by the President's Committee on National Employ the Physically Handicapped. This contest was entered into by representatives of the high school students in 34 States, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands, and there were five awards. Each of the other four awards were won by young ladies, but the second award, which consisted of a trip to Washington and $400, was won by Mr. Weaver, the splendid high school student of Louisburg, N. C. These students visited Washington on Friday, May 4, 1951, and received the awards at the United States Department of Labor.

There being no objection, the essay was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EQUAL OPPORTUNITY IN EMPLOYMENT FOR THE PHYSICALLY HANDICAPPED

(By George Kosciusko Weaver)

Listen, America. May we have a moment of your time? A moment is all we ask, but it is truly a crucial one. Interrupt your daily routine, and listen to what we have to say. We assure you, you will not regret it. We are the voices of the physically handicapped. We speak in many tongues; we abide in many locales, and we ask for but one thing: To be given a chance—a chance to prove our worthiness and capabilities. We will do the rest.

You might ask, "Who are the physically handicapped? How can I help them if I do not know who they are?" You have only to look around to see us. Some of us are war casualties. Some have been disabled in accidents, some because of illness. The young man down the street who lost a leg in the war is one of use. The pretty but crippled young girl who had infantile paralysis is, too. We are at least 7,000,000 strong, and day by day we are increasing the working force of the United States to new heights. Rehabilitation agencies and groups are going a long way in enabling us to become competent and skilled workers, but much still remains to be done. A little encouragement and reassurance from you can go a long way in reinstating our pride and helping us to find the position that is congruent to our abilities.

Many of us are bewildered and fearful because of indifferent reactions on the part of our fellowman upon learning that we are handicapped in some manner. You can show your faith in us by giving us a chance for equal employment. This would help in giving us release from mental anguish, from an acquired feeling of inferiority, and from being called the "tin cup" brigade. To refuse us this may mean total destruction of our very life, for we will remain broken in body and spirit. Give us a chance at this thing called happiness. If you are interested at all in the welfare of our country, the well-being of its citizens, you are interested in the employment of us, the physically handicapped.

Some of us have been given this chance. Have we not proved our proficiency in many walks of life far better than expected? Our high output and efficiency records have equaled that of the unimpaired and excelled it in many places. We ask only that you take our records and study them carefully. Study them closely so that you may realize that we are just as capable of turning out excellent work as the nonhandicapped worker. After all, we are actually disabled only when our disabilities hamper us in performing the duties of a certain job. Analysis of our problems can easily determine which jobs we are capable of handling and which we are not. You must realize that in order to utilize the full potentiality of the Nation's working population, our talents and abilities must not be lost because of prejudiced and biased opinions on the part of the employers and employees. When we can do a job well, we are no longer considered handicapped as far as that job is concerned.

You have no doubt seen our slogan: Hire the Handicapped, It's Good Business, and have probably asked, Why should I hire the handicapped, when I can get all the employees I need from the ranks of the unimpaired? The answer to this question is obvious. Take another close look at our records. You will see that we have proved outstanding in the ability to adapt ourselves to existing requirements. We have an excellent record in carefulness and safety. We have demonstrated our proficiency in productiveness; our reliability and regularity record equals that of any working force in the Nation. These facts substantiate beyond the shadow of a doubt that it is good business to hire the handicapped.

If you are still a bit incredulous about our records as a whole, why not look at the individual ones? Your local rehabilitation agency will be more than glad to supply you with countless case histories of successful restitution which later led to profitable employment and happiness. Among our forefathers, you will find many notables who had some serious physical handicap but who overcame it to leave their footprints on the sands of time. Was not Milton blind, Edison and Beethoven deaf? As for our contemporaries, the late Franklin Delano Roosevelt, one of the greatest leaders our country has ever had, was crippled by infantile paralysis. Helen Keller, one of the greatest among women, became deaf and blind at a very early age. In overcoming her handicap, she has inspired many who otherwise probably would have never tried.

Many of us do not realize what is being done for our benefit. In this respect, it is the duty of the community to show those who are discouraged and disillusioned that a genuine effort is being made by the ones who understand our problems to locate a job adapted to our specific talent and ability. There are an estimated 6,000,000 of us who are employed while there is an estimated million who are not, but who are willing and who could be added to the working force of the Nation through better training and rehabilitation facilities, suited to the individual. Open the door of opportunity to us, and do unto us as you would have us do unto you were the tables turned and you were physically handicapped.

Why not give us this chance? Take our interests at heart and grant us the privilege of taking our rightful place in the community, State, and Nation. It is the people's way. It is the American way, the democratic way; and most important of all, it is God's way.

The Basic Pay of Commissioned and Enlisted Personnel of Our Armed Forces Should Be Regulated in Accordance With the Cost-of-Living Index

REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, I have just introduced House bill 3991 to provide that the basic pay of the commissioned and enlisted personnel of our Armed Forces should be regulated in accordance with the cost-of-living index compiled by the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the United States Department of Labor.

The bill provides that the President shall examine annually on May 15 the status of the cost-of-living index in relation to the pay scale as established by Congress October 1, 1949. Whenever the President finds that the cost-of-living index has risen above or fallen below the cost-of-living index of October 1, 1949, in excess of 3 percent, an adjustment in the basic pay of all members of the armed services shall be made as of July 1 of the calendar year in which such determination is made. In other words, the adjustment in pay scales is not retroactive.

When Congress passed the Career Compensation Act of 1949 and made it effective October 1, 1949, it represented the results of a comprehensive study by Congress and a similar study by an all-civilian commission appointed by the Secretary of Defense in 1947 and commonly called the Hook Commission.

It was found by the Hook commission after an exhaustive research into wages paid by industry of comparable jobs and taking into consideration the economic condition of the country during the summer of 1949 that the pay scales for ranks and grades of our Armed Forces were away out of line and needed adjustment. As a result, the Hook Commission presented to Congress pay scales that it felt were fair and equitable to all concerned. In submitting its recommendations the Hook Commission informed Congress that it felt that the spread of the pay scale was as sound at that time as it was possible to make it. At the same time, it was pointed out that as the country's economic condition changed from time to time, a flat percentage increase or decrease across the board to all concerned should be applied to pay and allowances so as not to upset the spread of pay scales as finally agreed upon.

Before Congress enacted into law the recommendations of the Hook Commission, it followed the cost-of-living index and reduced the proposed officers base pay 5 percent and enlisted personnel's base pay by 2 percent. Subsistence allowance was also reduced by $3. In other words, before the recommendations could be written into law the cost of living dropped with the result that the proposed pay scales were adjusted accordingly.

Since the Career Compensation Act of 1949 was approved by Congress, there has been a considerable change in the economic condition of the country. The cost-of-living index published monthly by the Department of Labor shows a decided upward swing since the fall of 1949. The following comparison between the index of August 1949 and February 1951 plainly shows the status of the take-home pay of the members of the military services in regard to the economic position of the country:

Table (furnished by the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the U. S. Department of Labor)

	Over-all	Food	Apparel	Rent	Fuel, electricity, refrigeration	House furnishings	Miscellaneous
August 1949	168.8	202.6	187.4	120.8	135.7	184.8	154.8
February 1951	183.8	226.0	202.0	134.0	143.9	209.7	169.2
Percentage rise	11.6	7.8	11.0	6.6	13.5	10.5

A study of the above table reveals that since the enactment of the Career Compensation Act of 1949, the over-all average cost of living increase is 9 percent according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the United States Department of Labor.

Keeping in mind that military personnel are located by and large in congested areas the cost of living percentages would reflect even greater changes for them because of shortages of housing, and so forth, which tend to increase rates due to the congested area conditions. Then, too, frequent moves of the service family tend to cause their expenses for house furnishings to be greater than the average, when they have to more frequently set up housekeeping in new locations. This factor also influences the miscellaneous category which shows an increase of 10.5 percent.

When taking into consideration these additional factors one can readily see that the over-all cost-of-living increase for service personnel could be estimated in the neighborhood of 10 percent to 12 percent for the categories listed above.

Practically all forms of transportation, both local and national, have increased a great deal in cost during this period. A major point the Hook Commission took into consideration in their study was the Armed Forces income-tax exemption which was repealed effective

January 1, 1949. The Commission took this loss of exemption into account so that no member of the Armed Forces actually took a cut in his over-all salary. Since the enactment of the Career Compensation Act, the withholding tax rate for Federal income tax has been increased from 15 to 18 percent. This results in a decrease in the take-home pay not contemplated by the Hook Commission, while at the same time the cost of living has steadily increased.

It is common knowledge that the cost-of-living index is used as a pattern for the pay of personnel in private industry and on that basis several pay increases have been granted since 1949. Yet, to date no consideration has been given to living expenses of military personnel.

I hope that my bill, H. R. 3991, will receive immediate consideration by Congress so that those men and women who serve in our Armed Forces will be given the same consideration as accorded those who work in private industry.

The American Pretzel

REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL B. DAGUE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. DAGUE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I would like to call to your attention that Wednesday of this week will mark an important anniversary in the industrial and social life of my district and, in fact, of the entire Nation.

May 9 marks the celebration of the creation of what has virtually become a national institution—the American pretzel, which is 90 years old this month.

Actually, I might point out, the pretzel is many centuries old, dating back to earliest religious rites. But the commercial pretzel, a tribute to the heralded American ingenuity and business acumen, was born in the tiny town of Lititz, Pa., in the Ninth Congressional District in 1861.

Like so many things American, the pretzel has its roots in many cultures. In ancient Rome, the pretzel symbolized victory in battle; while in the early monasteries it meant the crossed arms of prayer. To us it is a symbol of our ability to synthesize basic ingredients into a product vastly superior to its ancestors. Incidentally your early pretzel was known in Italy as "brazitella" and in Germany as "brezel."

But all these early pretzels had a life span of only one day. They were baked in the corner bake shop, and were eaten only by people close to the bakery. It remained for an American to invent a formula which would keep pretzels fresh for days and weeks and even months. And it took American businessmen to carry the pretzel to every home, to establish the pretzel as a part of our everyday lives.

Never sneer at the pretzel, nor discount its impact on the economy of the Nation. Munch instead for a moment on the fact that approximately 100,000,000 pounds of pretzels are made and consumed in the United States each year. One hundred million pounds of pretzels, more than the total displacement of our largest battleship, the Mighty Mo, the U. S. S. Missouri.

A plaque will be unveiled on the N. D. Sturgis pretzel plant, where, in 1861, an itinerant baker revealed a secret formula he had devised to make commercial pretzels. Almost like a symbol of American resourcefulness, like a Johnny Appleseed, this unknown baker planted the seed of the American pretzel at Lititz, and then quietly moved on.

From that seed grew the international pretzel industry, which has carried the pretzel to us all.

As a supplement to these remarks, I would call to your attention the following chronological account of the development of the pretzel to its present culinary perfection. And for more tangible evidence concerning this Pennsylvania Dutch delicacy I would invite you to help yourself to the pretzels which will be placed in the cloak rooms and on the tables in the House dining rooms through the courtesy of the National Pretzel Bakers Institute. You will find them to be a delightful version of an old twist. The above-mentioned follows:

FACTS ABOUT THE NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE PRETZEL

The inhabitants of the hamlet of Lititz, Pa. (population 5,500), will devote May 9, 1951, to the American pretzel. On that date Lititz will step back to the year 1861, when the first commercial pretzel was baked in a Lititz oven.

Schoolchildren, businessmen and other burghers of Lititz will participate in the holiday. Gov. John S. Fine and other State dignitaries, and show-business figures, will join descendants of the first pretzel baker in the observance of the humble start of an international industry.

As the culmination of the ceremonies, a plaque, dedicated by the National Pretzel Bakers Institute, will be unveiled on the N. D. Sturgis pretzel factory, site of the first commercial pretzel. The marker will be unveiled by Linda Herr, 6, and Robert Spickler, 8, great grandchild, and great-great grandchild respectively, of the first pretzel baker.

Following is the Lititz legend: The first skirmishes of the Civil War were being waged when a wanderer strolled into the tranquillity of the picturesque Pennsylvania Dutch community of Lititz. The vagabond, his sack slung to a stick over his shoulder, stopped at the tiny shop of baker William H. Rauch, and requested a temporary job. "I'm a wandering man," he explained, "I don't know how long I'll stay." Baker Rauch wiped his flour-covered hands on the apron that covered his round belly, and smiled, "Stay as long as you like."

And so, the itinerant baker went to work for Rauch, making, among other delicacies, the light, flavorful pretzels for which the Pennsylvania Dutch were famous. But, as wonderful as they were, these pretzels became stale after 24 hours.

Baker Rauch fed his transient employee the good, wholesome upstate Dutch dishes. Most of all, Rauch offered his hobo baker the warmth and hospitality of his home. Finally, however, the urge to move on forced the wanderer to leave. In gratitude, the vagabond baker showed old man Rauch a formula he had invented to make pretzels that would stay fresh; pretzels that could be made in quantity and sold days later.

But Baker Rauch did not appreciate the value of the secret formula. He gave the formula to his apprentice, Julius Sturgis. Sturgis then established the first pretzel factory in the world on Main Street in Lititz. This historic plant is still in operation producing the pretzel that made Lititz famous.

From this inauspicious beginning, from the gratitude of a vagabond baker, grew the pretzel industry. Today almost 100,000,000 pounds of pretzels are baked each year, baked with the secret formula presented to Baker Rauch 90 years ago.

The origin of the humble pretzel is shrouded in antiquity; it has been traced back through prereligious associations to basic life symbolism. The first neopretzels were made to celebrate the worship of wheat as a giver of life.

In an approximation of chronological order: the pretzel is believed to be a descendant of the Hebrew bagel; it was a symbol of victory in battle to the ancient Romans; used for healing and in burial ceremonies; as a symbol of prayer to the medieval church, and for the observance of the New Year in middle Europe.

In the ancient monasteries, the pretzel, representing the crossed arms of prayer, was given to children as a reward for the successful completion of their catechism.

It was used by the medieval bakers guilds as the honored badge of their trade. And it was proudly emblazoned by Emperor Frederick of Prussia after the bakers rescued his armies from a major defeat in battle.

There are two derivations suggested for the name pretzel. One begins with the Latin "bracellus," meaning "armlet"—to the Italian "bracciella"—to old high German "brazitella"—to the middle high German "brezel"—to dialect "bretzel"—to the current word "pretzel."

Another source traces the name back to the Latin "pretiola" meaning "small gift," which the monks would offer to worthy child students.

The pretzel, at one time, was so integral a part of the church procedure that a Roman Catholic ban once prohibited its usage in any other connection.

However, after many centuries, the pretzel became even more inextricably associated with the Bavarian beer hall. Beer and pretzels were a pair rivaling ham and eggs, or moon and June.

It was the Germans who brought the pretzel to the new continent. As early as 1613 pretzels came to America, to the new community of Germantown, in Pennsylvania.

From 1613 to 1861 pretzels were almost exclusive to the Pennsylvania German communities. The major reason for their restricted usage was their impermanence. Pretzels had to be hand-rolled and twisted, and baked either in a home oven or at the corner bake shop. They had a freshness span of only 1 day.

But then, the tramp visited Lititz, and devised the formula which made pretzels available to the world.

From the original pretzel factory belonging to Julius Sturgis, apprentices carried the pretzel formula throughout up-State Pennsylvania, where some 70 percent of all pretzels are still made; and thence to Ohio, Michigan, and other States.

Still, pretzels were associated chiefly with beer, until the appearance on the pretzel panorama of Harold H. Moss.

An ex-clergyman turned pretzel publicist, silver-haired, blond-browed Moss devoted himself with truly religious zeal to the homely pretzel. Single-handedly, Moss carried the pretzel out of the beer hall.

Moss sold the nation on pretzels and ice cream. He invented pretzel variations like the pretzel stick, chocolate-covered and peppermint flavored pretzels. He foraged through the kitchens of the Pennsylvania Dutch communities and came up with pretzel soups, pretzel salads, pretzel soufflés and pancakes.

Another great stimulus to pretzel sales was the advent of the pretzel-twisting machine. A serious shortage of pretzel-benders was imminent in 1938 when the mechanical twister made its welcome appearance.

From a poundage in 1938 of 52,000,000, Moss and the machine twister lifted pretzel sales to the present figure of almost 100,000,000 pounds.

In addition, 92.2 percent of all pretzels are now sold in groceries, delicatessens and school cafeterias.

After a long, long journey, the pretzel has finally found its way home.

Independent Offices Appropriation Bill, 1952

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT THOMAS
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, in extending my remarks during general debate on the independent offices appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1952, I wish to express my sincere appreciation for the fine cooperation of the other members of the subcommittee in conducting the hearings, in writing the bill, and passing it through the House. Mr. GORE, of Tennessee, and Mr. ANDREWS, of Alabama, are veteran members of the Appropriations Committee and have had much experience as members of the Independent Offices Subcommittee. Their assistance has been indispensable. Their service to the Nation and to their districts is outstanding. Their judgment is always excellent; their sense of fairness is always present. On the minority side, we have such outstanding old timers, so to speak, as Mr. PHILLIPS, of California, and Mr. COUDERT, of New York. Mr. PHILLIPS is the ranking Republican member and he does an outstanding job. He is always courteous, polite, and at all times knows all the facts and figures in every proceeding. His district and the entire State of California and the Nation can well be proud of him. In this subcommittee which deals largely with bipartisan commissions, very little partisan politics is indulged in. Mr. COUDERT brings a wealth of business experience to the committee. His ideas and good judgment always carry great weight with the other members. We have for the first time on our subcommittee, even though they are old members of the Appropriations Committee, Mr. YATES, of Illinois, and Mr. NORRIS COTTON, of New Hampshire. Mr. YATES is brilliant and hard-working. He has taken a most active part in conducting hearings and writing the bill. He has added much balance to the committee. Mr. COTTON, of New Hampshire, has a wealth of what we Texans call common horse sense and is an outstanding credit to all of New England and to the great State of New Hampshire which he so ably represents. All of us like him and admire him.

Much has been said on the floor of this House today about the provision on pages 49 and 50 of the bill under "Maritime activities" relating to payments by the United States on account of the purchase, requisition, or loss of vessels.

The tabulation which follows shows for a small number of ships chosen at random by the Maritime Administration the acquisition cost to the owner, the amount paid by the Maritime Commission for charter hire, and the amount paid the owner when the ship was sunk. It should be noted that more than 750 such ships were lost during the war. Following this tabulation is a letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, dealing with the same subject matter.

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, May 4, 1951.

Hon. ALBERT THOMAS,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Independent Offices Appropriations, Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Your letter of today requests my comments on the following provision carried in the appropriation for maritime activities of the Department of Commerce on pages 49 and 50 of the Independent Offices appropriation bill, 1952, as reported by the Committee on Appropriations:

"No money appropriated by this or any other act may be used for the payment to the owner on account of the purchase, requisition, or loss for which the United States is responsible of any vessel previously sold by the United States in an amount in excess of the price paid the United States depreciated as hereinafter provided, plus depreciated cost of capital improvements made on such vessel, subsequent to such sale by the United States: Provided, That, in the case of any vessel the price of which has been adjusted pursuant to the provisions of section 9 of the Merchant Ship Sales Act of 1946, as amended, the payment shall not exceed the statutory sales price of such vessel as of March 8, 1946, depreciated, plus the depreciated cost of capital improvements made on such vessel subsequent to such date: Provided further, That in the case of a bona fide purchaser for value, the payment may equal but not exceed the adjusted basis of the vessel in the hand of such purchaser determined under section 113 (b) of the Internal Revenue Code. If any vessel previously sold by the United States is chartered or taken for use by the United States, the charter hire paid for bareboat use of the vessel shall not be based on a value in excess of the payment permitted under the preceding provisions in case the vessel were purchased by the United States. Depreciation under the preceding provisions shall be computed in accordance with the schedule adopted by the Bureau of Internal Revenue for income-tax purposes, or, in the absence of any such schedule, depreciation shall be computed at the rate of 5 per centum per annum. Notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, neither the Secretary of Commerce nor the Federal Maritime Board shall determine, for any purpose whatsoever, a valuation for any vessel previously sold by the United States, except in accordance with the preceding provisions."

An identical provision was included in the third supplemental appropriation bill, 1951, H. R. 3587, as passed by the House, but was stricken from the bill when reported by the Senate Appropriations Committee. That provision was submitted by the Maritime Administrator at the request of your subcommittee in order to apply to all cases of vessels sold by the United States, and later reacquired by the Government, the principles of section 802 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, as amended, limiting the amount to be paid by the United States through purchase or requisition for vessels on which a construction-differential subsidy was paid. I am aware that the provisions of section 802 require the limitation on the price to be paid by the United States in event of reacquisitions to be written into contracts executed by the former Maritime Commission, whereas many of the vessels to which the presently proposed limitation might apply were acquired from the Government without such provisions in the contracts. Thus, the present limitation represents a belated attempt to remedy what I have felt was a basic defect in the Ship Sales Act of 1946. Notwithstanding the potential legal and constitutional questions which might be raised, it is a laudable effort to conserve the taxpayers' funds in a field where past history has shown that the interests of the Government have suffered in transactions involving the disposal of ships by the Government at depressed prices and the later payment by the Government for acquisition, charter, or loss of the same vessels at much higher prices.

Time does not permit the ascertainment of the aggregate amounts involved in such cases. Certain of those cases were referred to by you on the floor of the House yesterday. Others have been the subject of reports to the Congress by the General Accounting Office incident to its examinations of the accounts and records of the former Maritime Commission.

The following two cases are representative of what has happened in the past and what will happen again unless some limitation can be established on the amounts to be paid by the Government upon reacquisition of vessels previously disposed of by it:

The first company purchased 23 vessels built by the Government during 1919, 1920, and 1921, at an estimated cost to the Government of $41,421,000. The company's cost of acquisition was $1,570,000. The book value of the vessels at December 31, 1941, was $982,000, and the former Maritime Commission's estimated world market value at December 31, 1938, was $2,170,000. The Commission chartered all these vessels for varying periods during World War II and paid effective bareboat charter hire of $7,162,000. Ten of the vessels were sunk, and for those 10 vessels the owner received insurance of approximately $4,910,000, most of which was paid by the Government. Two of the vessels were requisitioned for title in 1945 for $640,000. Thus, the amount received by the owner for the use, loss, and taking of vessels, for which he paid $1,570,000, was $12,712,000.

Following World War II, the same company bought 26 vessels, most of which were built in 1944. The cost to the Government was $74,835,000, of which $3,434,000 was for national-defense features. The basic sales price to the purchaser was $24,720,000 less class and reconversion allowances of $1,056,000, leaving a net recovery to the Government of $23,664,000.

The second company acquired nine vessels built in 1919 and 1920, at a cost to the Government of $13,739,000. Those vessels cost the company $529,000. Their book value at December 31, 1941, was $343,000, and the former Maritime Commission's world market value December 31, 1938, was $755,000. All nine vessels were chartered to the Government during World War II and effective bare-boat charter hire of $1,707,000 was paid by the Government. In addition, the owner collected insurance of $2,852,000, most of which was paid by the Government, for five of the vessels which were sunk, and $789,000 for two of the vessels requisitioned for title by the Government in 1944 and 1945. Thus, the amount received by the owner for the use, loss, and taking of vessels, for which he paid $529,000, was $5,348,000.

This second company after World War II bought 7 vessels built in 1944 and 1945, at a cost to the Government of $32,034,000, of which $10,276,000 was for national-defense features. The basic sales price to the purchaser was $7,513,000 less class and reconversion allowances of $1,797,000, leaving a net recovery by the Government of $5,716,000.

It should be emphasized that the foregoing cases are not isolated ones. However, they should be sufficient to indicate that the Government, which inevitably sells its vessels in a buyer's market and buys them in a seller's market, needs every legitimate means to minimize the resulting financial disadvantages.

Naturally, representatives of those interests which would be affected by the operation of the proposed limitation have argued strongly against it. They have raised doubts in the minds of conscientious legislators who have expressed those doubts in debate. It is fully recognized that the provision, while binding on the Maritime Administration, the Department of Commerce, and the General Accounting Office, would be open to construction in court actions. Concerning the constitutional point of just compensation, I can only restate the traditional position of the General Accounting Office—and to my mind the only sound position that can be taken by the Office—that it does not exist to question the constitutionality, but to carry out faithfully the mandates of legislation enacted by the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

LINDSAY C. WARREN,
Comptroller General of the United States.

Wholesale Price Index Reveals Inflationary Trend Continues

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following news bulletin for May 3, 1951:

WHOLESALE PRICE INDEX REVEALS INFLATIONARY TREND CONTINUES

The damage being done to the whole domestic economy by the continuing inflation, and the consequent loss in purchasing power of the dollar is clearly revealed by a study of the fluctuation in the wholesale-price index for commodities in general, all considered necessary to the proper and efficient functioning of our economy.

The respective price index for selected years based upon 1926 equals 100 and the relative purchasing power of $1 is shown by the table which follows:

	Wholesale price index	Purchasing power of dollar
1890	56.2	$1.779
1896	46.5	2.150
1900	56.1	1.782
1904	59.7	1.675
1908	62.9	1.590
1912	69.1	1.447
1916	85.1	1.175
1920	154.4	.668
1924	98.1	1.019
1928	96.7	1.033
1932	64.8	1.543
1936	88.8	1.237
1937	86.3	1.158
1938	78.6	1.272
1939	77.1	1.297
1940	78.6	1.272
1941	87.3	1.145
1942	98.8	1.012
1943	103.1	.970
1944	104.0	.961
1945	105.8	.945
1946	121.1	.825
1947	152.1	.657
1948	165.0	.606
1949	155.0	.645
1950:
June	157.3	.636
July	162.9	.613
August	166.4	.601
September	169.5	.590
December	175.3	.570
1951: March	184.0	543

Government deficit spending appears to be the largest contributing factor to the continued inflationary rise in wholesale prices.

Submerged Lands, House Joint Resolution 131 and Senate Joint Resolution 20—Remarks No. 1

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE DOYLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the unanimous consent of the Members of this House, that I be permitted so to do, I am privileged to present to your attention very important information with reference to the tideland oil or submerged lands and some of the situation as relates to my home city of Long Beach, Los Angeles County, Calif.

Now there is pending before the Senate Interim Committee Senate Joint Resolution 20 by the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY]. This measure is commonly known as the interim tidelands bill and its companion measure in the same text, in the House is House Joint Resolution 131. It is by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], chairman of Judiciary.

It is well known that former United States Senator Sheridan Downey, of California, was several weeks ago retained by the city of Long Beach to represent its position in the tidelands matter to those interested and to Congress. On April 30, 1951, this distinguished citizen, representing Long Beach City, brought to me the following text of a proposed amendment to Senate Joint Resolution 20, which text I personally delivered the same day to the distinguished chairman of the Senate Interim Committee, presently considering Senate Joint Resolution 20. The text is as follows:

It is hereby provided that all the area off the coast of California in San Pedro Bay landward from the Federal breakwater and landward from a line extending from the eastern end of said breakwater due east to the shore line is hereby recognized as and declared to be inland waters.

My extemporaneous statement made before the O'Mahoney Senate committee on February 21, 1951, contains my discussion there made, but in addition thereto, I confirmed the fact that the city of Long Beach did not then and does not now claim anything seaward beyond the corporate limits of the city of Long Beach. Here is the text taken from the Senate committee hearings:

STATEMENT OF HON. CLYDE DOYLE, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, certainly I would be remiss if I did not state briefly that I very much appreciate the courtesy of the chairman of this committee and members of the committee in inviting me to sit at the committee table during these hearings. You did so at the last session of Congress at similar hearings, and I appreciate your repeating the courtesy.

There are here in the room, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, certain distinguished citizens from my home city of Long Beach that have been sent by my city across the continent to appear at these hearings to add weight, at least by their presence, to the position of my home city on this important subject, and I would like the privilege of just presenting them to the committee. It will only take about 30 seconds, and I am sure they would be honored by being so presented, and I am sure the committee would be glad to see them personally.

So if I may have that privilege, first I have the honor to introduce the Honorable Councilman Keller, chairman of the oil petroleum committee of the city council of my city, and also a petroleum engineer.

Emmet H. Sullivan, a member of the harbor board of my home city of Long Beach, and Mr. Amar, harbor manager of my city, and we think the best harbor manager of one of the greatest harbors in the country.

I will be very brief. I feel that the record is fairly well complete, as the chairman has said, on most of the material points that could be presented at such a hearing as this. Furthermore, our very able city attorney is here again, and I will yield what time I might otherwise take in his favor and in favor of the deputy attorney general of my State, who is also to testify this afternoon.

As a member of the Seventy-ninth Congress I filed for the State a quitclaim bill representing the State theory of ownership of tidelands. I believe the record will show that I filed my bill before the Attorney General filed his suit against the State of California. I filed only after conference with the then Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Ickes, and with the then Attorney General, Mr. Biddle.

At that time before the suit was filed, I registered objection to the proposed suit, and I urged that no accounting be asked of my State or of my city of any oil royalties received by either the State or the city on the grounds that my city had received its tideland grants in good faith from my native State of California in 1911; the State of California dealt in good faith when it made the grants and when it made the oil leases; and also that when my home city had contracted its oil wells on tidelands for production purposes that it had dealt in good faith.

We passed a quitclaim bill in the House of Representatives in that Seventy-ninth Congress. I think there were only 11 votes against it. I was one of the Members of Congress who voted to override the veto of the President of the United States of that bill.

Again in the Eighty-first Congress I again filed what we term, what this committee terms, the quitclaim theory for the State of California and other States, and I again supported that theory by appearing before the House committee, and then by appearing before this committee during your important hearings in the month of August 1950.

I also appeared in the House in the Seventy-ninth Congress in behalf of passage of the quitclaim theory bill for the State of California and the city of Long Beach.

And now in this session of Congress I again filed the same bill that had been approved in the last session of Congress by the House Judiciary Committee and for which a rule was granted by the House of Representatives. The text of that bill was the same as the Walters bill of the last session of Congress and the same as the Walters bill this session of Congress.

My resolution was H. R. 58, filed January 3, 1951, and I believe was the first bill filed in the House of Representatives, at least numerically, representing that theory.

I, of course, am in support of the Walters bill in the House of Representatives.

The City Council of Long Beach, the city harbor board, the city of Long Beach, forwarded to me recently under certification of the city clerk, copies of Resolution No. C-12838, dated February 6, 1951, registering opposition to Senate Resolution 20 and House Joint Resolution 131.

I, therefore, and because I also as Congressman feel that that was the consistent position for the city of Long Beach to take under the circumstances, oppose the two resolutions just named by me.

As I said, the city attorney will register the arguments. I will not take time so to do.

I do wish to say that I have here Assembly Joint Resolution No. 3 by the Assembly of the State of California registering objection to Senate Resolution 20. I wish to file that with the committee, and also Assembly Joint Resolution No. 4.

The CHAIRMAN. This material may be received and made part of the record.

(The following resolutions are those referred to.)

"Assembly Joint Resolution 3

"Joint resolution relative to the tidelands and submerged lands adjacent to the coastal States

"Whereas until recently it was generally recognized that all of the coastal States owned a belt of land beneath navigable waters adjacent to their coasts; and

"Whereas in 1947 the Supreme Court of the United States held that those lands were not owned by the States and that the Federal Government rather than the States has paramount rights in and power over the 3-mile belt of land; and

"Whereas the effect of the decision of the Supreme Court was to divest the States of valuable oil rights; and

"Whereas State ownership of the 3-mile land is not inconsistent with the Federal control necessary in the conduct of international affairs and Coast Guard activities: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California (jointly), That the Congress of the United States is respectfully memorialized to enact such legislation as will be necessary to restore the ownership of the 3-mile belt of land beneath navigable waters adjacent to the coasts of the coastal States; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly is directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative of a coastal State in the Congress of the United States."

"Assembly Joint Resolution 4

"Joint resolution relative to lands beneath the navigable waters adjacent to the coasts of coastal States

"Whereas a recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States refutes a long recognized claim of the coastal States to the 3-mile belt of land beneath the navigable waters adjacent to their coasts; and

"Whereas the effect of this decision was to divest those States of valuable oil rights; and

"Whereas ownership of such land by the coastal States would in no way interfere with Federal control necessary in the conduct of international affairs and Coast Guard activities; and

"Whereas if it is possible for the Federal Government to secure the ownership of such lands on the basis of its contentions before the Supreme Court, there is a danger that the ownership of all State lands in other States as well as in the coastal States will be jeopardized; and

"Whereas the Legislature of the State of California, has, by resolution, memorialized the Congress of the United States to enact legislation necessary to restore this land to the State: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the legislatures of each of the States are urged to adopt a resolution similar to that of the California Legislature; and be it further

"Resolved, That the legislature of each of the States is requested to transmit to the Legislature of California copies of any resolutions adopted or notice of any taken relative to the subject matter of this resolution; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly is directed to transmit a copy of this resolution to each of the legislative bodies of each of the States."

Mr. DOYLE. In closing, Mr. Chairman, may I reserve the right to file a short statement in addition to this brief by me?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, indeed. The committee will be very glad to receive it.

(NOTE.—The supplemental statement filed by Congressman DOYLE appears in the Appendixes.)

Mr. DOYLE. The resolution by the City Council of Long Beach, referred to, and the harbor board, referred to, on February 6, 1951, was incorporated by me with appropriate remarks by myself on February 13, 1951, at page A748 in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD Appendix.

I wish again to renew my appreciation for the courtesy of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Congressman DOYLE, as physical proof of the fact that your presentation to us last year has not been forgotten, I hold in my hand a copy of a photograph of Long Beach which you were good enough to present to the committee at the hearing on Senate Joint Resolution 195 last year.

This photograph, an enlargement of which we also received and which I have sent for in order to be exhibited here, contains a representation of the line of demarcation fixed in the stipulation between the State of California and the Government of the United States. It also shows the limit of the bay as defined for the purposes of the cases of United States v. Carillo (13 Federal Supplement 121). It shows also a third line much farther seaward running from Point Fermin to Newport Beach. This line cuts off a part of the city of Long Beach itself, and from my way of thinking would be utterly and completely unfair to the city of Long Beach.

I want the record to be clear, however, that nothing in this bill curtails, or fixes, I should probably say, the boundary of the inland navigable waters. The greatest care was taken in drafting the bill to make certain that it would not in any way fix that line. The fixing of the line will be made either by way of the decision of the Supreme Court after the master's report has been received or in permanent legislation eventually passed by the Congress.

I am sorry that the enlarged map is not present in the room, but I will hand this down the line so all the members of the committee may see it.

Mr. DOYLE. I wish to thank the chairman for that statement. I know, Mr. Chairman, you made a similar statement at the hearings before this committee last session of Congress when I questioned the propriety of that proposed line.

Mr. Speaker, I have also made further extensions to remarks on this same important subject at other points in this CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I respectfully call your attention thereto; including part of the testimony by City Attorney Irving Smith, to whom I yielded some of my time.

Submerged Lands—House Joint Resolution 131 and Senate Joint Resolution 20—Remarks No. 2

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE DOYLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, I herewith present more of my testimony before the Senate interim committee, presided over by the distinguished Senator of Wyoming in connection with Senate Joint Resolution 20, on February 21, 1951. This and other extensions of remarks in this RECORD by me should be read together. The text is as follows:

SUBMERGED LANDS

Senator LONG. Could I ask the witness whether the line here on the picture outside the proposed Government line——

Mr. DOYLE. That, Senator LONG, is the Federal breakwater.

Senator LONG. And I take it that the proposed line proposes to take for the Federal Government approximately half the land inside the breakwater—in fact possibly more than half.

Mr. DOYLE. More than half, Senator. Further, the fact is that the corporate limits of my city, which is a municipality under our State law and a city of first class, extend out at every point at least as far as the Federal breakwater and in two or three places slightly beyond the Federal breakwater; in other words, approximately 3 miles out.

With reference to what the chairman said, I call your attention to the fact that the Government proposed line here [indicating] is at Gaviola Avenue. That is the landward end, and leaves 3 miles and almost 4 miles of municipal beach and municipal water which could be leased by the Secretary of the Interior if he wanted to under this resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Congressman, you are mistaken about that on two grounds. First, this line which is denominated the "proposed line" is only the line of the stipulation.

Mr. DOYLE. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. And the Government has never proposed any such line. No person has made any representation to this committee to the effect that that should be the boundary line. It is not a proposed line. That line, according to all of the information I have received, was drawn in the stipulation merely for the purpose of putting on the landward side all of the wells that have been drilled there. It is my information that there is no well in the Long Beach Harbor on the seaward side of that line. But I have tried to make it clear that so far as the chairman of this committee is concerned, and I would judge from the expression of other members of the committee, there is nobody on this committe who even dreams that that line of the stipulation should be regarded as the boundary of the inland navigable waters. The boundary in my judgment must be much farther seaward. It certainly should not be permitted to cut off any part of the city of Long Beach.

Mr. DOYLE. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

I just urge to your attention very briefly two points on that.

Senator ANDERSON. Do you agree with that or not?

Mr. DOYLE. Yes, Mr. Senator.

Senator ANDERSON. What the chairman has just said?

Mr. DOYLE. I do. As far as I know, that is a fact.

Senator ANDERSON. Then why is it called the Government-proposed line?

Mr. DOYLE. Well, that is the farthest south line, or the line out the farthest in our harbor which the Government is willing to accept.

Senator ANDERSON. As part of the stipulation?

The CHAIRMAN. As part of the stipulation?

Mr. DOYLE. Manifestly, Mr. Chairman, at least the whole corporate limits of my city was an inland bay, and all these years——

The CHAIRMAN. My understanding about it, sir, was that that line was drawn not for the purpose of fixing a boundary but for the purpose of defining the line on the landward side of which were all of the wells that have been drilled. It was a line of convenience and not a line of determination of boundaries?

Senator SMATHERS. May I ask a question?

Mr. DOYLE. Yes.

Senator SMATHERS. Did the people of California propose that line there?

Mr. DOYLE. We did not.

Senator SMATHERS. Who proposed that line?

Mr. DOYLE. May I ask the city attorney?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. IRVING W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I believe I should clarify this because of the lack of information. That is a Government proposed line. The Justice Department petitioned the Supreme Court in the California case that they fix this segment of the California coast line as the final line of the inland waters at San Pedro Bay and ocean front at Long Beach. And the Attorney General for California, Mr. Mattoon, I am sure will bear out and supplement that with documents.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Smith, let the Chair interrupt so as to clarify again. Mr. Smith is testifying with respect to the lawsuit. Now what he says about the lawsuit is correct. I am talking about the legislation, and I want to make it as clear as clear can be that, so far as the sponsors of this legislation are concerned and according to my judgment as far as the committee is concerned, that line has never been drawn. It means nothing to us, and nothing in this bill is intended to fix that line or to control the right of the city of Long Beach to areas seaward of that line. We are taking nothing away from it in this legislation.

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Chairman, may I make one brief observation though? Of course, the fact that that was proposed by the Government in the lawsuit as the permanent line is the cause of fear on the part of our people.

The CHAIRMAN. Naturally. I can understand that and I am doing my best to allay that feeling.

Mr. DOYLE. One further point so that you realize that the city council and the harbor board have more than just ordinary causes of fear, and that is this: That within the last year the harbor department of my city asked the right of the Federal Government to dredge just adjacent to this proposed line, outside, for the purpose of getting land to fill a pier inside the proposed line, and the Federal Government refused the right of my city to dredge in our own municipal harbor contiguous to the Government proposed line to get land to fill a pier area within my corporate limits on the ground, Mr. Chairman, that the dredging would take place outside the Government proposed line in this lawsuit. And now, therefore, we come before you, as you realize, with the real ground, we feel, of fear. Furthermore, we are dead anxious to have that point clarified at the earliest possible date, and Senate Joint Resolution 20 doesn't, as the distinguished chairman said it couldn't, because it is an engineering problem.

But we again insist—and this will be my last statement—we again insist that the least that can be done, and I think the chairman has made it clear for the committee that there certainly should be no opposition to all the corporate limits in the city of Long Beach being understood to be exempted from any inclusion of less than an inland bay. Clearly it is an inland bay and should be exempted for purposes of legislation.

Senator MILLIKIN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask if it is the chairman's interpretation that the bill before us is broad enough in its terms to support the claim of these gentlemen?

The CHAIRMAN. It does not deny the claim, not at all. And I say for myself, and I know Senator Anderson agrees with me, that nothing in this bill is intended to divide the city of Long Beach.

It is obvious from looking at this photograph that the line of the stipulation, here called the Government Proposed Line because it was so proposed in the lawsuit, touches the shore at a point which is apparently well within the corporate limits of the city. There are houses which run right down to the beach on the seaward side of that line. I think it would be absurd to hold that those houses on the seaward side of that line were actually on the open sea. They are not on the open sea, they are on a bay.

Senator MILLIKIN. May I ask, Mr. Chairman, whether these gentlemen have proposed an amendment that would skirt the controversy but broaden this particular situation?

The CHAIRMAN. Not yet.

Mr. DOYLE. I think, Mr. Chairman, that concludes my statement in favor of my time going to the city attorney unless there are some questions.

Senator LONG. May I suggest to the witness, Mr. Congressman, and I believe you will agree with me, that there is nothing particularly wrong about the Federal Government or the Solicitor for the Federal Government claiming everything he can for the Government. I believe his statement yesterday was to that effect, that it was his duty to claim for the Government everything he could claim to which the Government might have some claim. That does not necessarily mean it is just or belongs to the Government just because the Solicitor claims it for the Government.

Mr. DOYLE. Senator, granting that is true, I am not willing to grant that even the Solicitor of the United States shall make a claim that has no basis in fact or merit, and that is what he did when in this lawsuit he claimed this Government-proposed line, manifestly the whole corporate limits of my city, of the bay. And the least he could have offered to stipulate to, in my judgment—and I am a lawyer, too—is the corporate limits of my city.

Senator ANDERSON. You have done pretty well in the Supreme Court so far, have you not?

Mr. DOYLE. No, not with regard to my city.

Senator ANDERSON. But you are saying he had no merit behind anything he is contending on this thing.

Mr. DOYLE. I didn't say that, Senator. I said he had no basis in fact or merit so far as my city is concerned in my judgment.

Senator ANDERSON. Let me ask this: Your city and other groups worked hard to defeat the legislation in August of 1950. Do you think the position of your city and these other States was improved by the defeat of that legislation and the subsequent act of the Supreme Court?

Mr. DOYLE. Senator, it is a long look ahead, and I do not feel qualified.

Senator ANDERSON. I am wondering if you improved your position and if you will improve your position by defeating this bill. You are quite obviously determined to defeat this resolution as well, and that means the impounding of money has to go on, and the taking of money and putting it away in a fund; whereas under the terms of this Texas and Louisiana could get some use out of it. What do you really hope to get by the defeat of this legislation?

Mr. DOYLE. Let me answer it this way: Suppose the master in chancery comes out as to my city and reaffirms the Government-proposed line, as a permanent line.

Senator ANDERSON. Then it will be too late for legislation, will it not?

Mr. DOYLE. Yes.

Senator ANDERSON. Do you think it will stop litigation?

Mr. DOYLE. It will not stop litigation. We will go on with litigation for years if the master in chancery comes out with that.

Senator ANDERSON. If somebody else is getting the money, litigation will not help you too much, will it? I mean from a practical standpoint?

Mr. DOYLE. No, if our private interests drill up against our Long Beach city limits and drain our oil pool, within our city limits.

Senator ANDERSON. You would concede under this resolution you have a chance for fair treatment; do you or not?

Mr. DOYLE. It depends on how it might be amended.

Senator ANDERSON. You do not believe, as it stands, there is a possibility of fair treatment?

Mr. DOYLE. My city attorney and the harbor board and the city council have objected to it; they have so informed me.

Senator ANDERSON. I understand they have objected to it. They objected to the resolution of August 1950. But you do not believe that under the terms of this, without amendment, there is a chance for the city of Long Beach to be fairly treated?

Mr. DOYLE. Not a fair chance; no. I would rather have it in writing to be reasonably sure.

Senator ANDERSON. Anybody would, but you are in the midst of a controversy; are you not? You are now tied up in court. Here is a way that says in the interim we can proceed and try to protect each other's interests. Do you think it better to stand back and say, "We don't want anything in the interim"?

Mr. DOYLE. I think we can get something better than this, Senator Anderson.

Senator ANDERSON. Through what?

Mr. DOYLE. We can get quitclaim legislation.

Senator ANDERSON. You tried to pass it in the Seventy-ninth, Eighty-first, and now in the Eighty-second. Do you honestly believe it will pass in the Eighty-second?

Mr. DOYLE. I believe it is worth trying in preference to having the uncertainty of this legislation.

Senator ANDERSON. There are bookmakers who have been down before the Kefauver crime committee who will give you odds.

Mr. DOYLE. I am not a good gambler, but I am willing to take a chance.

Submerged Lands, House Joint Resolution 131 and Senate Joint Resolution 20—Remarks No. 3

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE DOYLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, I herewith present more of my testimony before the Senate interim committee, presided over by the distinguished Senator from Wyoming, in connection with Senate Joint Resolution 20, on February 21, 1951. At other points in this CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for this day, I have also inserted testimony by myself and City Attorney Smith. These four extensions of remarks, Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4, by me, should be read together. The text follows:

SUBMERGED LANDS

Senator MILLIKIN. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. May I first, Senator MILLIKIN, say to Congressman DOYLE, who has made a very excellent presentation here, both last year and again today, that no authority is given by this resolution to the Secretary of the Interior to lease one single acre of submerged land to which the city of Long Beach lays claim without the consent of the city of Long Beach. We sought to make this as clear as printed language could make it.

In response to Senator ANDERSON, you said you would like to have it in writing. We have offered it to you in printing. The Secretary of the Interior cannot, under this bill, lease any lands which are beneath inland navigable waters without the consent of the city of Long Beach if there is a controversy about it.

Mr. DOYLE. Well, I will defer that to my able city attorney, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the intent, and I hope you will accept it as the statement of the sponsors of this legislation.

Mr. DOYLE. I will accept it on that basis.

Senator MILLIKIN. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator MILLIKIN.

Senator MILLIKIN. Would it be opening up a Pandora box of difficulties in other directions if this thing were made clear so far as this particular point is concerned?

The CHAIRMAN. No; there is nothing sacred about this language.

Senator MILLIKIN. Printed words on paper do not mean anything sacred, and these gentlemen say they are not satisfied, and if we could satisfy them without opening up everything else all along the line——

The CHAIRMAN. I know there is no possibility of that.

Senator MILLIKIN (continuing). Let's satisfy them.

The CHAIRMAN. If you had been in here when the hearing started, you would have heard the statement of the chairman. I am merely trying to allay fears which are expressed upon the basis of nothing contained in this bill. I am trying to make it clear that this so-called proposed line set forth in that photograph means nothing to the sponsors of this bill; and, so far as I know, there is no member of the committee who regards that as the seaward boundary of the inland navigable waters of Long Beach.

Senator MILLIKIN. Mr. Chairman, I simply repeat that if, without destroying the essential symmetry of what we are trying to do here, you can put some language in to allay the fears of these gentlemen, let's do it. That is what we are here for.

The CHAIRMAN. Why, of course. The Senator has worked with the chairman of this committee for many years, and he knows certainly that nobody is more willing to accept amendment than is the chairman.

Senator MILLIKIN. To that I heartily subscribe. I am not posing any point of resistance to the chairman at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Good.

Senator MILLIKIN. It is only because the chairman made it so clear that these gentlemen were not intended to be restricted by this composite line in this photograph that it occurred to me we could make it additionally clear with perhaps some happy language.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, Congressman DOYLE.

Mr. Matoon.

Senator MALONE. Are you through with this witness now?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Senator MALONE. Could I ask a couple of questions?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Senator MALONE. I am glad to see you here, Congressman.

Mr. DOYLE. Thank you.

Senator MALONE. What was the condition as far as the leasing and the rentals before the Supreme Court decision in relation to Long Beach?

Mr. DOYLE. Well, the city of Long Beach—and perhaps my city attorney, who will testify, can give you more of the technicalities of it—but the city of Long Beach does not lease its wells. It contracts its wells, which is quite different than most municipalities in most States. The royalties by reputation—and the city attorney can give you the exact figures.

Senator MALONE. I am not asking for the exact condition but just generally.

Mr. DOYLE. They are very high, probably the highest in the country by reputation. The harbor board of my city is under our charter rated as an independent, semi-independent municipal body, with power to lease any oil properties for the city, as a department of the city. In other words, our city council does not even have to approve the contract and the activity of the harbor board.

I am sure that is correct. If I am incorrect in any detail, I want the city attorney to correct me.

Senator MALONE. It does not matter much about the detail. Just give me the general picture.

Mr. DOYLE. The general picture is that under the charter the city harbor board, representing the city, has power to lease or contract and develop the wells, and it has adopted the policy of contracting the wells at the very handsome royalty figures. That was the condition, Senator MALONE, before the Supreme Court decision.

Senator MALONE. In other words, the oil was considered an asset of the city, primarily?

Mr. DOYLE. That is correct.

Senator MALONE. And in making contracts with the contractors you had worked out a system so that the royalties secured by the city were very high; is that true?

Mr. DOYLE. That is correct.

Senator MALONE. About how high did it run at the maximum or minimum? Just generally speaking, then we can get the details.

Mr. SMITH. Our net is more than 60 percent.

Senator MALONE. More than 60 percent. That is a little higher than it runs almost anywhere else.

Mr. DOYLE. That is correct.

Senator MALONE. Where did the Supreme Court decision as it is now leave you?

Mr. DOYLE. Well, as I understand it, we are going ahead. We are still operating on the same basis; but, on the advice of our able city attorney and action of the board of harbor commissioners, the royalties are being impounded. We have, I believe, approximately $100,000,000 in escrow at this time.

Senator MALONE. That is a good deal of money for any city; is it not? Now, Mr. Doyle, what happens under this bill? Could you just generally give me what happens now if this bill passes as it is now written?

Mr. DOYLE. Well, Senator, I would yield in favor of my city attorney who has come thoroughly prepared after studying it exhaustively to give briefly an answer to that question.

Senator MALONE. Well, Mr. Doyle, do not try to be accurate, and allow anything to stand corrected in detail; but, generally speaking, what is the picture?

Mr. DOYLE. All right. Of course, in the first place, it is very obvious that if this bill passes in its present form, it still will be necessary to have a permanent line fixed so far as the city of Long Beach is concerned. The present line leaves approximately 4 miles of our beach and 9,800 acres of our corporate water within our own municipality uncertain as to who will take jurisdiction—whether or not the Federal Government will or whether or not it will leave all or any portion of that in the corporate limits for control by the municipality. That, of course, is a continuing hazard in our judgment.

The other thing is this: That under our procedure in the State of California, unless the municipality has fee title to all the land within its corporate limits, it definitely limits the functioning of our municipality in all matters. We naturally cannot issue, for instance, a bond issue, I take it, that would be passed by bond attorneys unless we have fee title to all the land within our corporate limits.

Now, this resolution still gives to the Federal Government the paramount right, whatever that means, within a portion of our corporate limits unless the municipality and the Interior Department get together. I mean it leaves the Supreme Court decision right where it is so far as part of our corporate limits are concerned.

Senator MALONE. Now what would be the condition if the so-called quitclaim bill that has been proposed a couple of times—and we did pass it but could not muster enough votes to pass it over a veto—if that were passed, what position would you then be in?

Mr. DOYLE. Of course, that, I presume, if the quitclaim was adequate, would put the city of Long Beach within its corporate limits in its original position of undisputed ownership, domination, and control and paramount right, whatever that is, within our corporate limits for all purposes. It would permit, for instance, our harbor department and our city council to build out into this water area more docks and wharves.

Our harbor board has proposed, I am informed, as will show on this map, a harbor development contiguous to the Government's proposed line of approximately $65,000,000, and we have the money to do it, because our municipal treasury has the money.

So, a quitclaim would clarify the whole title subject so we could issue bonds; we could build substantial facilities any place within our corporate limits. Now we cannot, of course; we would not dare to.

Senator MALONE. In other words, if I get your explanation correctly, Mr. Doyle, it would put you back where you thought you were in the first place?

Mr. DOYLE. That is correct.

Senator MALONE. And you could continue your normal operations?

Mr. DOYLE. Yes.

Senator MALONE. This is in the field of conjecture, and one man's guess is as good as another's. But you are in a position now that I used to be when I came from Nevada. I had to kind of guess what the Congress was likely to do. What change do you think a quitclaim bill would have to pass after this bill has passed and is sort of on the way and taken for granted and deals are made under it? Do you think we are very likely to pass another bill?

Mr. DOYLE. Well, I do not know, assuming that this resolution did pass, whether the psychology of the members would be such as to realize it was only intended as an interim bill and there were major decisions that still had to be made or not.

I would say this, Senator Malone: If an interim bill passes without making dead sure that all of the corporate limits of the city of Long Beach were turned back to it for full domination and control, naturally we would have to oppose anything less than that.

Senator MALONE. You oppose this bill. But suppose it were passed. Let's just take it for granted it would pass for the moment for that purpose. Then what chance do you think we would have of later legislation restoring your original position?

Mr. DOYLE. I think it would reduce the chances of passage. I would assume, unless it was made very, very clear to all the Members that I am thinking of in the House of Representatives, that this interim did not take care of the total problem.

Senator MALONE. We have precedents here. We are still operating under interim or temporary legislation, temporary Executive powers, that were passed 10 years ago. I am a little bit disturbed about passing a bill called an interim bill. We still have the temporary buildings that were built for World War I down there, had them for World War II, and still have them for world war III. This interim thing gets me down sometimes.

Mr. DOYLE. You see, Senator, the thing that causes us to have great mental hazards is that ever since the appointment of the master in chancery, or the referee, on lines out in California, there has been virtually no action. I mean the referee has not yet made any report as to Long Beach, and so we are held up as an important municipality in everything that municipality should be free to do in its harbor or beach front. Even now I understand that he has passed out the information that it may be a considerable time yet before he is able to give a report as to Long Beach.

So, I would say, answering your question very frankly, that I would think that, unless the Members of the House, especially as I know some of them, had it very clear to their attention that this interim bill, if it passes, did not meet the total problem, psychologically it would limit the possibilities of passing a quitclaim.

Senator MALONE. Thank you very much for a frank statement. I remember you very well and your red-headed district attorney. I am looking forward to him taking the stand. Thank you.

Senator MILLIKIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask, if someone can answer it, what was the vote in the Senate and what was the vote in the House the last time we had a quitclaim vote?

The CHAIRMAN. I do not recall. We will check it and put that in the RECORD.

Mr. MATTOON. The voting in the House was 257 to 29, almost 10 to 1. The vote in the Senate was never reached on the floor for the reason that it was voted with a favorable recommendation out of the Senate Judiciary Committee just 2 days before the adjournment, when the convention in Philadelphia was held, at which convention there was a resolution favoring its adoption.

Senator MILLIKIN. There were two conventions there. [Laughter.]

Submerged Lands, House Joint Resolution 131 and Senate Joint Resolution 20—Remarks No. 4

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE DOYLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, as I said before, I am this day offering four extensions of remarks on this same important subject. Nos. 1 to 3 include my testimony before the Senate interim committee. No. 4 includes certain questions directed by committee members and certain answers to said questions by City Attorney Irving Smith, of Long Beach, Calif. These four extensions of remarks all relate to the same important subject and should all be read and studied in order for you to obtain a balanced picture of how very meritorious it is that all of the inland waters of Long Beach within the Federal breakwater lines be declared as inland waters in any legislation dealing with this important submerged or tidelands question.

The testimony follows:

STATEMENT OF IRVING M. SMITH, CITY ATTORNEY OF THE CITY OF LONG BEACH, CALIF.

The CHAIRMAN. You have no reason to apprehend that the State of California would attempt to exercise any authority that it does not now exercise with respect to the operation of lands that are clearly the property of the city of Long Beach?

Mr. SMITH. No.

The CHAIRMAN. You have none?

Mr. SMITH. We have no difficulty.

The CHAIRMAN. With respect to wells which are landward of the line on this map, which you have presented to the committee, is there anything in this bill which takes away from the city of Long Beach the right to operate as it has been operating the lands landward or the areas landward of this so-called Government-proposed line?

Mr. SMITH. Not as I read the bill. I believe not.

The CHAIRMAN. That accords with my own belief. So then it is your testimony to this committee that if this bill were enacted into law the city of Long Beach would have all of the rights that it now possesses and exercises with respect to every well which has thus far been drilled for or on behalf of the city of Long Beach?

Mr. SMITH. That is right. That is my understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. So the only question, then, is with respect to possible wells on the seaward line, first of the so-called Government-proposed line, and then, secondly, on the seaward line, seaward of the exterior boundary of the city of Long Beach.

Mr. SMITH. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the city of Long Beach assert any claim whatsoever to any area beyond the exterior seaward boundaries of the city of Long Beach?

Mr. SMITH. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Then it is your testimony to this committee that, so far as the city of Long Beach is concerned, it will be perfectly content to have its title confirmed first to all lands landward, all areas landward of the Government-proposed line, and, secondly, all areas landward of the exterior seaward limits of the city of Long Beach.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; that will completely protect the city, as far as the city's direct interest in this issue is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the city of Long Beach set up any claim to the pot of gold that is seaward of this area?

Mr. SMITH. The city of Long Beach has no interest other than the general interest as a city of the State and as citizens of the State, of course, but aside from that the city has no interest other than that in this 13,000 acres that the State conveyed to us within our corporate limits, as shown upon this map. Of course, we have no claim to any deposits or anything else outside those boundaries.

The CHAIRMAN. I am very glad to have that testimony; I think it is explicit, it is direct, it is clear, and nobody can have the slightest doubt of what the position of the city of Long Beach is.

I will say again, so that it may be clear in the record, that my own opinion is from the examination of the photograph which was presented to this committee last year and from the examination of this map that the so-called Government-proposed line is too narrow in the sense that it is too far landward.

In my judgment, it does not accurately define the exterior boundaries of the inland navigable waters of this bay. In my judgment, the line should be very much farther seaward, and unless there is information of which I am not aware, which has not yet been presented to me, I am ready to say now that so far as I am concerned, it seems to me to be clear that the boundary of the inland navigable waters must of necessity under all of the facts of the case include all of the area within the city limits of the city of Long Beach.

Mr. SMITH. Senator, you make us very happy.

The CHAIRMAN. If you will convey that information to those who represent the State of California, perhaps you can make us all happy and perhaps we can get a settlement of this controversy.

Mr. SMITH. We wish that that could be put into law. We appreciate your statement, Senator. We would like to have it put into something of finality that we can act upon.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that the committee will be very glad to consider the adoption of appropriate language to do precisely that thing. So that there may be no doubt now of the accuracy of the testimony which was given here at the outset on behalf of the Government by the Solicitor General and the Solicitor for the Department of the Interior, I want to read from the stipulation which was filed in the California case in the Supreme Court, which was signed by and on behalf of the Government by the then Attorney General Tom C. Clark, and by J. A. Krug, Secretary of the Interior, and by and on behalf of the State of California by the then attorney general, Fred N. Howser.

This stipulation says, appearing on page 21 of the Hearings on Submerged Lands, held by this committee under Senate Joint Resolution 195, during the month of August, last—and I read from the stipulation:

"Whereas the precise location of the '3-mile marginal belt' has not yet been determined, and it is the belief of the parties that further proceedings may be necessary in order to determine the line of demarcation between the '3-mile marginal belt,' and the tidelands and the inland waters of California (including ports, bays, and harbors) not claimed by plaintiff in this case; and

"Whereas the court has not yet entered a decree in the above-entitled case; and

"Whereas the immediate situation can be clarified and further conduct of this litigation expedited if a number of inland waters can be specifically excluded from the claims of the plaintiff in this suit;

"Now, therefore, it is stipulated and agreed by the parties through their respective counsel as follows:

"1. The following areas are not claimed by the plaintiff in this litigation:

"(a) That part of San Francisco Bay landward of a line drawn from Point Diablo, Marin County, Calif., to Fort Point, city and county of San Francisco, Calif.

(b) That part of San Diego Bay landward of a line drawn from Point Loma to Zuniga Point, on the southwestern end of North Island, San Diego County, Calif."

This next affects the city of Long Beach:

"(c) That part of San Pedro Bay landward of a line drawn from Point Fermin in a northeasterly direction through a point 300 feet due south of the southeasterly extension of the Navy mole and breakwater to the line of ordinary low tide in the city of Long Beach, Los Angeles County, Calif.

"2. It is understood that the lines described in this stipulation are approximate only and do not represent surveyed lines.

"3. The foregoing descriptions of San Francisco, San Pedro, and San Diego Bays are without prejudice to the right of California to claim that the lines separating said bays from the '3-mile marginal belt' lie farther seaward than the lines herein described and that said bays include larger water areas than herein described.

"4. It is further stipulated that this stipulation is without prejudice to the rights of either party to claim that any other waters within the State boundaries of California constitute bays, ports, harbors, or inland water or marginal sea, as the case may be."

Mr. Smith, do you agree with my interpretation of that stipulation, that by it the Government of the United States bound itself not to claim any of these wells on the landward side of that line?

Mr. SMITH. I believe that is the effect of this; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And that it also confirmed to the State of California the right to claim any areas on the seaward side of that line?

Mr. SMITH. That was reserved to the State.

The CHAIRMAN. That was reserved. So that the position of the Government of the United States in this California case was clearly intended to confirm to the city of Long Beach every well that has been drilled by or on behalf of that and to confirm to the State of California the right to claim that the boundary of the inland navigable waters was much further seaward than this so-called Government-proposed line?

Mr. SMITH. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Then it was not a Government-proposed line, was it?

Mr. SMITH. Well, I pointed out, Mr. Chairman, in my statement that the line drawn here deviates a small bit at one end from the stipulated line you read, since that was not a surveyed line. This line is the line proposed by the Department of Justice in proceedings before the master.

The stipulated line is an unsurveyed line, as stated in the stipulation, whereas the Government-proposed line is a surveyed line which ran 800 yards due east of the Point Fermin lighthouse instead of the Point Fermin lighthouse, as was the case with the stipulated line, through the same axis of 300 feet due south of the southeasterly extension of the Navy mole and breakwater to the low-tide mark in the city of Long Beach, there being that variation turning on that axis by reason of the beginning point change.

This brings us in closer inshore at Long Beach at Gaviota Avenue instead of the line shown in the stipulated line, and that is why I requested our engineers to put on this map the proposed line instead of the stipulated line, because that would not have been so correct.

The CHAIRMAN. By the use of the phrase "proposed line," you meant to indicate the line which has been presented to the master?

Mr. SMITH. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. I have no hesitation in saying that for my part again that line, whether presented to the master or whether the line described in this stipulation, is altogether too close to the beach of Long Beach, and because it almost cuts the beach line of the city of Long Beach in two, it seems to me to be obviously unfair to the city of Long Beach. Does that make you any happier?

Mr. SMITH. Well, if that could be put into something, Senator—we appreciate your remarks—if it could be finally wrapped up into something that we could act upon; yes. I would merely like to say this in conclusion.

Senator MILLIKIN. May I ask whether San Diego has submitted any proposed amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. San Diego?

Senator MILLIKIN. Long Beach.

The CHAIRMAN. No; they have not.

Senator MILLIKIN. Why don't you give us something you think should be put in the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. There has been some discussion, Senator, of amendments which would attempt to confirm the line set out in the stipulation.

Senator MILLIKIN. I heard the chairman make some suggestions, but it occurred to me that we could crystallize the whole thing from the standpoint of Long Beach if they will offer something they think will do the job.

The CHAIRMAN. I think the bill should be clearly amended so as to obviate any confusion that might exist. The bill was drawn for the purpose of protecting the city of Long Beach and any other city that might be engaged in controversy over the actual line of boundary of a bay or inland navigable waters. There is no doubt in the mind of the chairman—and it has been expressed to him over and over again on behalf of the Government—that the Government does not and will not claim inland waters anyway, and certainly will not claim inland waters in any bay. The problem is to define the boundary, the seaward boundary of those bays. This committee has not had an opportunity to do that.

Senator MILLIKIN. I may ask whether the Solicitor General or his representative is here this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. I don't believe that a representative is. If there is a representative of the Solicitor General here, will he rise?

Senator MILLIKIN. I would like to ask: Is there any objection to the theory expressed by the chairman of this committee of amending this thing so as to make it clear that the city of Long Beach continues its past jurisdiction over its own areas?

Mr. VAUGHAN (Robert H. Vaughan, Department of Justice). Senator, I am not sure that I can speak for the Solicitor General as to the entirety of the proposal here. The chairman correctly stated the position of the executive branch as set forth by us before the court. We do not claim inland waters. There is before the court the problem of defining what is the seaward limit of those inland waters right in this area.

Senator MILLIKIN. But is there a problem of defining the limits of the city of Long Beach?

Mr. VAUGHAN. The problem of defining the limits of the city of Long Beach is not before the court; but when the court draws the line separating the inland waters of San Pedro Bay from the open waters of the Pacific Ocean, that may or may not affect the limits of the city of Long Beach.

Senator MILLIKIN. Would there be an objection from the Solicitor General if this committee were to make amendments to the pending bill to clarify the situation of Long Beach along the lines suggested by the distinguished chairman? Would there be any objection to that?

The CHAIRMAN. Senator MILLIKIN, perhaps Mr. Vaughan is not authorized to testify with respect to that.

Senator MILLIKIN. I don't want you to exceed your authority.

The CHAIRMAN. Without consulting the Solicitor General.

Senator MILLIKIN. We can make inquiry of the Solicitor General. I do think the observation is in order—and I say this most respectfully—that the Government made other claims and has taken other positions which in the course of time it has reversed in this very subject matter with which we are dealing.

I have complete sympathy, therefore, with the position of these gentlemen from Long Beach and with the chairman's position that the rights of Long Beach, if we can do so, should be set out explicitly to protect against a possible further change of direction by the Federal Government.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course. The fact that the chairman and the Senator from New Mexico joined in presenting this bill is in itself testimony of the desire of the two sponsors of this bill to do precisely that thing. What I have been endeavoring to do this morning has been to clear away a fog of confusion which has been raised about the effect of the legislation as it now stands.

Senator MILLIKIN. I think the distinguished chairman has given what should be some very heartening statements to the city of Long Beach, and I gathered from what the Senator said he would have no objection if appropriate language can be found to make that explicit in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. I am searching for appropriate language; yes, indeed.

A Letter Answering Farmer's Requests for Information

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. M. G. BURNSIDE

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following letter:

DEAR FRIEND: I know that you're working hard on the farm these days, and we're working hard in Washington, too.

I wish I had the time to tell you everything that's going on here and discuss all the problems we're facing every day. But I've been so busy I haven't been able to write to you for over a month. From now on I'll try to let you know every 2 weeks or so about the things happening here that affect you.

If you've checked into buying a car lately, or had a friend do so, you've probably found out that the fifth tire—the all-important spare—wasn't included in the deal. The reason for this is the rubber shortage, since most of the raw rubber lately has been channeled into war production.

Last week, however, the National Production Authority, one of the new defense agencies here in the Government, and a busy one, too, I might add, cut by 10 percent the amount of rubber available for passenger car tires. But at the same time, the amount for truck, trailer and farm equipment tires was increased by 10 percent.

So you won't have to worry about getting a new tire for that tractor or truck or other farm vehicle. NPA announced too that we will continue to have 100-percent production of trucks.

You know, the wheels are really turning at the synthetic rubber plant at Institute. If we can get them going all over the country like the plant in West Virginia we can have a fifth tire even on passenger cars.

The Labor Department here has issued a new list of "critical occupations." These are the jobs your local draft board is advised to consider eligible for deferment. The new list includes farm operators.

Did you know, too, how much the value of your farm has probably gone up in the past year? An Agriculture Department report that just came into my office says that farms in West Virginia went up 11.5 percent in value between March 1950 and March 1951. A survey of real estate reporters showed that a third of them expect the prices to keep climbing, while only 5 percent expect them to go down.

The Suppression of the Wedemeyer Report

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH B. KEATING

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, military security, of course, frequently requires that the public be denied access to the contents of official reports. The political security of a party in power or, more accurately, of the inner clique in control of a party in power, should never be made the excuse for suppressing a document prepared with great care by an able and distinguished expert in his field and submitted in sincerity and good faith to his superiors.

If heed had been paid to the recommendations of General Wedemeyer, it now appears almost certain that the Korean conflict would have been avoided without surrender of any of our basic principles, but with a saving of thousands of lives and untold suffering and sacrifice.

Like so many of the other horrible mistakes of the past, we can constructively use them now only as object lessons for the future to prevent a repetition of blunders and to force a more thorough study by those in authority of proposals advanced by experienced and qualified experts who are completely without political or partisan motive and are actuated only by a genuine desire to see that the country they love steers a sensible course in the conduct of its military and foreign policies.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include a penetrating editorial on the suppression of the Wedemeyer report from the Rochester (N. Y.) Democrat and Chronicle.

The editorial follows:

THE WEDEMEYER REPORT, UNHAPPY SUPPRESSION

Gen. Albert C. Wedemeyer told his Government in 1947 exactly what would happen in China and Korea if we withdrew troops from those areas. The report was suppressed, its recommendations overridden by diplomatic decisions. We wrote off China to the Reds, we got ourselves involved in a seemingly endless war in Korea. Had we continued occupation of southern Korea, the Reds in the north probably would not have attacked.

Even now only a portion of the Wedemeyer report's content is revealed. To us the incident throws light on two issues—secrecy in Government, the fallibility of diplomacy.

Above all it raises this question: Having flouted Wedemeyer's prophetic report, will the Government be safe in flouting the recommendations of General MacArthur for prosecuting the war in the Orient? The State Department is shown to have erred sadly in its judgments as to China and Korea. It could be just as far off base in its toying with current crises.

Had Wedemeyer's advice been followed, the Russians would have known from the start that they would have had to fight Americans if they violated the thirty-eighth parallel. We would have been spared many casualties and would not now be waging a war of indecision.

In Europe we have a similar situation. Russia proposes that all foreign troops leave Germany. To us that would mean taking the troops home. To Russia it would mean piling forces up on a nearby border, ready for an attack as soon as the way was clear. Fortunately, we have shown no sign as yet of acceding to Russia's scheme. But the Wedemeyer incident certainly points to our need of building up strength and so placing that strength that Russia will have no doubt as to whom she will have to fight if she breaks over the line.

As to secrecy in Government, haven't we had enough? It is quite clear that much of the smoke-screening is set up to protect individuals and the administration rather than the Nation as a whole. We see no reason for the early suppression of the Wedemeyer report. Our security was not threatened by it. But our security certainly is threatened right now because the report was not accepted at face value. Had the public known what the general recommended, it might have forced the administration into more forthright action.

Lives, property, and freedom are the stakes today. It is not pleasant to think of them as being tossed around in a giant poker game in a locked and heavily curtained room. Obviously some items in the Wedemeyer report might require secrecy—items such as quantity and disposition of soldiery. But those are technicalities. With or without them, this report if opened for the world to read, might have served to keep the peace.

Increase of Pay of Postal Employees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRAZIER REAMS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. REAMS. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include there in a resolution adopted by the council of the city of Toledo memorializing the Congress to initiate and support legislation giving to employees of the Post Office Department a cost-of-living increase in their pay. I am in agreement with this resolution which is as follows:

Whereas one of the most efficient departments of the Federal Government has always been the United States Post Office; and

Whereas the loyal and industrious employees of this Department have not the usual means for the enforcement of demands for higher wages; and

Whereas it is universally recognized that the cost of living has increased tremendously: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Council of the City of Toledo, That it is the sense of the Council of the City of Toledo that post-office employees are entitled to a cost of living increase and that the Honorable ROBERT TAFT, the Honorable JOHN W. BRICKER, the Honorable FRAZIER REAMS, and the Honorable GEORGE BENDER should be and they are hereby respectfully urged to initiate and support legislation in the Congress of the United States to grant post-office employees a cost-of-living increase in their pay.

Adopted: April 30, 1951.

OLLIE CZELUSTA,
Mayor.

CARL F. DIEFENBACH,
Clerk of Council.

Congressman Doyle Urges Constituents To Communicate Opinions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE DOYLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 5, 1951

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, since my extension of remarks dated March 7, 1951, beginning on page 1319 of the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I have received a number of communications to the effect that the information therein set forth, and the manner in which it was related, is considered of real value. Also some Members of this great legislative body have thanked me for reducing the important subject matter to that compact and convenient form.

Mr. Speaker, the development in our domestic and international situation ever since March 7, 1951, together with the importance that constituents know to whom to write and where their communication should be addressed, has made me conclude that I should emphasize my objective by sending out a goodly number of my extension of remarks of March 7, 1951, to constituents. I believe we in Congress, should always emphasize to the attention of the thousands of Americans whom we have the honor and responsibility of representing, the fact that their considered opinions are not only important, but that we seek such considered opinions, and the facts supporting them. I think we ought to emphasize the fact that considered, clear, analysis and clear thinking of folks at the local level of American citizenship, is very important and is an integral and powerful part of the functioning of our democratic processes through our representative form of government.

It is often said, that most Members of Congress do not personally read their daily mail, but I know so many Members who do take the time and patience to personally read their mail, that I am sure that the impression that letters written to Congressmen are ineffectual or unnoticed is not really a fact. For myself, Mr. Speaker, these more than 5 years that I have now been Representative from the Eighteenth District of California, I have habitually read the first-class mail and letters which have come to my office. Nor do they have to be addressed "personal" or "private" in order to have my personal reading. I have found my personal reading of all these letters a great source of contact with the thinking and problems of the citizens at home. We should encourage the folks to think things through—clear through. We should encourage them to transmit the benefit of their patriotic thinking to us, as their Representatives.

Unequal Cost Cutting

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH B. KEATING
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, despite the excellent work which the House did last week in reducing many of the items in the independent offices appropriation bill, it is submitted that even more drastic action must be taken, if we are to meet the challenge of maintaining a sound economy in the face of unprecedented expenditures for military purposes. One approach to this problem is suggested by the bill, which 10 of my Republican colleagues have joined me in introducing, to reestablish the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial from the Rochester (N. Y.) Times-Union urging action on this proposal.

The editorial follows:

UNEQUAL COST CUTTING

Funds for 27 Federal agencies covered by one appropriations bill were cut 10 percent by the House Appropriations Committee.

This is a saving—on paper—of $665,000,000.

Much as we applaud the saving, we can neither defend the percentage method of reducing Federal spending nor see in it more than a bird-shot attack on the swollen budget.

A flat percentage cut in agencies penalizes the most thrifty to the same extent as the most wasteful. By cutting the fat off one, it may starve those on a lean diet. Continued year after year, the net effect would be that budget requests would not be honest estimates of true cost, but cost plus the percentage the bureau chief guesses will be cut off.

Further, cutting Federal spending on the scale necessary to get us safely through the present emergency requires more than paring here and there. It requires lopping off of whole agencies and abandonment by the Federal Government of many wasteful functions.

The problem is to decide which ones. Representative KENNETH KEATING's bill offers the most hopeful means of deciding. He proposes that the Hoover Commission be recalled to list nonessential functions and agencies. This is the right means of significant and real Federal economy.

What Is Appeasement?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES B. DEANE
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. DEANE. Mr. Speaker, the word "appeasement" is being used rather carelessly these days. Those who are interested in trying to avoid another devastating war run the risk of being called appeasers or isolationists. It is reassuring to those in Congress who have supported a program to strengthen forces not only for peace but also for preparedness to read the following editorial from the Charlotte News, an outstanding newspaper, under date of May 5, 1951, which, under unanimous consent, I include as a part of my remarks:

THE CHARGE OF APPEASEMENT

The word "appeasement" has been bandied about so loosely that it now means just about what the user chooses it to mean. As The New York Times sagely observes:

"If we do not immediately bomb troop concentration points in Manchuria, it is appeasement. If we do not immediately set up a blockade of Chinese ports (and presumably fire on British and Russian ships attempting to enter those ports), it is appeasement. If we do not provide air cover for an (probably preventive) invasion of continental China by Nationalist Chinese troops, it is appeasement."

In its strict sense, the verb appease means to reduce to a state of peace, to pacify, to make quiet or calm. Since Munich it has taken on a much less pleasant connotation. It has come to mean the abject surrender to an aggressor's demands, thus increasing the probability of new and bigger demands.

Now the appeasement label is being hurled against the administration that bolstered the military power of a Soviet-threatened Turkey; that aided Greece to fight off the Communist guerrillas; that stood up to Russia with the Berlin blockade; that used the Marshall plan to save Italy and France from Communist election victory and to restore Western Europe's productive capacity; that initiated and brought to fruit the Atlantic Pact; that appointed General Eisenhower to head the European army and gave him air, naval, and ground troops; that has just negotiated for long-term bases in Greenland; that met the challenge of the North Korean invasion with all the limited forces this Nation then had at its demand; that put through a plan to enable the United Nations General Assembly to act when the Security Council was blocked by the Soviet veto; that isolated Formosa and kept it cut of Communist hands; that poured materials and military advisers into Indochina when that nation was threatened; that launched a tremendous preparedness program in this Nation; that has tried to send grain to India to prevent those starving millions from turning to Moscow for aid in their hour of grave need.

Paradoxically, the label—uttered with scorn and derision as an epithet—is being used most blatantly by those in the Congress who have fought, at almost every step, the administration's program for meeting the world-wide challenge of communism—who opposed the Marshall plan, the Atlantic Pact, who fought against troops for Europe, who called the Korean decision "Truman's war" (until General MacArthur pronounced it a sound military decision).

The Truman administration may be guilty of many sins and many errors. It has not, in the past 5 years, been guilty of appeasement, and no volume of vituperation by the Johnny-come-latelies of the United States Congress can make that charge stick.

Notable Anniversaries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DONALD L. O'TOOLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Speaker, the month of May by tradition and observance is the outstanding month of the year for labor. With this in mind, I am inserting in the RECORD an editorial from the Brooklyn Tablet. The editorial explains itself and serves to bring to mind the valiant and splendid efforts of the Catholic Church to bring social justice to the workingman. It follows:

NOTABLE ANNIVERSARIES

May 15 will be the sixtieth anniversary of Pope Leo XIII's famous encyclical on the condition of the workingmen and the twentieth anniversary of the encyclical of Pope Pius XI, Forty Years After, which supplemented and reviewed the teaching of Pope Leo XIII. A public forum, over which Archbishop Molloy will preside, will be held in our diocese on May 6, to commemorate these anniversaries. The speakers for this occasion will be Rev. R. A. McGowan, director of the social action department, NCWC, and Hon. Maurice Tobin, United States Secretary of Labor. In many dioceses throughout the country similar observances will be held.

Properly attention should be given in a significant public manner to the commemoration of two of the most notable historic documents which have influenced modern thinking in the direction of the betterment of the lot of the working classes. Communists, liberals, Socialists, and left-wingers have for so long held themselves up as the champions of the working people that the profound and lasting influence of these papal pronouncements has been ignored and neglected. The truth that the Popes have been far in advance of their times in the championship of the rights of the workingman and the parallel truth that the Popes have laid the ground work for the advances made by the laboring masses in recent years should be proclaimed from the housetops.

No document, secular or religious, in modern times, can match the concentration of thought, the sweep of vision, the vigor of expression and the clarity of enunciation of basic sociological principles contained in the encyclical of Pope Leo XIII. The later encyclical of Pope Pius XI is a brilliant confirmation of the doctrines of Leo XIII and a perfect development and complement of the Aerum Novarum.

With rare foresight and courage, Pope Leo XIII and his successor, Pope Pius XI, fearlessly opposed the ideas and the practices of the new liberalism which dominated the thinking in the industrial field before the turn of the century and down to the present time. The changeless principles of Christian morality were adapted, explained and applied by Pope Leo XIII and Pope Pius XI to the new conditions which the industrial development and expansion of modern times produced. Through these documents Catholic social teaching has become a very important part of the heritage of the entire human race.

Under the inspiration of these documents, priests, teachers, and laymen, both employers and employees, have been inspired to take an active part in the restoration of the social order. For all the growth of materialism, the spiritual idealism of these encyclicals has not diminished. Actually the turbulence of our times has only served the more strikingly to emphasize the bankruptcy of materialistic solution of social problems and to enhance the value of Christian social principles in practice.

Today the slave labor of Soviet Russia and her satellites, the decline in the general standard of living in the Communist and Communist-dominated countries, the general deplorable lot of the working masses under Communist rule is the best proof of the utter incapacity of materialism to solve basic social problems. On the other hand, wherever, to any degree under the inspiration of the principles enunciated by Pope Leo and Pope Pius, Christian social teaching has been put into practice, the condition of the masses has been bettered immeasurably.

The celebration of these twin anniversaries should be the signal for renewed effort on the part of all Christians in the industrial field to put into practice the teachings of these two major encyclicals. Only through Christian social justice as proclaimed by Pope Leo and Pope Pius is there hope for industrial peace, harmony, and prosperity. Only in Christian social justice is there real hope for the working masses and for the solution of the vexatious problems which keep our present world in constant turmoil.

Resolution of the Goodfellow Sunday School Class of the First Baptist Church, San Angelo, Tex.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. O. C. FISHER
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 14, 1951

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a resolution which is both timely and significant. If a sufficient number of the people would but follow the example of the sponsors of this resolution, there would indeed be peace on earth and good will among men. The resolution with its preamble follows:

Realizing that God holds in his hands the destiny of men and nations, and believing that God's message to his people of old, when he said, "If my people which are called by My name, shall humble themselves and pray, and seek My face, and turn from their wicked ways, then will I hear from Heaven and will forgive their sin and will heal their land," can be relied upon today as an inviolate promise just as when it was given to the Hebrew people: Therefore be it

Resolved, as follows:

1. We, the members of the Goodfellow Class, pledge anew our faith in God and our allegiance to His cause.

2. We pledge ourselves, each individually, to pray each remaining day of this year, 1951, for a revival of a deep Christian spirit in our church and in all Christian churches of the United States.

3. Believing that if our Nation and the world are to be spared the terrors of a destructive world war, it must be by God's intervention, we pledge ourselves, and call upon all Christians to join us in praying each remaining day of this year, for our political leaders that they may be guided by God's spirit to do the things that would lessen and not increase the terrible confusion now existing in international affairs, and in praying for all Christians in all countries dominated by atheistic communism, and for the non-Christian citizens of those countries, to the end that there may be a great Christian awakening in those countries and around the world, so that men of all nations can live together on this earth as friends without war or threat of war.

Alaska's Scenic Grandeurs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. L. BARTLETT
DELEGATE FROM ALASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, attention is called to the fact that that season of year most popular for viewing Alaska's scenic grandeurs is at hand. By steamship, by airplane, and by automobile, Americans will again turn northwest this year to have their first, second, or third looks at our great northern Territory. For Alaska has so much to offer that many find one trip all too short. The fact that Alaska is a defense outpost will not cause anyone to defer a vacation journey. This is the subject of an editorial which appeared in the Alaska Weekly for April 20 and which is reprinted here:

SAFEST AND MORE INVITING

Nothing said in this editorial should be construed as antagonistic to the development of adequate civilian defense measures in Alaska nor as belittling Alaska from the standpoint of an extremely valuable defense outpost. Civilian defense organization and training are as important to Alaska communities as they are to any and all communities of the United States * * * no more so, and no less. And, we might add that even after reading the excellent article recently appearing in Colliers over the signature of Father Hubbard in which the "Glacier Priest" characterized the idea that Russia might attack Alaska as stupid we continue to believe that adequate defense of Alaska is vital to national security.

But what we do not believe is that there is any possibility of Russian attack on Alaska in the immediate, nor even in the foreseeable, future. Russia is far from ready to start a war of aggression by invasion of United States territory. No authority on the subject, military or diplomatic, has voiced the slightest apprehension of such action on the part of the Soviet, in the near future.

She is very busy in the Far East and with the withdrawal of General MacArthur will be still more busy. She has some uneasy satellite nations on her hands in Eastern Europe, Tito is making things uncomfortable for her and daily causing her to lose face in that quarter, her eyes are on the rich oil fields of Iran, and if the master minds of the Kremlin should feel strong enough to start an all-out war with the United States by a surprise invasion their precious bombs would not be wasted on Nome or Anchorage but on the industrial centers of the Atlantic seaboard.

All of which is inspired by the fact that we do not subscribe to the scareheads and the thoughtless chatter which could, and will, if not checked, rob Alaska of the annual tourist traffic so vital to the economy of the Territory.

There won't be any black-out in Alaska this summer and there won't be any atomic bombs dropped on Alaska cities nor any submarines in the gorgeous waterways, nor any Russian sharpshooters on the forest-clad mountainsides that skirt those waterways. The thousands of lakes and fishing streams which make Alaska a sportsman's paradise will not be Red-infested because there are very few, indeed, of the home-grown variety.

No Territory under the American flag offers more to attract the tourist and no Territory under the flag is safer for that vacation trip you are thinking about for this summer.

As we indicated at the outset of this editorial common sense dictates the organizing of civilian defense and the further strengthening of the Armed Forces. The people of the Territory are taking care of the one and the military of the other, and no one we have heard of in Alaska, either in civilian or military circles, is at all panicky.

We therefore suggest that there be considerably less war-scare ballyhoo and a great deal more constructive effort to convince the traveling public that Alaska is still the most inviting summer playground in the land and as safe, if not a bit more safer, than Atlantic City or Miami Beach.

General MacArthur's Appearance Before Senate Committees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Good Beginning," which appeared this morning in the Washington Post, which commends the conduct of the hearings before the joint meeting of the Senate Armed Services Committee and the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. I call particular attention to and join in the deserved tribute paid to the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], who is presiding at the hearings.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GOOD BEGINNING

At the end of the third grueling day of hearing testimony from General MacArthur, Senator RUSSELL complimented the general and every Member of the committee on the fact that these exhausting interrogations have been conducted in complete courtesy and in the highest dignity. The sessions were long. The atmosphere of the hearing room was intense. Issues of the most vital concern to the Nation were combed over—issues that have become deeply entangled in politics. Yet both questions and answers have been kept on a plane of temperate pursuit of facts and opinions. And we have Senator KNOWLAND'S word that very little of what was said behind closed doors was censored from the record released to the public.

While Senator RUSSELL generously praises General MacArthur and members of the committee for this performance, a large share of the credit should obviously be laid at his door. As chairman, he has presided with tact, dignity, and restraint that were a good example to his fellow committee members. It now remains to be seen whether he and his fellow committeemen can keep the remainder of the hearings—in which controversial figures in the Government service will appear—on the same high plane.

Mexican Labor in the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MATTHEW M. NEELY

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, on behalf of the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], who is absent on official business, that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "What About Slave Labor in United States?" published in the United Mine Workers Journal on April 1, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT ABOUT SLAVE LABOR IN UNITED STATES?

Some of our Senators and Congressmen, as well as alleged social leaders, go into raptures every now and then about slave labor in Russia and other geographical areas of the world—some of which are controlled by our allies.

Occasionally the staleness and sameness of the news reported by our metropolitan newspapers prompts an editor to rediscover slave labor on our home front.

A three-column story by Gladwin Hill in the March 25 issue of the New York Times rehashes the illegal entry of Mexicans across our southwestern State borders for employment in agriculture and other hard-labor-tasks. Hill estimates the annual trek at 1,500,000, with an undetermined number of "Commies" included.

While the story is a rehash of factual information of long standing—known to our Government agencies for 30 years or more—it, nevertheless, pictures anew the seemingly deliberate blinking at the slave trade by our State and Federal Governments to serve large agricultural interests which have, in turn, been faithful contributors and supporters to the political forces which blink the illegal entries.

It is nothing new for a columnist to point out that this slave Mexican labor "depresses the general standards of wages and working conditions below the accepted American levels. Instead of supplementing the domestic labor force they undercut it, taking jobs from tens of thousands of native citizens, farm and urban workers alike."

The recruited Mexican slave labor, working long hours and living in hovels, is contracted to big employers in sizable numbers—the contractor receiving from one-fourth to one-half of the measly contracted wage.

Conservative estimates place the minimum at 2,500,000 Mexicans in partial or full slave-labor status in Texas, Arizona, New Mexico, and California, and as many more to be furnished as desired.

It is for the exploiters of this slave-labor horde that southwestern Congressmen and Senators fight all price fixing and controls which would result in a reasonable price for raw cotton.

Yet, year after year, at planting and harvesting time, the Departments of Agriculture—State and Federal—heed the pleas of the slave-labor employers to permit more and more alleged limited migration, which the agricultural interests insist is necessary to crop growing and harvesting, and which, in turn, multiplies the illegal immigrants who become permanents.

We have had all kinds of investigations during the last 25 years to ferret out the guilty ones in this illegal traffic, but nothing ever seems to really be done about it.

The Rockefeller interests utilized about 15,000 Mexican laborers in the southern Colorado coal fields from 1912 to the successful unionization of Colorado coal mines.

Other mining interests employed slave-labor Mexicans in New Mexico and Arizona.

During the Colorado coal strike of 1913–14 UMWA officials discovered that 50 percent of the heads of Mexican families involved had made illegal entry into the United States—all planned and supervised by labor agents of mining companies.

Nearly all of the big-shot industrialists and economic writers are harping on slave labor around the world—and, at last, the UN has agreed to take up the study.

We doubt it, but if there is any basis of fact in the belief that the UN is capable of bringing about an end to slave labor, we suggest that our United States bureaucrats—who seem to have such unlimited faith in the UN—insist upon our Mexican slave-labor problem being added to the agenda.

Letter to a Constituent

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

MAY 15, 1951.

DEAR FRIEND: While we strive for victory in Korea, we must also make ourselves strong on the home front.

Will you therefore join me in the battle against the high cost of living and against the enemies of the people?

Let me know whenever you wish to express your views and opinions.

I pledge to you my strength to help the folks back home, your boys in service, our veterans and older people.

Don't be afraid of the Commies. Write me any time I can do you a favor.

With kindest regards, I remain

Replacement of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM BENTON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Basic Issues Obscured," written by Hanson W. Baldwin and published in the New York Times of Monday, May 7, 1951.

Mr. Baldwin points out, now that we have had a second look at General MacArthur's position on our far eastern policy, that "the man must be separated from the issues, and emotion from logic," factors which in many instances obscured the heart of the debate. Mr. Baldwin indicates that General MacArthur recognizes that the problem is global, but so far has declined to assume any responsibility for its global aspects. Instead, he concentrates solely on our position in Korea and the Far East.

I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix an editorial entitled "The Basic Disagreements," published in the New York Times of May 5, 1951, and an editorial entitled "Who Is the Enemy?" published in the Washington Post of May 7, 1951, which bear on the same basic problem.

There being no objection, the article and editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of May 7, 1951]

BASIC ISSUES OBSCURED—SWEEPING STATEMENTS BY MACARTHUR KEPT SENATORS FROM RESOLVING POLICY DISPUTE

(By Hanson W. Baldwin)

General of the Army Douglas MacArthur's testimony before Congress last week produced few facts that were not already known, and again tended—largely because of the general's own statements—to confuse the man and the issues and to obscure logic by emotion.

This was, perhaps, inevitable—given the manner of man that General MacArthur is. Accustomed to sweeping generalities and exalted phrases, he rarely speaks in precise terms or in exact definitions; he issues edicts.

Moreover, although some of the questioning was fairly searching, the basic issue of whether or not General MacArthur's prescription for victory in Korea would tend to bring about that victory and would promote the security and welfare of the United States was not by any means resolved.

In part this was true because of General MacArthur's own personality; a man of unlimited ambition and unlimited ego, he brushed aside some questions of major import to concentrate only upon the one aspect that interested him, and that he knew would have the most emotional appeal to the country.

Again and again throughout his testimony he reiterated, with all the skill that William Jennings Bryan once used in his famous cross-of-gold speech, that it is "not only the dust that is settling in Korea; it is American blood." The blood of American boys was the general's final argument, and even the hostile questioners knew it was a potent one.

AN EMOTIONAL ARGUMENT

Yet the weakness of this argument was that it was emotional; no American wants the bloodshed to continue. Yet nowhere in the testimony was there any careful, detailed, and logical evaluation of whether or not—from both the military and political viewpoint—we would save blood and lives by following the policy advocated by General MacArthur, or whether more blood of more Americans would be shed by taking such a course.

And General MacArthur himself, who so aptly pointed out in his speech to Congress that the problem was global, refused to assume the responsibility even of an opinion as to what effect the policies he advocated would have throughout the world.

"My concepts on global defense are not what I am here to testify on. I don't pretend to be an authority on these things," the general said. And yet, inescapably, by his own actions, and by the emotional reaction of the American people that role—the role of global authority—has been assumed by General MacArthur.

If a careful and precise analysis of the issues raised by General MacArthur is to be made—and particularly if the court of public opinion, where General MacArthur has made his appeal is to judge adequately—the man must be separated from the issues and emotion from logic.

This will be difficult, for many of the American people, indignant at weak leadership, frustrated by administration mistakes, have conceived an almost idolatrous worship for General MacArthur and have reacted to his propsals with an emotional hysteria rare in our history. Letters received by this correspondent indicate a great emotional involvement by many Americans in the present dispute.

NOTES TOCSIN FOR VICTORY

One writer—Albert J. Bates, head of a real estate and insurance business in Hazleton, Pa.—writes, for instance, that General MacArthur sounded a tocsin for victory:

"Let us cleanse ourselves. Let us rededicate ourselves. And cleansed, let us remember we are a great race, that we give orders, that we do not take orders. And if any power anywhere will challenge us, let us sweep them before us like chaff! Forward! I lead you to death and to victory! What greater privilege have you than to die for your country. * *

"Ah yes, neatly suppressed was a call like that of Napoleon to his army—'Soldiers of France! I lead you to glory'"

Mrs. Thomas D. Rambaut, of Wyckoff, N. J., writes that since "I heard the terrible news (of General MacArthur's relief) on the radio, General MacArthur has been enshrined in my heart along with George Washington, Abraham Lincoln, and Winston Churchill.

"Nothing can dethrone him, not even the horrible smear campaign that Truman and Acheson and Marshall and Bradley will instigate. Not even when they refer to his ego and call him god. For he does indeed have the attributes of God; he is kind and merciful and firm and just. That is my idea of God."

And Frederick S. Hammett of Provincetown, Mass., writes:

"Why don't the 'big brass' (the Joint Chiefs of Staff) be American, be loyal to their colleague (General MacArthur) and defy the bankrupt haberdasher and the traitorous State Department who and which would sell us down the river to Great Britain, Europe, and the Communists?"

Letters such as these, which are typical of many that Americans have written to their newspapers in the last few weeks, illustrate the degree of emotion and hysteria that have obscured the issues. It is well for such Americans—among them, General MacArthur himself—to remember that he is, after all, just a man. As Senator MATTHEW M. NEELY, Democrat, of West Virginia, recalled in a speech in the Senate last week, Scipio—who also had great power and adulation—kept a slave at his shoulder to remind him constantly:

"Remember, O Scipio, thou art but human."

Separation, therefore, of the man from the issues and of emotion from logic is essential if any careful appraisal is to result from the present hearings. The principal topics and subtopics which have been and should be discussed at the hearings can be grouped under the following general headings or issues:

1. The circumstances surrounding General MacArthur's relief; the reasons for it; the manner and timing of it.

2. The issue of civilian versus military control in peace and in war.

3. The objectives of war; the issue of limited war versus unlimited war, etc.

4. The past history of, and facts concerning, the Korean war.

5. The present military-political situation in Korea and the Orient, and its relationship to the world picture.

6. The alternative courses of action we might follow in the future in Korea and in the Orient, and the effects of these alternative courses upon the world situation and the safety and security of the United States.

This examination—like any attempt to examine the future—obviously involves to some extent speculative judgments, and therefore this topic also must include a subtopic—an examination of the validity and wisdom of the past judgments (both military and political) of General MacArthur and of his opponents.

Each of these topics should be fully explored, but obviously the second and third, and the fifth and sixth topics are, by far, the most important to the future of the United States and the world.

[From the New York Times of May 5, 1951]

THE BASIC DISAGREEMENT

Out of the flood of words produced by the Senate hearings on the dismissal of General MacArthur there emerge three basic differences of opinion which are at the bottom of the controversy and from which other differences derive. These basic differences, which for the moment obscure the wide area of agreement between General MacArthur and the administration—on such vital points as the necessity of resisting Communist aggression everywhere, preserving the United Nations, and giving "the fullest protection and assistance" to Europe—may be summarized as follows:

1. General MacArthur, by his own repeated declarations, undertakes to speak only as a former commander in a local theater of war concerned solely with the means of ending this particular conflict and therefore willing to take the risks of a general war in order to win a speedy victory; the administration, on the other hand, is compelled to take into account all the military, political, and moral factors of a global struggle which we still hope to win without a general war. General MacArthur admits the global nature of the struggle, and he likewise admits that the decisions on how to wage it must be made by the Government, which alone has the authority and the necessary information to make such decisions—authority and information that are beyond the reach of a local commander. But he insists on the measures he proposes while disclaiming responsibility for their consequences on either the global struggle itself or even the future of the countries directly affected by his proposed measures.

2. General MacArthur advances the thesis that once war has broken out the "balance of control" must be put in the hands of the military, and that no political considerations should handicap the latter in winning such a war, while the administration holds that in peace or war the civil government remains supreme.

3. General MacArthur maintains that, while all soldiers should carry out orders, they have the right to disagree, and in such cases have the right and the duty not only to submit their own views to their superior officers but also to take the issue to the public for ultimate decision. Anything less than that, he says, would be "gag rule." The administration holds the contrary view.

It is on the basis of such considerations that General MacArthur now proposes that the American Government issue an ultimatum to Communist China to come to terms on a cease fire and the cessation of aggression in Korea—with refusal to comply with such an ultimatum to be regarded as a declaration of war. What is more, while expressing the hope that the United Nations would endorse such a step, he urges that, if necessary, the United States act alone.

In making these proposals General MacArthur assumes that Communist China is militarily and economically weak and can be easily defeated, and that Soviet Russia will stand idly by while the biggest of all Communist conquests is snatched from her hands. But while he is rather positive about the first assumption, he is not so certain about the latter and admits that a wrong guess regarding it might lead to a larger war than the one he is seeking to end. Moreover, he is less than precise as to what the ultimatum would imply. In one passage of his testimony he urges action in accordance with the January recommendations of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who proposed an economic blockade of China, preparations for a naval blockade, air reconnaissance over Manchuria and the Chinese coast, and use of Chiang Kai-shek's troops, about whom General MacArthur is more optimistic than the Chinese themselves. In another passage he demands bombing of enemy bases in Manchuria. And in still another he speaks of putting pressure on Red China's distributive system, which one Senator interpreted without contradiction as meaning the smashing of the tenuous Chinese railway system, carrying the war to the Soviet border.

We believe that the hazards of such proposals become evident from the mere recital of them. That there have been grievous mistakes in American policy in the Far East in recent years is equally evident. But, despite this mistake, we cannot afford to risk a break with our allies by pursuing a course of action which might well bog us down in an unlimited war in Asia.

[From the Washington Post of May 7, 1951]

WHO IS THE ENEMY?

In most of his testimony before the Senate Armed Services and Foreign Relations Committees General MacArthur, in spite of his prior insistence upon his global view, has been careful not to step out of his role as a theater commander in the Far East. For example, he persistently resisted Senator FULBRIGHT's efforts to draw him into a discussion of the wisdom of aiding Yugoslavia. At one point he declared, "The last impression that I would want to give is that I pose as an expert on world affairs." To Senator MCMAHON he said, "Senator, I have asked you several times not to involve me in anything except my own area." Yet some of his testimony extended not only beyond the confines of the Far East where he has been stationed for the last 14 years, but also reached into the sphere of political policy-making. We have in mind especially his definition of communism as the enemy against which we are arming and fighting.

Senator MCMAHON remarked, "It is obvious that we agree they are our main enemy—that the Soviet Union is." General MacArthur replied, "I didn't agree to it. I said that communism throughout the world was our main enemy." Later on Senator FULBRIGHT asked the general what he meant by communism and evoked this exchange:

"General MACARTHUR. Communism has many various factors. The great threat in what is called present communism is the imperialistic tendency or the lust of power beyond their own geographical confines. It is their effort to enslave the individual to the concept of the state. It is the establishment of autocracy that squeezes out every one of the freedoms which we value so greatly.

"Senator FULBRIGHT. I had not myself thought of our enemy as being communism: I thought of it as primarily being Russia, an imperialist Russia. That is what interests me.

"General MACARTHUR. In that concept, Senator, I disagree with you completely.

"Senator FULBRIGHT. Well * * * it seemed to me, you do not fight communism with a gun. It is sort of like sin, we are all against sin; you do not fight sin with anything tangible. Communism is an idea, but what really bothers us is when people start to shoot.

"General MACARTHUR. I think you do fight sin with very practical weapons, and I think we are fighting communism with very practical weapons."

If our enemy were merely communism we could abandon the rearmament program and embark upon a world-wide effort of peace, freedom, and economic and social rehabilitation. We should have only the communistic idea to combat and it could best be met by the spread of progressive democratic ideas. The tragedy of the present day is that the power-drunk men of the Kremlin are not willing to engage in such a bloodless contest. When persuasion has failed, they have resorted to terror and military force to impose communistic dictatorships upon unwilling peoples. Obviously it is the warmongers in the communistic movement that are our enemy.

The weakness of General MacArthur's position is that he draws no distinction between the aggressors who are in control of Russia and China and the wider areas of the world where communistic ideas prevail. Such a policy would be a mistake if for no other reason than that it would tend to drive Tito, with his thirty-odd Yugoslav divisions, back into the arms of the Kremlin. But there is also a more important reason for keeping the distinction clear. Any designation of communism as our enemy would carry with it an implication that we intend to try to wipe out communism by force of arms. Such a crusade would cost millions of lives and inestimable treasure and in the end would probably stimulate communism instead of suppressing it. General MacArthur has emphatically ruled out from his military proposals in the Far East any such American campaign. His emphasis has been upon a decisive blow against Communist China to compel that regime to give up its aggressive course in Korea. Obviously no such limited objective squares with the definition of communism in general as our enemy.

Because of his notable influence in Congress and the country, we think General MacArthur should not let this conflict in his testimony stand. People and legislators must think clearly about who our enemy is before they can hope to achieve a meeting of minds as to how the enemy shall be met. It is not merely a question of semantics. Rather it goes to the heart of the world problem of preserving freedom of thought and of economic and social organization on one hand and of suppressing aggression on the other.

Necessity of Faith in God in Nation's Emergency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS R. UNDERWOOD

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I have received a letter from the ladies of the Sunday school class of the Nicholasville, Ky., Baptist Church, emphasizing the power of faith in solving the problems of our country. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NICHOLASVILLE, KY., April 30, 1951.

The Honorable THOMAS UNDERWOOD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Yesterday the ladies of the Sunday school class in the Nicholasville Baptist Church, 42 in number, compared the conditions existing at the time the children of Israel were commanded to enter the Promised Land with conditions as they exist today. When the Israelites came up from Egypt under Moses they sent 12 men to spy out the land. Ten of these men were cowards and said that the cities were walled and the inhabitants were giants and they could never overcome them. Two of the spies, Joshua and Caleb, reported that the cities were walled and the people were giants, but they had faith that the land could be taken at God's command.

The Israelites had a democratic government, so the majority ruled, and the result was that they wandered in the wilderness for 38 years—because they did not trust God.

Now the United States was founded by Christian, God-fearing people, and God is depending on us to destroy His enemies, the Communists, so that His people can obey and worship Him. We have been to the thirty-eighth parallel twice and now we are wandering back again, losing our boys and the boys of other nations. It could be that we will be in the wilderness for 38 years, because of lack of faith. David did not have all the planes and other war material that we have when he went out to meet Goliath, only a small rock and God. Jericho fell at the blowing of trumpets because the people obeyed and had faith. They had no war material.

We have the same God today that the Israelites had, and we are asking you to read this letter to the Senate, and to use your leadership to have this Nation go forward and destroy the enemy of God's people and restore to this country the sacredness of our motto, "In God we trust."

Very truly yours,

SALLIE STEELE TAYLOR
Mrs. Sallie Steele Taylor.

Appearance of Gen. Douglas MacArthur Before Senate Committees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD two articles relating to the recent appearance of Gen. Douglas MacArthur before the Senate Committees on Armed Services and Foreign Relations, the first entitled "MacArthur and the True Picture," by David Lawrence; the second entitled "Shows No Signs of Fading Away," by Constantine Brown, both published in the Washington Star today.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Evening Star of May 7, 1951]

MACARTHUR AND THE TRUE PICTURE—GENERAL DECLARED TO HAVE PUT UNITED STATES POLICY IN PROPER FOCUS; SUGGESTION OFFERED THAT TRUMAN SHOULD MAKE AMENDS

(By David Lawrence)

A breath of fresh air has swept across the country in the person of a man who, without bitterness or rancor, rises above the petty and the irrelevant to state honestly his convictions on a highly controversial subject of national policy.

What General MacArthur has accomplished by his 3 days of testimony and by his ready submission to cross-examination is to put the whole question of our military policy in a true perspective.

Not a word of resentment did he express against the President or anyone else. He brushed aside with a simple statement of facts the many misrepresentations of his position which critics have flung at him.

Nobody can truly claim the right to state General MacArthur's position hereafter unless he has read the 150,000 words of testimony covering the 3 days of hearings.

This correspondent has read every word of it and is amazed at the number of things that have been written about the general or his proposals which simply are not true. The atmosphere here is so surcharged with political tactics and with the polemics of partisanship that it is refreshing to find a spokesman who, without regard to how his remarks jibe with the speeches of Republican or Democratic leaders in the "great debate" of recent weeks, states with candor and frankness what he really believes.

People may differ as to whether he has the right proposals and whether they should be adopted but, after reading the testimony, one is more puzzled than ever that the President should have listened to the smears of the "palace guard" and tried to destroy the reputation of one of the world's greatest soldiers, if not one of her most dynamic statesmen.

The same man who wrote out in longhand on his plane the historic speech to Congress and then read it without glasses, the same man who, though 71 years of age, sat for 9 hours a day for three successive days and faced a barrage of questions from the Senate's best interrogators, won spontaneous praise from Republicans and Democrats in the committee. The tribute by Senator RUSSELL of Georgia, Democrat, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, at the end of the final session on Saturday is significant. He said:

"General MacArthur, I wish to state to you that the 3 days that you have been here with us are without parallel in my legislative experience. I have never seen a man subjected to such a barrage of questions in so many fields and on so many varied subjects. I marvel at your physical endurance. More than that, I have been profoundly impressed by the vastness of your patience and the thoroughness and the frankness with which you have answered all of the questions that have been propounded.

"We have certainly drawn freely on your vast reservoir of knowledge and experience, not only as a great military captain, but as a civilian administrator of 80,000,000 people."

One wonders how such a man could have been summarily dismissed. One finds nowhere in the official record the slightest evidence that he disobeyed a military command or failed to fulfill the highest traditions of our military service. One wonders if President Truman will not be inspired when he has read all the testimony to show the same courage that he showed when he apologized to the Marines for an intemperate remark. For the instinct to redress a wrong is the mark of courage and spiritual understanding. General MacArthur cannot be restored to his command, of course, but the unworthy manner by which he was abruptly relieved can still be expunged from the record by an act of Christian atonement.

SHOWS NO SIGNS OF FADING AWAY—MACARTHUR'S EXHIBITION OF VITALITY DURING LONG QUESTIONING GIVES LIE TO REPORTS THAT HE WAS TOO OLD TO CARRY ON

(By Constantine Brown)

Gen. Douglas MacArthur was only a headline name to the man in the street until he showed himself in person to the American people. He was a controversial figure with as many fans as critics in this country. His detractors spread the word during the last 2 or 3 years that whatever he had been in the past he no longer is today. He was freely described as a man who was actually fading away mentally and physically. Only last July a high official told this reporter that General MacArthur should be replaced by a younger man as commander of the forces in Korea.

"He is not able at 71 to take an active part in the campaign; moreover, when you have a 'God complex' in your younger days, you actually believe in it when you reach MacArthur's age. And that is dangerous for the prosecution of the campaign."

Since the five-star general arrived in this country and particularly since he testified without interruption before the Senate Armed Services and Foreign Affairs Committees all these rumors have been belied. While much younger men were exhausted at the end of the long continuous hearings, General MacArthur was rested and fresh and bore unflinchingly the brunt of questioning by 26 Senators—a number of whom were set on trapping or embarrassing him.

He brushed off some of the "political" questions as having no relation to the scope of the hearings, and answered unhesitatingly the pertinent queries. There has been no debate in the memory of man which gripped the country more than the MacArthur investigation. The ousted supreme commander has gained a greater stature since he returned than his most ardent admirers ever anticipated.

One inescapable fact is that we are at war with the Chinese Communists in Korea. The other, which General MacArthur has brought out forcefully, is that we are fighting a half-hearted defensive war which costs us tens of thousands of casualties because we don't dare throw all our available might against the enemy.

He has been pressed to answer whether an all-out attack on the enemy's bases in Manchuria whence the Reds feed their armies in Korea with manpower, arms, and ammunition would not precipitate a third world war for which some legislators maintained we are nearly prepared. General MacArthur replied that if Russia is determined to fight us, it is immaterial what pretext she will use—if she needs any pretext at all. But his considered guess is that Russia is not prepared for an all-out war in the Far East because of logistic consideration. It is more difficult for her to transport men and weapons overland over deficient railways and bad roads than it is for us who are carrying them in ships across the great expanse of the Pacific.

When we entered the war in Korea last June our strategists in Washington realized that we were taking a calculated risk. It may have been a minor risk, but the elements of involvement with China and the U. S. S. R. must have been in their minds. Yet the decision was made to accept that risk. But when General MacArthur urged, after the Chinese Reds entered the war last November, that they should also be defeated with the means available in the Far East, the military and the political planners in Washington and at Lake Success refused to expand that calculated risk in the face of the general's arguments that victory was within our reach if his recommendations were followed. The military planners at home are said by General MacArthur to have bowed to the political arguments of the diplomats.

For reasons of security some parts of General MacArthur's testimony were deleted. But there are reasons to believe that the former supreme commander is not particularly impressed with the war potential of China. Besides the fact that the Chinese industries are not capable of a sustained effort and the losses of their best trained armies have been very great, China is actually in a state of near civil war at the present time.

According to the admission of the Peiping government itself upwards of 1,500,000 active guerrillas are fighting the Peiping administration throughout that vast territory. There is a lack of food which verges on general famine; some of the trusted provincial officials are about ready to become "warlords" on their own, under the Communist mask.

So long as China fights on one front alone, she will be able to continue the war of attrition against us. But the day her forces are harassed by the Nationalists from Formosa and she is subjected to aerial attacks from the Allied air forces, the situation may change radically and Russia is unlikely to do much about it.

Message of Frazar B. Wilde

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM RIBICOFF
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and include a message sent by Frazar B. Wilde, president of the Connecticut General Life Insurance Co., Hartford, Conn., to that company's policyholders. I am so impressed by Mr. Wilde's grasp of the problems facing our Nation and his commonsense analysis of these problems that I would like to have his views receive wider circulation. The letter follows:

In a discussion of the year's results at Connecticut General, it seems not inappropriate to give you our thoughts on the serious and important problems of our world situation which mean so much to all of us in so many different ways.

The threat to peace and freedom which is facing free nations throughout the world is without parallel in modern history. The long period of peace hoped for after World War II has not been realized, and the situation has deteriorated to the point where the United States and other members of the United Nations are involved in undeclared war to suppress Communist-inspired aggression.

This confronts us with a most difficult problem. Our aim must be to try to localize the conflict and, simultaneously, to pursue every possibility of accomplishing a fair international understanding through peaceful means. Diplomacy alone, without adequate force behind it, will inevitably be ineffective. Dictatorships feed on aggression; they respect only armed power and then only if they are sure such power will be used. To promise that we will use the atomic bomb only if the enemy first uses it against us would put all of us, military and civilians, at a great disadvantage for which there seems no justification. If we are to preserve our way of life, we must be prepared to fight for it without hesitancy.

National unity of purpose and action is essential. To reach national conclusions we do have to have full discussion. Fair and informed criticism is helpful. Unfair and ill-considered criticism of those charged with the operation of our Government will only serve to weaken us internally and promote a lack of confidence in us on the part of other free nations throughout the world. We should all be prepared to face the inevitable fact that, whether or not there is total war, the steps we must take will be costly ones and will have to be paid for. The success we anticipate in securing peace does not have to be gained at the expense of losing our way of life by permitting it to be destroyed through inflation. Inflation is a danger which we can control through our actions as individuals and by supporting positive action on the part of our Government.

Because the basic cause of inflation lies in the existence of more effective buying power than the normal value of goods available for purchase, the problem has to be attacked on both sides. There must be restraints imposed upon buying power and there must be an increase in supply. Wage and price controls may be of some temporary help, but they cannot do the job by themselves. They are attacking the effects of inflation, not the underlying cause.

The most effective answer to inflation is more production. This answer cannot be made immediately available and therefore it must be viewed as a deferred solution. Until we have increased our plant and put the increased plant in operation, we simply cannot have both guns and butter. Therefore, civilian goods must for a while shrink in supply.

We can restrict spending by a severe program of tax increases. This is a vary unpalatable remedy for all of us. There is, however, no escape from it if we wish to control inflation. If we don't control it, we will pay much more in the end through inflated prices.

We can ask our Government to curtail its expenditures, particularly those items in the budget which may properly be postponed. There are always large sums representing projects which might be desirable in times of peace but which we don't absolutely need now. We can even ask our representatives to scrutinize the military budgets. We do not care to take any undue risk of lacking the most modern equipment and enough of it. The facts of life are, however, that it is frequently found that the procurement policies of the Armed Forces are not so efficient that we can relax our scrutiny in that area. There is a tendency to overbuy many items, which adds nothing to present effectiveness. While we want to be completely armed, there is nothing sacrosanct in the military budgets.

Credit extended by lending institutions should be restricted because one of the primary causes of inflationary pressure is the expansion of buying ability created through credit.

There are other steps which should be taken, such as scrutiny of the country's agricultural program. Overemphasis on agricultural aid, such as excessive parity prices and loan values, can be highly inflationary because they affect the prices of groceries in the cities which in turn leads to demand for higher wages.

We as individuals can help the situation to a greater extent than many realize. We can avoid buying anything which we do not actually need now, and resist temptations to buy beyond current income through borrowing and through other credit means. All of us who have a hand in production of goods can strive for maximum output, and those of us who manage businesses can resist price increases. We can remember that demands for increased wages without increased output or subsidy from Government will hurt all of us—there are no "other people" in our Nation.

Very importantly, we should all attempt to add to our savings programs. When we put money into United States savings bonds, savings bank deposits and life insurance, just that much less money will go into the market in competition for the limited supply of goods presently available. The money saved becomes available for financing defense production.

These steps attack inflation at the source. If they were taken, in sufficient degree, the danger would be eliminated, and the disastrous inflation spiral would be stopped.

There are, of course, those areas which we cannot directly control as individuals, such as Government programs, spending, and monetary policies. Some are Federal. Others are State and local. We can, however, in our democratic form of government, control these areas through government if enough of us want to do so. Senators and Congressmen often maintain offices in their constituencies for the purpose of finding out how the people they represent feel on current issues. If this is the case where you live, go to see them. If you can't contact them personally, write them a letter. State and local officials are almost always available, or letters can be written to them. Our representatives in Government can carry out our wishes only if we let them know what those wishes are. They will know they have our backing in carrying out strong, positive measures to combat inflation only if we tell them so.

F. B. WILDE,
President.

MacArthur Before Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK CARLSON
OF KANSAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial written by Rolland Peters, editor of the Pratt Daily Tribune, entitled "MacArthur Before Congress." While the editorial was written previous to the general's testimony before the Armed Services and Foreign Affairs Committees, I think it is most timely.

The Nation is fortunate in having a man of knowledge, integrity, and sincerity at a time when we need leadership with courage, character, and conviction.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MACARTHUR BEFORE CONGRESS

History will have to record whether America was right or wrong in whatever direction she moves today in her war in Korea and her disputes with Russia. General MacArthur has his own definite ideas of what should be done; President Truman and Alger Hiss' friend, Secretary Acheson, have theirs. And Britain has hers. So do the European countries. The White House and the State Department have, as before, sided with Europe. They sided in with Europe against their own general in Korea, the most experienced military leader of the age. Because General MacArthur persisted in airing his views the five-star general of 52 years' experience in military work was fired by a former World War I infantry captain.

Yesterday the general went before Congress and once again told the country what he thought should be done in Asia. Right or wrong, he deserved the attention of all of the American people because he was speaking then as an American and not as head of the Korean forces. But the man who fired him was observed to walk to lunch during the time General MacArthur was speaking. This was the height of discourtesy on the part of Mr. Truman toward a man who has done so much for the country of which Mr. Truman is President.

The general was most gracious and gentlemanly throughout his talk. He said what he had to say. He struck a couple of severe blows at the Truman crowd, and yet he did so like the gentleman that he is. One of the most significant things that he said was that his program had had the approval of practically every military person including the Joint Chiefs of Staff. General Bradley is Chairman of that Staff. Only 3 days ago General Bradley publicly sided with the Truman administration in the dismissal of General MacArthur in a way that was intended from all indications to humiliate the general.

Perhaps General Bradley can explain why he shared the deposed general's views and then turned over to the Truman side. He owes this explanation to the American people. Two points outstand in the MacArthur talk. First, it was the speech of a man sincere in everything that he said, and second, it was the speech of a man who knows far more about the Far East and the military than many Harry Trumans and Dean Achesons put together.

The welcome to America that is being accorded General MacArthur surpasses anything that has ever before been accorded to any one. Back of all this is the American people's appreciation for what he has done for America and faith in his sincerity and integrity and an expression of disgust over the manner in which his brilliant career was ended by a politician who listened to other politicians and to foreigners in Europe. If the American people had today the faith in their administration that they have shown in General MacArthur, we would not be as confused as we are and we would not be as apprehensive as we are. The Trumans of Washington have cried "emergency" and "crisis" so long and so often that people generally have come to look upon their cries like the boy who cried "wolf" when there was no wolf. When the wolf appeared no one paid any attention to him and the wolf killed the sheep. The greatest thing that could happen to America today would be for the people of America to have an administration which they could look to for sound and sensible leadership and an administration in which they could place their faith. We do not have this under Harry Truman.

Protecting the Bald Eagle

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to leave granted, I am including as part of these remarks a letter written by Bernice Marshall, chairman of conservation, New York City Federation of Women's Clubs, and president of the National Life Conservation Society, which was published in the New York Times under date April 23, 1951. The letter follows:

PROTECTING THE BALD EAGLE—PASSAGE OF LEGISLATION ADVOCATED TO SAVE BIRD FROM EXTINCTION

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

Many fine organizations in this area have sent letters to Congress endorsing H. R. 1870 to extend protection to the bald eagle in Alaska, which bill was introduced by Representative HOMER D. ANGELL, of Oregon, in the House.

Among them was the New York City Federation of Women's Clubs with a membership of approximately 200,000. The supporting resolution was passed at a large convention of the federation.

The National Life Conservation Society has conducted an active campaign in favor of this needed legislation. So also have Sorosis, mother of women's clubs; Daughters of Ohio, Congress of States, Natural History Club, Bronx Women's Clubs, Washington Heights Club, and many other clubs. This shows that a large number of thinking people are alarmed over the awful slaughter our national emblem in Alaska.

What small damage the bird may do is certainly not enough to justify the bounty of $2 on every bird killed. The Fish and Wildlife Service office in Alaska reports that bounties were paid on 4,320 eagles during the calendar year 1950, almost double the number for 1949. The bald eagle is not a prolific bird. How long does anyone think it can survive this slaughter?

Alaska wants statehood. She should therefore show some respect for our national emblem; as we do here in the States, though I must confess we were much too slow in getting protective measures established. Every patriotic citizen, every conservationist who cares about its survival should get behind this legislation and tell our representatives in no uncertain terms that the shameful killing of the bald eagle must stop.

Do we Americans want to see our splendid country represented on our great seal by an extinct bird, that we ourselves have exterminated?

BERNICE MARSHALL,
Chairman of Conservation, New York City Federation of Women's Clubs, and President of the National Life Conservation Society.

Minnesota's Ore Reserves Still Ample

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, all of the phony propaganda being dished out by the advocates of the St. Lawrence seaway to the effect that Minnesota's iron-ore reserves will be depleted in a few years is debunked by the following article written by Lewis S. Patterson for a St. Paul, Minn., newspaper on March 18, 1951.

The article by Mr. Patterson follows:

MINNESOTA'S ORE RESERVES STILL AMPLE

(By Lewis S. Patterson)

Just what is the status of the iron-ore mining industry in Minnesota?

Is the old champion, which for 50 years has supplied the Nation's steel mills with as high as 80 percent of their raw materials, really on her last legs?

What is the meaning of Friday's announcement that in 15 days 55,000 tons of 54-percent ore had been taken out of a new open pit near Camp Ripley.

To answer these questions it is necessary to examine the testimony over the last 6 years of the experts and of others possibly more interested than expert.

When it was announced at the end of World War II that the State had dug up more than a third of a billion tons of ore for guns and tanks, there were those who said it was best that the people realize the old champion was about through. And that future plans be based on this realization.

Examination today, however, of testimony given in a committee meeting here and a Federal or State commission there—though not decrying the desirability of planning—does not bear out the pessimists.

The facts are that Minnesota today can spot any other known ore area in the world a billion tons and still walk off with the steel crown of the champion.

In a freight-rate hearing conducted by the Interstate Commerce Commission in Duluth in June 1947, it was brought out that the Lake Superior region still had 2,000,000,000 long tons of ore—1,500,000,000 of it in Minnesota, the rest in Wisconsin and Michigan. And that 1,500,000,000 tons was said to be in the Mesabi, Vermillion, and Cuyuna ranges.

Shortly after that Dr. G. M. Schwartz, director of the Minnesota Geological Survey, began flying over the northern part of the State, with his "doodlebug" detector. When he had put all the charts and figures together, he announced on separate occasions that the magnetometer indicated vast new ranges west of the Mississippi never explored. He cautioned that drilling and digging should be undertaken to determine the exact richness.

The Pacific Isle Mining Co. of Hibbing announced Friday that it had made such an exploration in open pit digging between Randall and the border of Camp Ripley. Below 50 feet of top earth it ran into ore running 54 percent in content, comparable in richness to the famed Mesabi, which runs to 60 percent in its best ore.

Below the 54 percent ore at Randall, mining company spokesmen said, are millions of tons of 40 percent ore. Mixed with the higher grade after washing operations to bring up content percentage, they believe, it will yield 50 percent ore such as is shipped from the Mesabi pits.

Now back to that 1,500,000,000-ton estimate in 1947. As has been pointed out, that was for the three explored ranges—the Mesabi, Vermillion, and Cuyuna.

The estimators weren't thinking of the unknown quantity west of the Mississippi then or of taconite.

Yet today Reserve Mining Co. plans to sink $7,000,000 this summer in a taconite plant at Babbitt, Minn., up in the Superior National Forest.

So there you have 1947's 1,500,000,000 tons, plus vast new ranges west of the Mississippi plus taconite.

How, then, does Minnesota compare with the much-talked-of fields in Labrador and Venezuela? When the excitement of the new discoveries there had cooled, it was estimated each area had about one billion tons of ore.

Do mining companies expect to rush there for ore? Yes, they say. Do they expect to drop Minnesota? No.

What is the plan, then? This:

The mining companies have indicated they expect to take some ore from Labrador, some from Venezuela, some taconite, to mix with Minnesota's rich ores. In that way the heavy drain on the latter will be cut down. For this reason: If there's a war, it might be difficult to ship from Venezuela and it will be nice to know there's plenty at home.

Thus, the experts indicate Minnesota likely will still be wearing the crown in the year 2000.

The MacArthur Ouster

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. TIMOTHY P. SHEEHAN
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. SHEEHAN. Mr. Speaker, under date of April 12 I stated in a speech to the Congress that the MacArthur ouster reflects the people's worry about our foreign policy. I might add that the MacArthur ouster also reflects the growing conviction in the people's minds that the acts of many of those in the executive branch of the Government have aroused resentment, not because these acts have been illegal, but because of their immorality.

This latter thesis has been very ably presented by Mr. Hal O'Flaherty, director of the Chicago Daily News foreign scrvice, in an article published on April 27, 1951. The article is as follows:

BEHIND THE CHEERS—MACARTHUR FRENZY CALLED ANSWER TO MINK COAT MORALS—ANGER AT GOVERNMENT DECAY COMES OUT IN PUBLIC ACTS

(By Hal O'Flaherty)

General MacArthur's homecoming has created an emotional disturbance across the Nation that requires analysis and, if possible, rational explanation.

Newsreels now showing give a connected story of the general's departure from Japan, his arrival at San Francisco and his appearance before Congress. The dramatic quality of this warrior's return is unique.

Public frenzy such as MacArthur's return created cannot be explained simply as a nation's love for a war hero.

Nor can it be attributed to revulsion against the President, who acted wholly within his constitutional rights in firing the general.

Around the desks where news is handled a conviction is growing that the abrupt dismissal of MacArthur is connected in the public mind with other acts by the executive branch of government that have aroused resentment not because they were illegal but because they were immoral.

MacArthur's dismissal followed closely upon the heels of the great debate on the sending of new divisions to Europe.

The President unquestionably has the right to order American troops to any place in the world, but Congress asked whether he had the moral right to do so.

According to a decision of the United States Supreme Court in the famous case of devaluation of the dollar, the American Government, which includes the executive branch, has the sovereign power to commit an immoral act. The devaluation was labeled as immoral but not illegal.

Fresh in the public mind are the revelations of many other acts closely related to the executive branch of Government, that were immoral but not illegal.

The $9,000 mink coat deal was immoral, perhaps, but not illegal.

It was immoral, but not illegal to harbor 5-percenters in the White House; to appoint incompetents to high public office; to try to force Congress to ratify any wish or whim of the Executive.

Public memory is not so short that it has forgotten other Executive acts that were plainly immoral but not illegal.

The attempt to pack the Supreme Court; the subsidizing of masses of the population; the substitution of a sham security in place of individual freedom.

More recently, the executive branch of Government has been engaged in the broad decisions regarding the conduct of the war in Korea.

From June 1950 up to the present moment, these decisions have been taken by the President.

It was he who ordered MacArthur into Korea before the United Nations had voted permission.

Today, it is the President with perfunctory reference to the United Nations who is directing the war in Korea on strategic lines that General MacArthur asserts cannot bring victory.

Again, the question arises as to whether it is immoral but not illegal to send American forces backward and forward across Korea with only stalemate as the end result.

Back of the plaudits for General MacArthur may be the desire of common people for some degree of participation in the decisions of Government through a Congress that is a reality and not the relic of American democracy.

Senator Kefauver's Stature and Prestige

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and editorial which appeared in the Nashville Tennessean of May 2 under the caption "He meets the challenge." The editorial, which is reprinted from the Binghamton (N. Y.) Evening Sun, pays just tribute to the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] for the magnificent work done by him in connection with the so-called crime committee.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HE MEETS THE CHALLENGE

The Binghamton Sun modestly claims to be the only up-State Republican newspaper. In politics we have always been stanchly Republican. But of late years we have been greatly troubled by a challenge which has arisen in this Nation—an ugly, formidable challenge which transcends party politics.

This challenge is whether clean, honest, decent government shall survive, or whether big-time crime, big-time corruption, and unscrupulous uses of public office—aided by public apathy—shall go on poisoning the lifeblood of America until it is too late for help.

Senator ESTES KEFAUVER, a Democrat, of Tennessee, has courageously and resolutely stepped forth to meet that challenge. In this great fight he deserves the grateful support of every newspaper and every decent citizen, regardless of Democrat or Republican Party affiliation.

Throughout the Nation there has been of late a growing public uneasiness, and feeling of disgust and distrust, over the many startling revelations of "boodle" politics in Washington—of immoral use of high public office, of the "legal" plundering of public funds, of a cynical lack of frankness (even good faith) by the Government toward the people, even in such important matters as foreign policy. The public is beginning to feel that it has not been told the truth by the Government—that the Government today holds too many men of low principle in high places. When the people lose their faith in the integrity of their Government it becomes indeed a grave and dangerous situation for democracy.

Amid the whole sickening mess of broken public trust, of big-time crime and its hideous partner, corruption, Senator KEFAUVER stands out like the highest peak of his own Tennessee mountains—not just as an able, fearless, determined Senator, but also as a symbol of the hopes and best ideals of all good citizens who want to save America.

The Senator has dramatically shown the country that something must be done, and can be done. He is furnishing the necessary leadership. By intelligent and skillful use of publicity, radio, and television he has successfully dramatized the sordid picture of big-time crime and corruption, and driven the shocking lesson home to the decent citizens of every community.

Senator KEFAUVER has proven to the American people that clean, honest, decent government can be had—but only if public opinion demands and insists on it. By his own resolute courage and honest effort Senator KEFAUVER has performed a great public service not only for the people, but also for the United States Senate because he has so forcefully demonstrated that the citizens of this country can still have faith that the Senate can be relied on to rise above party ties and political expediency to fight such an internal national menace as we now face.

Senator KEFAUVER is a great American, a great Senator, and a great man. We wish we could add also that he is a great Republican. But Tennessee being what it is politically, he probably would not be in the Senate if he were Republican—which would be something of a national calamity. So New York and all the other States, Republican or Democratic, are mighty grateful to Tennessee for giving ESTES KEFAUVER to the United States Senate.

We fervently hope to hear more and more of Senator KEFAUVER taking a leading part in national affairs in the future. He is young, able, strong, honest, and fearless. God knows that is the kind of leadership America—and the world—needs today.

Shall We Bomb Manchuria?—View of a Top Authority

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE L. HAYS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, realizing that the ultimate decision regarding war in Asia may well affect the lives of seven or eight million American boys and reach into practically every home in the country, I am including with this extension of my remarks the views of Lt. Gen. Robert L. Eichelberger. General Eichelberger was commander of the Eighth Army from 1944 to 1948 and participated in the New Guinea, New Britain, and Philippine campaigns in the Pacific. In addition, he was commander of occupied forces in Japan during 1946–48. General Eichelberger, who was born in Urbana, Ohio, was one of the thousands of sons of the Buckeye State who made an indelible mark for themselves in the Pacific theater during the last war.

His article in Newsweek magazine follows:

SHALL WE BOMB MANCHURIA?—VIEW OF A TOP AUTHORITY

(By Lt. Gen. Robert L. Eichelberger, U. S. Army, retired)

Since the Chinese intervention in Korea last fall, it has been my fixed conviction that Mao Tse-tung must have received certain promises from Stalin before committing his troops against the United Nations in Korea. In the last analysis, Mao was entering an undeclared war against the United States. It is hard to believe that he would have taken such a step unless assured of Russian support should the conflict be broadened beyond Korea.

We don't know what commitments the Soviets have made to Mao. But we do know that they are in a position to give the Chinese support—disguised or otherwise—with air power, with submarine, and with troops. And we do know that the treaty of mutual support between China and Russia can be invoked to provide a legal basis for such support. So far, however, the Russians seem to have been reluctant to supply much aid to the Chinese, except for the Soviet-built planes which dart across the Yalu and back again. The Chinese ground forces apparently have little or no Soviet equipment. But the appearance of Russian tanks in the ground fighting could make a great difference and the intervention of Red planes over the battlefield and of Red submarines against our supply lines could be decisive.

What action on our part would bring about Russian intervention? It is my belief that bombing the Red bases in the privileged sanctuary of Manchuria would cause the Soviets to enter the war in Korea and that this would also probably herald the beginning of the third world war. Certainly preparations are being made, not only for defending Manchurian bases but also for putting a Red air force in Korea. This is proved by the construction and improvement of airfields all over Northern Korea.

What would be the effect of Soviet air intervention only (leaving out of consideration the submarines and ground forces)? First, take the lads doing the fighting. No doubt they resent the fact that we are not able to bomb across the Yalu and hit the enemy where he comes from. But, at the same time, these lads have been spared being bombed and strafed as they fight against superior numbers. Since December, our battle losses have been consistently lower than those of the enemy with consequent improvement in all ranks in immediate battle contact. All this might be reversed if the enemy had air support.

Second, take the effect of Soviet intervention against our own privileged sanctuary—Japan. Throughout the Korean war the Japanese have realized all too well that we have been fighting their fight across the Sea of Japan. They have natural fears inspired by the presence of powerful Red forces on the island of Sakhalin and on the Asiatic mainland. Most Japanese now hope for an early peace treaty, including the right of rearming ground forces for the defense of their own shores. The Japanese need time, above all, to build their defenses on land and to coordinate them with the air and sea defenses which we will provide.

Third, take the matter of time itself. Is it on our side? A few days ago it was my privilege to visit the plant where the world's fastest global bomber is made. I left with the hope that we can hold off the third world war by every legitimate means until that assembly line and a hundred others can produce the war material which will deter the gentlemen of the Kremlin from total war or spell defeat for them if they force war upon us.

Was the Decartelization Program in Germany Sabotaged?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the failure of decartelization of cartels and combines in Germany, I include a short statement and article showing how our own representatives have failed to carry out the provisions of the Potsdam agreement in effecting decartelization. There is no doubt in my mind but that certain of our big corporations have connections and are interwoven with these cartels and are responsible for the failure of the decartelization program. Not only will the failure of the program cost our country millions and millions of dollars, but I also feel that within a few short years these cartels will be directed against the best interest of our country. I respectfully urge that the membership read my statement and the article which I have included.

The reservoir of world-wide good will toward the United States is now being gravely threatened during these days of international crisis. To conserve that good will and to strengthen our ties with our most reliable friends abroad, is the surest way to enhance freedom's battle against totalitarianism.

While it is my firm conviction that the democracies must be strong militarily, the American people would be misreading the lessons of history if they laid undue stress on the military factor without giving prime consideration to moral and economic factors which must in the long run determine the future of the free world. Are we applying these lessons of history as regards Germany?

Powerful voices have placed a premium on the rebuilding of Germany's military potential as though this were the key to peace and the strengthening of the free world. How else can one explain the complete failure to thoroughly denazify Germany? The retreat from the original policy to root out those aggressive elements that caused so much ruin and misery to the world was recently dramatized by the decision of the American High Commissioner to commute the sentences of 89 leading German war criminals including that merchant of death, Alfred Krupp. All of these criminals had received fair trials. Their cases had been reviewed by General Clay. He found no reason to grant clemency. Yet the American High Commissioner helped pave the way for the return to power of these powerful Hitlerite forces.

Brig. Gen. Telford Taylor, who was chief American prosecutor at the Nuremberg trials, in denouncing the McCloy commutations said:

> We are engaged today in a mortal struggle to suppress the menace of communism in the west and undermine its freezing grip on the east. By these commutations we have added a powerful new weapon to the Kremlin's propaganda arsenal and it will not be long before we feel the sharpness of its edge and the power of its thrust.

Among those whose sentences were commuted were the criminals responsible for the Malmedy massacre where hundreds of American GI's were murdered though they had been taken as prisoners of war during the Battle of the Bulge. In the cases of Maj. Gen. Otto Ohlendorf and Lt. Gen. Oswald Pohl, who, together with their henchmen, were responsible for the extermination of millions of people, the American High Commissioner, while lenient in some instances, admitted that Pohl and Ohlendorf could not receive any special treatment. Their guilt was too patent. Yet these murderers, through legal ruses, are endeavoring to thwart justice.

American leadership in world affairs cannot rest on political expediency. We cannot bargain with the former enemy by whitewashing their crimes and restoring the alleged honor of the German soldier without at the same time forfeiting our right to speak for the free world. Indeed, it is my considered judgment that political bargaining with the Germans can only increase their contempt of the Allies and in particular of the United States. It is sheer folly to believe that the Germans are wedded to the west as opposed to the east. There is nothing in German history which proves that the Germans have been a bulwark of western civilization. On the contrary, they have been the instigators of all recent wars. They are completely dedicated to the Pan-German dream of Deutschland Ueber Alles.

They will gladly bargain with the west as they are doing today and extract one concession after another, but when the chips are down who will dare to say that we will find them as a bulwark against communism? The Nazi-Soviet pact of 1939 should be a stern reminder to those who play fast and loose with America's security. To strengthen Germany's war potential and to enable her to regain economic mastery over Europe, would seriously undermine our position in the world.

The peoples living on the periphery of Germany including our allies, have a deep-rooted fear and suspicion of Germany. These attitudes are not transitory. They are rooted in the history of the past 100 years. Shall we sacrifice our most reliable friends in Europe for short-term expediency? This is the question that must be answered by the American people.

The sharp deterioration of our position in Germany and the consequent strengthening of Communist propaganda is seen by the abysmal blunders with regard to the smashing of the German cartels and trusts. Everyone in Europe knows the predatory character of these huge giants which provided the bone and sinew of Hitler's war-making power and tried in every way to hamper American production during World War II. They were slated to be broken up and their rulers were to be prevented from ever again holding positions of economic power. But as with denazification and the war crimes trials, powerful influences have succeeded in sabotaging the decartelization program. As early as 1948 former Secretary of the Army Royall assured the American people that the pernicious cartels in Germany had been abolished. But as late as October 14, 1950, the United Press reported as follows:

> The retiring chief of the United States Marshall plan for Germany said today that the Western Allies have failed to break up the huge cartels that helped Hitler wage war.
> "The program of decartelizing and deconcentrating West German industry has not been successful so far," Robert M. Hanes said in an interview. "Practically no German industry has been decartelized or deconcentrated. * * *
> "Cartel-smashing has been attacked bitterly by West German industrial and governmental leaders, including Chancelor Adenauer." (From UP, Frankfurt, October 14, 1950.)

How can one explain the fact that the huge trusts and cartels in Germany are still thriving? Was it by sheer chance or ignorance on the part of those who were responsible for decartelization? The record shows this not to be true. It is in this connection that I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, an article entitled "Was the Decartelization Program Sabotaged?" This article appeared in Prevent World War III, a bimonthly magazine published by the Society for the Prevention of World War III—Part I, November-December 1950. This article cites personalities and goes into great detail with regard to the decartelization debacle.

Anyone who reads this article cannot help but come to the conclusion that the decartelization program was sabotaged by a preconceived plan foisted upon our military government by powerful cartel figures in the United States. The failure in decartelization is a clear mirror reflecting how far we have traveled away from our original policies in Germany. It is a warning to all Americans that the sacrifices of World War II were in vain. In inserting this article I want to say that I have every confidence in the work of the Society for the Prevention of World War III which is sponsored by men and women motivated by the highest sense of patriotism. The society's work in keeping the American people informed is a tribute to their understanding of the issues and the grave responsibilities facing our Nation today.

Only last week I read reliable reports of the ever-growing power of the Nazis. Then, this morning, came press dispatches of two elections held yesterday, one in Germany and the other in Austria. In both, Nazi-like parties gained large numbers of votes, 11 percent in one election and almost 20 percent in the other. Our failure to press the decartelization program has encouraged rather than discouraged the enemies of democracy to return to power. The article follows:

WAS THE DECARTELIZATION PROGRAM SABOTAGED?

PROFILE NO. 1: RICHARDSON BRONSON

Richardson Bronson became chief of the decartelization branch of military government in 1947. During the war he was an Army colonel ferrying troops across to Europe.

He began his military government work as deputy I. G. Farben control officer, in which position he was subordinate and responsible to James S. Martin, chief of decartelization. Bronson had no training in antitrust work, although he was a lawyer; and was very frank in stating to his subordinates that his background had been with big business and that his sympathies were there too.

Bronson became I. G. Farben control officer in which position he developed a plan for turning over the various units set up under I. G. Farben breakup plans to German trustees who would administer and run the properties until finally disposed of to new and independent owners. The series of "independent" units which Bronson set up were legal fictions, since they were in fact neither units nor independents. The scheme was a temporary stop-gap to take the pressure off the persistent demand for positive action.

Although Bronson was administratively responsible to Martin, in reality he took his orders from his superiors in the Economics Division, Lawrence Wilkinson, Gen. William H. Draper, Jr., and eventually Phillips Hawkins. In common with his superiors, he was unalterably opposed to breaking up and deconcentrating German combines, and never concealed his antagonism to the program of the decartelization branch. While still subordinate to Martin, Bronson told Johnston Avery and Creighton Coleman, assistant chiefs of the branch, that he was glad he had nothing to do with decartelization, since he had always been on the side of big business and did not believe in breaking up German combines.

The principle behind the establishment of "independent" units to replace the Farben combine was the policy that these units should not be bigger than were absolutely necessary to carry out efficient production. It would appear that this principle was not adhered to. Actually, the biggest plants of Farben were grouped into one unit under a single trustee. All of the plants in Hoechst, for example, were placed under one trustee and operated as a unit. The Hoechst complex constitutes one of the biggest pieces of Farben property. The aim was not efficient production, but to safeguard the interests of the former owners of Farben who, through their influence, both on the Americans and on the German trustees, were able to prevent any dismemberment of the cartel. The trustees of these units were trusted functionaries of the company, many of them former high Nazis, who were retained in their positions because of their alleged know-how. These trustees knew how to cater to American occupation authorities in order to accomplish their aims of safeguarding their property from liquidation.

Bronson conducted long conferences with various officials in search of a formula which would circumvent the Allied Control Council Law 9 seizing I. G. Farben property. This concerned the method whereby ownership would be transferred to new owners. It was a convenient piece of juridical maneuvering to which Bronson offered no opposition. The whole history of the liquidation of Farben clearly shows that the top officials did very little to carry out United States policies. And this also applies to Bronson.

The net result of Bronson's tenure as I. G. Farben control officer was the gradual emergence of the old power of the Farben cartel, with production policies under nominal direction of the American officials, but actually in the hands of the same crowd which guided Farben throughout its nefarious history.

The turning over of the German chemical industry by John J. McCloy to the Germans was only the logical consequence of an existing state of fact.

The fact that former Nazis were back in control of Farben was admitted by Bronson's colleague, Myron S. Maupin, who was appointed by Bronson to succeed him as Farben control officer when Bronson moved up to the position of decartelization chief.

Maupin was little concerned with the breaking up of the Farben empire. Testifying before the Ferguson committee, Maupin admitted that many of the present officials of Farben were former Nazis and justified their employment on the grounds that all he was interested in was production, and those Nazis knew how to produce.

With the announcement that the "independent" units of Farben would not be sold to the public as originally planned, the final step was taken by the American occupation in abandoning plans for the elimination of this source of resurgent economic power of the German cartels.

When Phillips Hawkins moved up from assistant chief to chief of decartelization he picked Bronson to succeed him. Bronson and Hawkins were close personal friends—Bronson was best man at the latter's wedding—and the fact that Hawkins was the son-in-law of Draper, the military-government economic adviser, was particularly attractive to Bronson.

Hawkins selected Bronson for the job of decartelization chief, because he could rely on Bronson to follow his orders and hew the line. As an administrator of the program, Bronson showed a lack of interest in breaking the cartels. The promises made to his staff to undertake any particular action were never kept. He always sought reasons for his lack of action. Bronson would call for the submission of proposals against a particular combine, but after receiving them would completely ignore them, while the staff would be involved in some internal reorganization or shifting of responsibility. A favorite technique for avoiding action would be the shifting of the responsibility for recommendations from one staff member to another. Projects such as the Bosch and Siemens deconcentration orders went through innumerable individuals, each obliged to review the data and come up with some new recommendation. Proposals for deconcentrating the Siemenswerke, the giant electrical trust, for example, were ready as far back as 1946. Yet more than 2 years later, Bronson assigned an entirely new set of individuals who did not know the material to undertake a new study of the combine.

Bronson never fought for any part of the decartelization program, and when he was publicly accused in March 1948 by 19 members of his own staff of revising basic United States policy, he failed to justify his position. Nor did he try to defend United States policies before his superiors who used him to promulgate this arbitrary change of policy without any explanation whatsoever. Quite the contrary, Bronson told the staff to be "good soldiers" and obey their superiors. Martin, however, fought back and defended the United States interests.

Bronson's testimony before the Ferguson committee shows his true character. He affirmed to the committee the possibility of deconcentrating the Henschel locomotive combine although he himself earlier had informed the staff that Henschel was not to be deconcentrated.

Bronson's performance before the Ferguson committee is an example of the man's ability. As described by Francis Laurent, one of the assistant chiefs of the branch, Bronson, "because of his poor memory and lack of understanding of the issues was not well qualified for the conduct of negotiations, and was unwilling to compensate for his shortcomings. While work on the Henschel case was in progress he undertook to conduct negotiations with his British opposite but did not ask the persons who were familiar with the case to accompany him. On two occasions he brought back reports of agreements which were at variance with reports which came to us from the British side. The resulting disagreements were extremely embarrassing."

In testifying before the Ferguson committee, Bronson gave a misleading picture of the results of the work of the decartelization branch. Thus, in December 1948, he told the committee that the decartelization program had reached a point "where it could go in either direction," that no fait accompli had been put over. He made these assertions in the face of known facts that back in March 1948, General Clay had already jettisoned the whole, decartelization program with his famous "rule of reason" theory under which heavy German industry was practically exempted from any decartelization action.

In a letter to the Ferguson committee, dated March 31, 1949, Bronson attempted to defend his record and told the committee that hearings on Bosch, the great auto accessory combine, were being finalized. The record of the Bosch case does not bear this out. Under orders of Clay, he had removed from the Bosch recommendations its vital parts dealing with the planned severance of the Eisemann Co., which was Bosch's chief competitor before it was swallowed up by Bosch in 1924. Bronson ordered Eisemann to remain a part of the Bosch combine. In addition, Bronson, acting under Hawkins' instructions, changed other sections of the Bosch determination order, particularly the patent and foreign subsidiaries parts. The net effect of these changes was to allow Bosch to retain control over its patents and to permit Bosch to reestablish itself as an international cartel.

In connection with Bosch's efforts to regain its international cartel position, Bronson, unofficially, conducted many private conversations with a General Wilson, who was acting as Bosch's representative in Germany, and who was the head of the International Products Trading Co., which the Bosch combine established in Switzerland for the purpose of building up Bosch's foreign exchange, without the embarrassment of submitting their dealings to the scrutiny of military government. The contract signed with Bosch by the IPTC was executed with Bronson's approval after consultation with Hawkins. The Bosch-IPTC contract was a clear violation of military government law 56 of decartelization. It is typical of Bronson's conduct that in discussing this deal between Bosch and Wilson before the Ferguson committee, Bronson expressed annoyance at Wilson for "barging" into his office at all times and "interfering" with the work of the decartelization branch. Notwithstanding the illegality of Bronson's action in pushing through the contract, notwithstanding all of the actions involved in watering down and making the Bosch decartelization ineffective, Bronson informed the Ferguson committee in March 1949, that everything was getting along fine with regard to the decartelization of Bosch.

Bronson's role in furthering the contract between the International Products Trading Corp. and Bosch was prejudicial to United States interests.

In the case of the Siemenswerke, Bronson told the committee that the whole Siemens question was being examined by the United States-United Kingdom Bipartite Board. He accused other witnesses before the committee of not knowing the latest achievements of the Decartelization Branch.

He didn't tell the committee that this was the *n*th time the deconcentration of Siemens, the electrical combine, was being considered and that nothing would come out of this consideration, for the simple reason that he knew that no action against Siemens would be undertaken.

In his statement to the committee, Bronson pointed to the abolition of the business licensing laws of the German State Government as one of his major achievements, but he did not tell the committee that the enforcement of the regulations abolishing licensing was practically nonexistent and that the slight criticism leveled against the German officials was hardly calculated to force these officials to carry out the Military Government policy on licensing.

He pointed to the fact that the Germans were considering fair-trade legislation. Such legislation has yet to be passed. Nowhere does Bronson point to the major failures of military occupation in carrying out the decartelization program. He says nothing about the Henschel case even though he himself had told the committee several months earlier that some action on Henschel was contemplated.

Or take the case of the United Ball Bearing Works—the VKF combine. This was a Swedish affiliate of SKF and represented a virtual monopoly in Germany, with the exception of a small independent concern—Kugellager Fischer. Since the United Ball Bearing Works was a foreign-owned company, Military Government dismantled the Fischer plant as part of the reparations program, thus creating a complete monopoly for VKF.

The decartelization staff, therefore, prepared a series of recommendations for deconcentrating VKF. Under pressure of the Economics Division headed by Wilkinson, all action on VKF was suspended and a solution was offered which consisted of having VKF turn over to Kugellager Fischer some of its obsolete machinery for the production of ball bearings. On specific instructions of Wilkinson, Bronson held off all action to deconcentrate VKF, although this firm would have remained a monopoly within the meaning of law 56 even after the turning over of machines to Fischer. Subsequently, General Clay killed all action on VKF.

The same pattern of action can be discerned in relation to other combines. Bronson would tell his staff one thing and proceed to act in another way behind their backs.

Notwithstanding this record, Bronson had no compunction in telling Creighton Coleman, a member of the decartelization branch, that he knew more about decartelization than anyone else.

The above record speaks for itself. Let the reader judge for himself, too.

More About the Katyn Massacre

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include therein copy of a letter from F. Shackelford, Department Counselor, Department of the Army, to Gov. John Lodge, of Connecticut.

This letter, written on April 21, 1951, deals with a subject which is something of a mystery to the American people. It follows:

APRIL 21, 1951.

Hon. JOHN LODGE,
Governor of Connecticut,
Hartford, Conn.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR LODGE: Your letter of March 12, 1951, to the Secretary of State has been forwarded to the Department of the Army so that we may give you the Army's comments on those portions of the article by Julius Epstein, enclosed with your original letter, which primarily concern the Army.

The Army has been unable to uncover any evidence which indicates the specific person who "locked up" or had custody of this document. I should prefer not to reveal the name of the stenographer to whom Lieutenant Colonel Van Vliet dictated his report since she is naturally upset by the publicity which had been accorded this episode with which she had no connection aside from transcribing the report. However, if you think her name will serve any useful purpose, I shall be glad to furnish it to you, preferably on a confidential basis.

No copies were made or retained of the report apparently for the reason that it was believed to be of primary interest to the State Department alone.

General Bissell has stated as his best recollection that the report was informally passed to Mr. Lyons or Mr. Holmes of the State Department. There is, however, no record of this transaction and if a record was made or if there was a letter of transmittal or a receipt, none of these can be found.

With reference to the documents entitled, "Facts and Documents concerning Polish Prisoners of War Captured by the U. S. S. R. During the 1939 Campaign" and "Supplementary Report on Facts and Documents Concerning the Katyn Massacre," they were given to General Bissell when he was attaché in London by Lieutenant General Kukiel, a member of the Polish Government in London. General Bissell forwarded them by letter dated December 1, 1947 to Gen. Telford Taylor, who at that time was in Europe as Chief of Counsel for War Crimes. General Taylor in turn sent these documents to G–2 on August 4, 1949, just prior to his relief from active duty. These documents were not and never have been classified by the Army, but have been handled on a classified basis because they were labeled "For private circulation only" when received from the Polish Government in London. The confusion in the identity of these documents resulted from careless research and improper labeling of these Polish documents by two civilian employees of the Department of the Army, who have been reprimanded for this carelessness.

If I can be of any further assistance to you in connection with this matter, please do not hesitate to call upon me.

Sincerely yours,

F. SHACKELFORD,
Department Counselor.

The MacArthur Controversy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM BENTON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I was greatly interested to see that two great and influential Catholic periodicals of national circulation, Commonweal and America, have come out in support of the President's policies in the controversy with General MacArthur. The reasoning of these two publications on the MacArthur issue is very cogent, and I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the editorial entitled "The MacArthur Ouster," from the April 21 issue of America, and the editorial entitled "No End in Sight?" from the April 27 issue of the Commonweal.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From America of April 21, 1951]

THE MACARTHUR OUSTER

From almost any angle you look at it, the storm now swirling around General MacArthur is deplorable. What remains of our national unity is in danger of being destroyed by the supercharged lightning flashes of emotion generated by personal and political partisanship. We discern but one hopeful ray in the lightning-riven clouds: if the controversy can be brought under control and carried on calmly on the basis of the issues involved, it may become the last great debate on United States foreign policy

The one Herbert Hoover touched off 6 months ago, apparently settled by the Senate's troops-to-Europe resolution of April 4, dealt largely with our policy for Europe. Our far-eastern policy, or lack of it, was not formally debated in the Senate. The MacArthur incident, for better or worse, has made such a discussion inevitable. We can only hope that it will be productive of a renewed national unity.

Already, as Walter Lippmann observed in the curious case of Senator TAFT, there is confusion as to what General MacArthur meant in his now celebrated letter to Congressman MARTIN. The General, as the columnist pointed out, wanted more than permission to bomb Red China's Manchurian bases and to use the Formosa forces of Chiang Kai-shek against the Chinese mainland. The General wanted permission to wage all-out war against China. Contending that the global conflict with communism has already begun, the General argued that it could be won by defeating Red China. The way to save Europe, he wrote in effect, is to defeat communism in Asia.

That involves an almost complete reversal of our present policy. The United States and its allies have long since decided to concentrate on Europe while diverting the necessary minimum to prevent a Communist sweep in Asia. The fundamental issue is therefore clear-cut. Shall the United States abandon its present efforts to safeguard Europe and devote its resources chiefly to a full-scale war with Red China?

Those who join General MacArthur in an affirmative answer to this fateful question should not overlook these considerations:

1. If we decide to join the issue in Asia, we shall have to go it alone—our Atlantic allies, the Asian-Arab nations and the Latin-Americans will not support us.

2. Attacking China in the belief that the USSR will not come to her aid is not a calculated risk—it is the wildest sort of gamble.

3. Our big strategic bombers, on which we now rely to deter Russia in the West, will be relatively ineffective in China. If we contemplate using them for atomic bombing, let us reflect that such bombing would have little military value, would infuriate all Asia and might invite Russian retaliation. Thus there is no hope of a short and cheap war.

4. Our long-neglected tactical air force is still woefully unready for a major conflict.

5. Even if Russia did not intervene in China, she would be powerfully tempted to take over an almost defenseless Europe, including Britain, acquiring thereby tremendous war-making potential.

6. If we tempt Russia into a war for which we are still unprepared offensively, we shall expose our people to destruction, since our home-defense system, both military and civil, is pitifully incomplete.

7. As the President emphasized in his address to the Nation on April 11, our present policy is designed to avoid world war III. Though it may fail, it furnishes a hope lacking in the MacArthur approach.

If these considerations are put forcibly to the American people, we believe that the last great debate will not be prolonged as its predecessor was, and that our people, finally satisfied that we are on the only course open to us, will then settle down to the supreme task of ensuring their security.

[From the Commonweal of April 27, 1951]

NO END IN SIGHT?

Shortly after General MacArthur was dispossessed of his Pacific command, and while the resulting uproar was still running at high tide throughout the country, the general's supporters gave vent to their anger by badgering the President, demanding to know what he planned to do next in Korea now that he had removed MacArthur, who had become, in the eyes of many American newspaper readers, the paternal and protective figure of anti-Communist law and order in the Far East. It was a troublesome question to ask Mr. Truman because, as everyone knew, there appeared to be no end in sight for the war in Korea. It seemed then, as it still does, that things might go on there forever as they are now, with the Chinese feeding battalions of Asiatic manpower to the waiting muzzles of UN guns and with neither side able to accomplish its objective; under these conditions the United Nations would be unable to restore order and establish the conditions of political independence throughout the whole of Korea, while the Chinese would be unable to push us off the peninsula. General MacArthur, so his followers argued, at least had an end in view; he was willing to extend the Korean War to the rest of Asia and fight the showdown battle there.

Behind the general's reasoning in this matter was his opinion that "the Communist conspirators have elected to make their play for global conquest" on the battlefields of Asia, and we should, therefore, "join the issue thus raised" in Asia. To the President and his military advisers this advice of MacArthur's was, and is, highly questionable because they feel that at this time Asia is really the secondary front and is being used by Russia as a deliberate decoy; an examination of the broader issues involved in the Korean war leads one to understand the very sound reasoning which compelled the President to reject MacArthur's view.

Like the Berlin blockade and the recent war in Greece, the Korean war has, of course, to be looked at as a local incident in a geographic sense only; in every other way it is an international affair, one episode in the over-all struggle between the Soviets and the free world. There is, really, no permanent solution to the Korean war on a local level; there may be a local victory or a stalemate, as there was in Berlin and in Greece, but the underlying and all-pervading world tension will not be dissolved by this local decision alone, any more than it was dissolved by what happened in Berlin and in Greece.

CORE OF HOPE

It is necessary, then, to keep an over-all strategy in mind at all times and not to let any one local incident get out of hand and distract attention from that strategy. Our over-all plan, worked out over the past 5 years, is largely based on a serious weakness in Russia's ability to wage a world war against the West: That weakness is her lack of sufficient supplies of two of the most vital raw materials of war—steel and oil. The western plan is to do everything possible to keep Russia weak in those commodities as long as we can and to build up our strength in the meantime to such a point that the Soviets will not risk a world war.

Now Russia can get both oil and steel when she wants them in neighboring countries, and it so happens that to do this the Soviet military machine will have to face westward, because the oil is in Iran and the steel is in the German Ruhr. But here the West holds the trump cards at the moment. Because of the Atlantic Treaty alliance of nations, we have—or we will have in coming months, if the Atlantic preparations go forward speedily—air bases in Europe and in the Mediterranean from which we could, in the event of a world war, blast the oil fields, the Ruhr, and, most important of all, the faulty lines of rail and road communications between these points and Russia, thus denying the Soviets the very steel and oil supplies they would be seeking.

Since it is quite obvious that what the Soviets need and want most of all at this time lies in the European sphere and not in the Far East, the administration, in the interests of concentrating our defensive strength in the West where it is needed most, has based its foreign policy primarily on the Atlantic Treaty, hoping to preserve the hard core of our defense and of our striking power in Europe and in the Near East, and hoping at the same time to cripple Russia's ability, in terms of oil and steel, to wage a world war. Our intention is in this way to forestall a world war altogether by making it too great a risk for Russia to take.

THE GREAT DECISION

We know now that General MacArthur did not approve of this strategic plan; under his command, the local aspect of the Korean war was getting out of hand, so far, at least, as our over-all strategy was concerned. MacArthur's policy would have meant diverting much more of our power to Asia, a diversion which, in the minds of the President's military advisers, would have left us desperately weak in Europe and in the Mediterranean, consequently making it immeasurably easier for Russia to move against Iran and Germany in quest of the oil and steel with which she might eventually wage total war against us. Russia would then have won the great advantage of having secured the resources she needs while spreading our defenses thin around the world, and we in turn would have committed the blunder of not having concentrated our power in the one most decisive theater of war.

Such, in its broadest scope, is the background of the present dispute between General MacArthur and the Government; this is also the background of the recent foreign-policy debate, set off by the Republicans, on the question of whether or not to make Europe the first line of defense. In Korea, the administration itself created the foreign-policy issue anew for the Republicans because it had a hard but necessary decision to make: It had to limit the war to Korea, whatever the military disadvantages, in order to preserve our over-all strategic plan for resisting Russian world conquest.

It was a hard decision to make because in local terms there is no end to the fighting in sight. But that does not mean that we are not working toward any end at all; as in Berlin and Greece, if we hold on resolutely in Korea, we may very well force the Soviets and the Chinese to come to terms, because where global strategy is concerned we will have held tight to our bargaining advantages. We will, in other words, have forced the Soviets to negotiate or to give up the fight, as they have done before, because they will have been maneuvered into too dangerous a position, as they have been before.

NOT INEVITABLE

If, as an end to the war in Korea, we look on this prospect as a distant end indeed, it is only because we have forgotten, or never fully realized, what we have given lip service to, which is, that the struggle against Soviet communism will be a long and terribly hard thing for all of us, whether we believe in the insanity of an aggressive, atomic massacre or a steady and strong resistance combining all the spiritual, military and material resources we have, in the hope that a nonviolent solution can in time be found.

It may be that our hope of averting world war III by limiting the war in Korea will not prove successful. That is something that is not entirely up to us. After all, what we are trying to do in Korea is an extraordinarily difficult and delicate job; we are trying to defend the moral principle of collective security against unlawful aggression without provoking an atomic war. In this regard we believe it is utterly misleading to say, as Senator TAFT said the other day, that [Mr. Truman] "has involved us in a major war which today has no purpose whatsoever." We do not agree with the Senator that an inviolable moral right—the right of collective security—can be worth fighting for in June but is not worth fighting for in April.

The war in Korea must, then, be seen as part of our over-all foreign policy, which is designed with a very definite end in mind: and that is, to forestall world war III, without abandoning our moral rights and without appeasing Russia; we are trying to do this by concentrating our power at the point of maximum effectiveness in Europe, while at the same time upholding the moral framework in the United Nations in Korea.

No one can absolutely guarantee the success of this or any other foreign policy in meeting the complex and crushing situation facing us now, but certainly the present policy is the most reasonable one open to us and the best hope of maintaining the peace; as Pius XII said only recently, we need to remember that "nothing is lost by peace, everything can be lost by war."

And that, in the last analysis, is what all the MacArthur controversy comes down to. To have taken the general's advice about using "maximum counterforce" in China would have led almost inevitably to world war III, whatever he may say now about limited measures and limited risk. To Mr. Truman and his advisers, world war III is not inevitable and so they have decided to limit the war in Asia, hoping to limit war everywhere while we still have the chance to do so by following resolutely the strategy decided upon.

We support the President wholeheartedly.

Four Hundred Reds Needle Vets To Stir Riots

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I offer for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement appearing in the Detroit Times, Detroit, Mich., of August 29, 1949, showing conclusively the design and technique of the Communists to destroy our country and way of life. Here a former Communist, John T. Pace, tells the story in unmistakable language which everyone can understand:

HOW 7,000 BONUS MARCHERS WERE DUPED: 400 REDS NEEDLE VETS TO STIR RIOTS

(By Howard Rushmore)

CENTERVILLE, TENN., August 29.—Hoping for bloodshed and violence, the Communist Party agents working within the ranks of the bonus marchers used every Red Fascist trick to get President Hoover to call out the army in 1932.

And when he did and General MacArthur put down the Communist bid for revolution without firing a shot, Red Fascist wrath was directed against these two great Americans—a raging "smear" campaign that has lasted for almost two decades.

John T. Pace, now a deputy sheriff in this quiet Tennessee town, but in 1932 a Communist leader of the left-wing section of the bonus march, said:

"I was told over and over again how much Stalin was interested in this campaign."

The ex-Communist, after recalling he arrived in Washington in June as leader of 1,000 veterans from the Middle West, said:

"Although I had been named by the Communist Party as leader of the left-wing group, I did not make a move without consulting Emmanuel Levine.

"Even before I lead the marchers into Washington, I had been told by my Communist superiors that Levine was the boss.

"The first day I arrived in the Capital, I was told to report to Levine in a secret office he kept in the city. I was given ample funds for cabs and other expenses."

REVOLUTION THE AIM

"Levine, a veteran Communist agitator, told me Moscow regarded this bonus march as a real propaganda opportunity to bring about revolt and hatred against President Hoover.

"Levine said the 'veterans have some Fascist misleaders who don't want violence—your job is to keep them stirred up and our party must take over.'"

Pace said a Communist International representative in New York was in daily touch with Levine and that Levine told Pace:

"Here's your chance of making a name for yourself with Stalin."

According to Pace, Levine kept a scrapbook of newspaper stories and photographs of all Communist rioting. Said Pace:

"The scrapbook was a record of our agitation and was sent to Moscow to show Stalin what we had done.

"We had only about 400 Communists among 7,000 veterans, but we controlled every action.

"Two hundred Communist from New York, some veterans, joined us. At Levine's command, I led a delegation of several hundred Reds down Pennsylvania Avenue to seize an abandoned Government building near the Capitol."

PROVOKE THE COPS

"Under Levine's direction, we planned this seizure carefully. We knew that it was illegal but, when I brought up this point, Levine said 'we'll provoke the cops and get some action.'"

"What kind of action?" I asked.

"He looked at me sternly and said, 'Comrade Pace, in every revolution some workers must die.'

"Levine said the 'CI rep' (meaning the Moscow agent in New York) wanted violence because President Hoover would then be forced to call out the Army.

"Once the Army steps in, we'll have a full-scale revolution going," Levine told me. "That will provide excellent propaganda against Hoover and we can agitate from coast to coast and recruit thousands of veterans to the party."

After Pace's group had seized the Government building, Levine told Pace to lead marchers into areas which had been ruled "out of bounds" by police.

These areas invaded by the Reds included the White House.

Pace continued:

"Levine instructed me: 'Keep picket lines around the White House. Make speeches denouncing Hoover. Get yourself arrested. It will all make good publicity.'"

INSPIRED VIOLENCE

Meanwhile, Pace kept in touch with his subordinates in the ranks of the Red section of the "Bonus Expeditionary Force," as it was called. He said:

"We sent Communists into Anacostia flats where several thousand legitimate veterans, led by W. W. Waters, an anti-Red, were camped.

"They did not want violence, so Levine told me to provoke it. I sent Communists into their ranks with orders to throw bricks at cops and even at our own Red marchers to provoke trouble.

"Waters didn't fall for our Communist tactics, but we did succeed in bringing over several hundred of the legitimate veterans to our building. We recruited some of them into the party."

Pace said Levine also ordered continuous propaganda among the veterans "about the Soviet rule and how the Red army was the best army in the world."

Parades, demonstrations, and minor riots were organized each day, Pace said, and added:

AT WHITE HOUSE

"The Communists drew up a program that ran like clockwork. So many were to be arrested each day. We were to defy police efforts to evict us from the buildings we had seized.

"I led demonstrators in front of the White House and, after the police had warned me a dozen times, I was arrested.

"Levine had told me such an arrest could also be utilized for propaganda. I spent 6 weeks in jail and the Communists stirred up a national campaign of martyrdom on my behalf.

"I was in jail when General MacArthur drove the Reds out of the Government buildings, but word was sent to me through Communist agents that the Moscow 'rep' was proud of me and would meet me in New York when I was released."

MacArthur's Forthright Testimony

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I believe that every patriotic American can fully agree with the views expressed by David Lawrence in the New York Herald Tribune of May 7, 1951. Under leave to extend, I am inserting Mr. Lawrence's remarks:

MACARTHUR TESTIMONY CALLED ANSWER TO CHARGES OF CRITICS

(By David Lawrence)

WASHINGTON, May 6.—A breath of fresh air has swept across the country in the person of a man who, without bitterness or rancor, rises above the petty and the irrelevant to state honestly his convictions on a highly controversial subject of national policy.

What General MacArthur has accomplished by his 3 days of testimony and by his ready submission to cross-examination is to put the whole question of our military policy in a true perspective.

Not a word of resentment did he express against the President or any one else. He brushed aside with a simple statement of facts the many misrepresentations of his position which critics have flung at him.

Nobody can truly claim the right to state General MacArthur's position hereafter unless he has read the 150,000 words of testimony covering the three days of hearings.

STATES WHAT HE BELIEVES

This correspondent has read every word of it and is amazed at the number of things that have been written about the general or his proposals which simply are not true. The atmosphere here is so surcharged with political tactics and with the polemics of partisanship that it is refreshing to find a spokesman who, without regard to how his remarks jibe with the speeches of Republican or Democratic leaders, in the "great debate" of recent weeks, states with candor and frankness what he really believes.

People may differ as to whether he has the right proposals and whether they should be adopted but, after reading the testimony, one is more puzzled than ever that the President should have listened to the smears of the "palace guard" and tried to destroy the reputation of one of the world's greatest soldiers, if not one of her most dynamic statesmen.

The same man who wrote out in longhand on his plane the historic speech to Congress and then read it without glasses, the same man who, though 71 years of age, sat for 9 hours a day for three successive days and faced a barrage of questions from the Senate's best interrogators won spontaneous praise from Republicans and Democrats in the committee. The tribute by Senator RUSSELL, of Georgia, Democrat, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, at the end of the final session on Saturday, is significant. He said:

"General MacArthur, I wish to state to you that the 3 days that you have been here with us are without parallel in my legislative experience. I have never seen a man subjected to such a barrage of questions in so many fields and on so many varied subjects. I marvel at your physical endurance. More than that, I have been profoundly impressed by the vastness of your patience and the thoroughness and the frankness with which you have answered all of the questions that have been propounded."

TRIBUTE TO MAC ARTHUR

"We have certainly drawn freely on your vast reservoir of knowledge and experience, not only as a great military captain, but as a civilian administrator of 80,000,000 people."

One wonders how such a man could have been summarily dismissed. One finds nowhere in the official record the slightest evidence that he disobeyed a military command or failed to fulfill the highest traditions of our military service. One wonders if President Truman will not be inspired when he has read all the testimony to show the same courage that he showed when he apologized to the Marines for an intemperate remark. For the instinct to redress a wrong is the mark of courage and spiritual understanding. General MacArthur cannot be restored to his command, of course, but the unworthy manner by which he was abruptly relieved can still be expunged from the record by an act of Christian atonement.

Communist Smear of General MacArthur Bonus March—Leader Exposes Red Smear

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include therein excerpts from the Detroit Times, Detroit, Mich., of August 29, 1949, containing a statement of the deliberate and well-planned smear by the Communists of former President Hoover and General MacArthur.

Every American should read the Communist technique used to divide and conquer America.

The excerpts follow:

BONUS MARCH LEADER EXPOSES RED SMEAR OF HOOVER

(By Howard Rushmore)

CENTERVILLE, TENN., August 27.—A 17-year-old smear campaign against former President Hoover and General MacArthur today was branded a Communist plot by the one man in the United States who knows the complete inside story.

He is John T. Pace, soft-spoken native of Tennessee hill country who was commended by the Communist International for his revolutionary leadership of the bonus march on Washington in 1932. He was a Detroiter at the time.

It was Pace, a secret Communist Party member, who was assigned by Moscow to whip up a propaganda campaign of hatred against Mr. Hoover and General MacArthur after the march had ended.

Using the technique of the "big lie" long before Hitler and Goebels copied the device for Nazi purposes, the Communists accused Mr. Hoover, our only living ex-President, and General MacArthur of killing World War I veterans.

Pace, a wiry little man who twice was arrested for his inciting to riot during the days of the bonus expeditionary force, is now a solid citizen of this drowsy little community.

NOW DEPUTY SHERIFF

He is a deputy sheriff, hard-working farmer, and chairman of the Americanism department of the American Legion in the county.

Pace is no longer a Communist. He quit communism 3 years after the bonus march and since that time has battled the Reds as zealously as he once served their cause. He says:

"I feel responsible, in part, for this often-repeated lie about Hoover and General MacArthur.

"I've never told this story before, but I think it's about time, and the only reward I want is the knowledge all veterans and everyone will know the truth about two great Americans.

"I led the left-wing or Communist section of the bonus march.

"It was ordered by my Red superiors to provoke riots.

WANTED BLOODSHED

"I was told to use every trick to bring about bloodshed in the hopes that Hoover would be forced to call out the Army.

"The Communists didn't care how many veterans were killed.

"I was told Moscow had ordered riots and bloodshed in hopes that this might set off the revolution.

"My Communist bosses were jumping for joy on July 28 when Washington police killed one veteran.

"The Army was called out the next day by President Hoover and didn't fire a shot or kill a man. General MacArthur put down a Moscow-directed revolution without bloodshed and that's why the Communists hate him even today."

Before Pace and the Communists moved in on the "BEF" at Anacostia Flats along the Potomac, the "bonus march" was an effort by American veterans to win what they considered just and reasonable demands.

Later Pace continues:

"When the bonus march first started, the Communist Party's official line was to ignore it."

IN DETROIT THEN

"I was in Detroit when the movement first spread. I had moved there a few years before from Tennessee and joined the Communist Party in 1931.

"In those years, the party's national membership was about 3,000, most of them aliens.

"Because I was a native American of old southern stock, the Reds jumped at recruiting me when I fell for their line about the Communists being able to solve the depression problems.

"Early in 1932 when veterans started their demands for a bonus, the Communists sneered at them and called them reactionary.

"However, when the veterans in Wayne County scheduled a bonus march on city hall, the district committee of the Communist party called an emergency meeting to discuss the situation.

"I was a member of the district committee and I agreed the Communists should infiltrate the veterans and take over the campaign.

"Some of the other Reds were against this plan, arguing that the veterans were 'Fascists.'"

REDS LEAD MARCH

"However, five of us were given permission to take part in the legitimate veterans' demonstration at city hall.

"We five Communists took over the march and I made a speech at city hall, urging all veterans to register for a bonus march on Washington.

"More than 400 signed up. I was named the commander of the march.

"The Detroit Communists were jubilant at my success and wired national headquarters in New York for further orders.

"The answer came back for me to lead the veterans to Cleveland where the party would have other delegations ready.

"I was to report by long distance phone to a secret number in Washington to 'Comrade Levine.'

"I was given a pocketful of money and told to go ahead.

"So about 500 Michigan veterans under the leadership of five well-heeled Communists took over a freight train and headed East.

"The Communist Trojan horse of the bonus march was on the move."

MACARTHUR CITES SERVICE IN EXPOSE OF SMEAR

Informed that The Detroit Times was exposing the 17-year-old Communist "smear" directed against him, Gen. MacArthur today cabled from his Tokyo headquarters:

"I shall read the projected articles with much interest. Any action taken to tear down the facade of communistic hypocrisy and expose the insidiousness of its smear technique and viciously false propaganda is a distinct service to the American people.

"GENERAL MACARTHUR,
"Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers."

A Man's Word

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. OREN HARRIS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, there are times in the history of any people when their security, survival, and actual existence are tested in every phase of their lives. The strength of a nation is determined by the true characteristics of its people. The moral and ethical code is recognized as the characteristic which gives strength to us as a Nation and people.

In these trying and troublesome days, it is only appropriate that we as a Nation and people strengthen our moral and spiritual life as we emphasize more and more the importance of the character of our people and the high standards we must maintain as a Nation. We are reminded more and more that our basis of strength and existence had its origin with those qualities of the founders of this Nation.

A striking and impressive discussion on one of these truly traditional characteristics was given by Col. T. H. Barton, chairman of the board of the Lion Oil Co., in a recent issue of that company's monthly publication. As this message is so appropriate and realistic in our personal and national life, under unanimous consent, I include in in the RECORD as a part of my remarks:

A MAN'S WORD

"His word is as good as his bond." Back in grandpa's day that was an oft-heard phrase. It described a man of good reputation—a man whose integrity and moral rectitude were unquestioned—a man of stature in the matter of personal ethics.

It was not unusual in grandpa's day for two men of good reputation to close an important business deal on the strength of a clearly stated, verbal understanding of each man's responsibilities. In those days a firm handshake and the momentary meeting of two pairs of level eyes cemented a contract more firmly than any written document ever devised.

How often do we hear that phrase applied today? Seldom, if ever, I daresay. It seems that the "positive" phrase, affirming man's integrity, has given way to a "negative" phrase of admonition. Who, today, has not been advised always to "read the small print" in a legal paper?

I deem this trend from "positive" affirmation to "negative" admonition as significant and dangerous. The trend is significant because it denotes a departure from the sound ethical standards of grandpa's time which indicates, in turn, a weakening of our individual sense of moral code.

Such a change is dangerous because the weakening or dissolution of the moral or ethical fiber of a man or a nation can lead only to destruction. Read your history books and learn for yourselves what happened to the Roman, Greek, and other great civilizations when the people of those nations became morally corrupt.

We are living in an age of great confusion and uncertainty, but there have been many such eras in the world's history. Wars and economic upsets have come and gone and will come and go again and again. New wonders of science will continue to alter the pattern of our lives, as they have in the past. These things are not too important in the over-all scheme of things. It is important that we realize this one fact: If we, the people of America, hope to survive and to maintain our position as the most advanced nation in all history, we must never for any reason permit a degeneration of our individual integrity or a weakening in any manner of our standard of natonal ethics. Our standard of ethics, based on Christian morality, and as practiced individually and collectively, is the strong fiber from which all of our success as a nation and as a people has been woven.

Let the ethical standard—our morality—deteriorate and our Nation will come apart at the seams just as surely as the Kingdom of Judah disintegrated thousands of years ago when it failed to heed the same warning that rings in our ears today.

Let each of us cast from our mind the idea that success depends on "reading the small print" and return again to grandpa's standard of judging our fellow man and of living our lives on the basis of a man "whose word is his bond."

Let us resolve collectively, that the ethical stature of our Nation shall be strong and sound in the eyes of the rest of the world, to the end that, through our Nation and its example, peace and happiness shall prevail on this earth.

Moscow Thanks Bonuseer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein a statement appearing in the Detroit Times, Detroit, Mich., of August 30, 1949.

For the first time in two decades a former Communist, who was a leader in the bonus march on Washington, tells the inside story of this Moscow-inspired incident.

Let every American read this confession of this former Communist leader of the delegation from Detroit, Mich., which made up a part of the bonus march. After doing so, he will understand the design of Russia, even before we recognized that government, to divide and destroy the United States.

The article follows:

MOSCOW THANKS BONUSEER

(By Howard Rushmore)

CENTERVILLE, TENN., August 30.—The current Communist "smear" of former President Hoover and General MacArthur—an attack echoed by New Dealers, pinks, and Russia-firsters for 17 years—originated in a secret Red meeting near Union Square in New York City in August 1932.

At that meeting, the leader of the left-wing section of the bonus march was complimented for his successful "revolutionary activities" by the representatives of the Communist International.

And this veterans' leader was then sent by Stalin's agent on a well-financed national tour to spread hatred against Hoover and General MacArthur.

IN JAIL DURING RIOT

John T. Pace, now a deputy sheriff and a violent foe of the Communist Party since he quit the subversive group in 1935, tells for the first time of this Moscow-directed smear.

In an exclusive interview, the former Communist said:

"I was in jail when the other Communists deliberately led a riot against the Washington police who attempted to evict them from a Government building they had seized.

"From other Communists I learned that the Reds had thrown bricks at the cops, used clubs on them and, in self-defense, the police fired, killing one veteran who, ironically, wasn't a Communist.

"Then President Hoover ordered out the Army and told General MacArthur to drive the Reds out of the building and back to Anacostia Flats."

Pace said that before he had been arrested, Emmanuel Levine, his Red boss, had declared:

"We want the President to call out the Army—then we'll have a real revolution going."

PLANS ARE UPSET

"But MacArthur did the job without firing a shot and, acting under Mr. Hoover's instructions, prevented any violence," Pace recalled.

"That sent the Communists at each other's throats, for our orders had been to provoke all the violence possible."

Pace, immediately after he was freed, was ordered to New York. He said:

"I was told to come to an address near Union Square. It was a highly secret meeting and plenty of the big-shot Communists were there, including Browder, Foster, and Stachel."

(Earl Browder, former secretary of the Communist Party, William Z. Foster, present chairman of the Reds; and Jacob Stachel, now educational director of the Communist Party.)

PRAISED BY HIGHER UP

"Levine and I made reports on the bonus march and our work in Washington," Pace continued.

"Then a squat, dark-haired man was introduced to us as the 'CI rep' (Communist international representative).

"This man complimented me for my work. Speaking with a thick Russian accent, he said Moscow was pleased with my working-class leadership.

"He told me that CI wanted me to make a national tour, speaking in every State to agitate against President Hoover and General MacArthur.

"This Moscow agent said I was to refer to Mr. Hoover as 'the murderer of American veterans' and MacArthur as 'the tool of the Fascists.'"

Pace said he had no doubt of the "CI rep's" influence, for Foster, Browder, and the rest of the big shots were scared to death of him and kept saying "Yes; comrade" and almost bowed to him.

The Moscow agent, Pace added, told him to stress the fact that the troops had been responsible for killing veterans.

"I knew that MacArthur's men didn't fire a shot, but I had at least one commissar with me during all my speaking tour to see that I followed instructions," Pace said.

"The 'CI rep' also told the party leaders to arrange my speaking tour under the auspices of the Workers' Ex-Servicemen's League, a Communist front group."

CLEVELAND MEETING

Pace said he made the tour and arranged for a convention of Red veterans in Cleveland that fall. He continued:

"Almost every day I received instructions from New York to call Mr. Hoover and General MacArthur every name in the book.

"The list of names ranged from 'Fascist murderers' to 'Wall Street butchers' and some unprintable ones.

"The Communist press joined in the campaign. Hundreds of thousands of pieces of literature against President Hoover and MacArthur echoed the line of the 'CI rep.'

"I have never seen such an active smear and even at the time a devoted Communist, I got a little sick of the lies that appeared in this propaganda."

ORGANIZES NEW MARCH

At party orders, Pace called a convention of the league in Cleveland that fall and organized a second bonus march on Washington, under complete Communist control.

"This failed miserably but it carried out the smear of Mr. Hoover and MacArthur," Pace said.

"However, Communist leaders told me the campaign was successful.

"They were happy when the parlor pinks took up the smear against the two great Americans and even today the Reds boast that the propaganda drive of 1932 carried on by the Communists turned the Nation against Mr. Hoover."

BACKS HOOVER ACTION

Now active in the American Legion and a speaker before dozens of patriotic groups, Pace said:

"On the basis of my personal experience, I want to repeat again and again that Mr. Hoover took the only step he could have taken to avert a bloody revolution right here in Washington.

"And General MacArthur, by evicting the Reds without firing a shot, took the wind out of the Red propagandists who had ordered me to provoke bloodshed and violence.

"Even today we find such prominent persons as Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt echoing the old Communist propaganda against these two great Americans.

OUTSMARTED REDS

"It's about time Americans examined the facts. And the facts are that both President Hoover and General MacArthur outsmarted the Communists and the Reds have never forgiven them."

Pace, who quit the Communist Party in 1935 while living in Detroit, said he was "willing at any time to repeat my story" to any "group of Americans who value truth above character assassination."

"And don't forget," he added, "Lenin, leader of the Russian revolution, told Communists 30 years ago to use the lie whenever necessary as long as it helped the Red cause.

"Mr. Hoover and General MacArthur have been victims of a highly organized, well financed Communist lie for 17 years.

"I hope my story gives them benefit of the truth."

Constitutional

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE P. MILLER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 23, 1951

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, a group of political-science teachers who reside in Berkeley, Calif., have had the courage to speak out on the subject of General MacArthur's removal.

Their joint statement makes sense. I urge my colleagues to read it and ponder over what they have to say.

CONSTITUTIONAL

EDITOR: It is General MacArthur, not President Truman, whose actions have imperiled the basis of our constitutional system. The Declaration of Independence, in listing its complaints against George III, contains these words: "He has affected to make the military independent of and superior to the civil power." That was one of the issues which made our forefathers decide to create a new Nation and organize a new system of government. The Constitution of the United States, over whose drafting George Washington presided, declares with unmistakable clarity that the President is Commander in Chief. All military officers swear an oath of allegiance to the Constitution, which automatically requires their obedience to the directives of the President. To argue for or to act upon any other view is to be subversive of the Constitution. Policy in international relations is determined in our country by the officials whom the people elect and send to the Congress and to the White House. It is not to be determined by Army, Navy, or Air Force commanders.

This principle holds good irrespective of the party in power for the time being. It would apply with the same force if the President were a Republican and a military field commander were a partisan of the Democrats. Indeed, it was precisely this situation which confronted Abraham Lincoln, and he met it in precisely the same manner. To hold otherwise is to lay this Republic open to the dangers of Caesarism, and to discard 25 centuries of political experience in the Western World. We, the undersigned teachers of political science, including both Republicans and Democrats, stand by this fundamental principle of democracy and of the Constitution: that civilian authority must always be paramount over military authority. Considering the facts that are of public record, we think that the President, who has sworn in his oath of office to uphold the Constitution, was left with no alternative but to dismiss General MacArthur.

Korean Policies Must Be Reckoned in the Lives and Shattered Bodies of Our Young Men

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the Washington Evening Star on Saturday, May 5, presented a strong editorial on the General MacArthur case. I commend it to all Members:

GENERAL MACARTHUR'S CASE

Two days of testimony by General MacArthur point to one conclusion—the hearings are not going to end in a clear-cut decision, one way or the other, in the dispute over our Korean policy.

The controversy has boiled down to a difference of opinion. And the conflict of opinion revolves primarily around the question of Soviet intentions. Since the parties to the dispute do not know what the Russians intend to do, the prospect is that the Senate hearings will be inconclusive. When they are over the people will not know a great deal more than they did before, and there is little likelihood that many minds will have been changed by the arguments, pro or con.

This is not to say, however, that the hearings have accomplished nothing. They have served to clarify General MacArthur's real position, and as they progress it is to be expected that other points of view, notably that of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, will be brought into sharper focus. This, at least, will be some gain.

General MacArthur has effectively disposed of the petty snipers who have been taking pot shots at him. He is not the comic-opera strategist that they have tried to picture him as being.

General MacArthur begins with one central, undeniable fact: We are at war in Korea. American boys, and boys of other nationalities, are being killed and wounded there every day. If the fighting is to drag on inconclusively many thousands more will forfeit their lives. So General MacArthur wants to try to end the fighting. He wants to use all, not just a fraction, of the military power at our command to this end.

The risks? He agrees that there are risks. He thinks that Red China is already fully committed in Korea, and can do no more damage there. He concedes that to attack bases in Manchuria, or to blockade Chinese ports, might bring the Russians into the war. But that risk, as he correctly points out, was inherent in our decision to go into Korea. We assumed that risk then, and General MacArthur believes it is both morally and militarily wrong to sacrifice the lives of thousands of young men in an effort to avoid that risk, or to minimize it, now.

He thinks we are faced with one of two situations. If the Russians have not decided upon war with the west, a full-scale effort to win the Korean war is not going to bring them into the conflict. On the other hand, if the Russians have decided upon war, an attack on Chinese bases might speed up the Soviet timetable and bring them openly into the struggle a little sooner. General MacArthur balances the risks, and says he would take that gamble in an effort—which he believes would be successful—to bring the Korean war to a speedy conclusion. In summary, he does not believe we should let the fear of a possible bigger war keep us from fighting and winning the savage, bloody war that we are already in. That is an attitude which makes sense.

General MacArthur also disposed of some of the ridiculous charges that his armchair critics have brought against him.

His objective in using all of the means at our disposal to end the Korean war would be to drive the aggressor from Korea and discourage him from renewing his aggression. He believes that we have the military power now to do this—that by bombing, blockade, etc., we can so cripple the Chinese capacity to wage war in Korea that the Communists will have to get out of that country and stay out. He emphatically repudiates any thought of invading and conquering China. That is the bugaboo that is raised by his critics whenever an attack on Manchurian bases is proposed. But there is all the difference in the world between ending the aggression in Korea and conquering China. And General MacArthur has made it clear that what he advocates is the former; that he is wholly opposed to any such scatter-brained undertaking as the latter. And why is not that position sound? If we can fight a limited war to hold a bloody line somewhere in Korea, why can we not fight a limited war to make it impossible for the enemy to stay anywhere in Korea? Because the Russians might come in? Which is better—to take that risk, or to accept the certainty of scores of thousands of additional casualties in an indefinite stalemate?

General MacArthur then amplified his views with respect to the use of Chiang Kai-shek's troops on Formosa. His use of this force would be a limited one. He thinks it would serve as a threat to the enemy, and that it might be used for diversionary purposes—to take pressure off the UN troops in Korea. He does not contend that it could defeat the Communists if put ashore on the mainland, and he thinks the Nationalist Chinese commanders should decide in what ways their troops can be most effectively employed. But if General MacArthur had his way, they would be used. In one way or another, the troops on Formosa would contribute what they can to the common fight against the common enemy. And why not?

The general, in his 2 days on the witness stand, has not gone unchallenged. For the most part he successfully met the critical questions. He has disavowed any intention of slighting Europe to fight in Asia. Instead, he says that we must be prepared to meet and turn back the threat of communism wherever it appears.

It was in this connection that Senator MCMAHON, of Connecticut, asked the $64 question—the only critical question that makes much sense. Senator MCMAHON's view is that we are not ready for war with Russia, but that by 1953 we will be ready. The Senator thinks that if the Russians should attack soon, our casualties—both military and civilian—would greatly exceed any losses which may be incurred in a continuing limited war in Korea. And he wanted to know whether General MacArthur believes that continuance of the Korean war on its present scale is justified as a means of buying time.

In substance, General MacArthur's answer was that he would accept that risk, that the urgency of winning the war in Korea and stopping the slaughter there—a slaughter that otherwise is certain to go on—justifies us in assuming the risk that the Russians may attack, although he does not think they would do so merely because we stepped up the scale of the Korean fight.

This doctrine of buying time by pulling our punches in Korea is one that should be given a little thought.

The big hole in it is the assumption that the Russians, if they have decided that war must be the eventual arbiter, would let us have the necessary time even if we were to abandon Korea entirely. But assuming for the sake of discussion that the Russians have not decided upon war, or that they might be foolish enough to wait until we are armed to the teeth in 1953, there still is something to be said about this doctrine.

If we actually are buying time in Korea, we are paying a terrible price for that time. It is a price that must be reckoned, not in dollars, but in the lives and shattered bodies of our young men. Perhaps it is necessary to pay this price. Because we have been fools in recent years, because we have recklessly neglected our military arm despite the clearly revealed hostile intentions of the Russians, it may be necessary to ask American boys to give up their lives in Korea while we retrieve our blunders. But if this is the case, if this is true, we should be striving day and night to close the gap, to make up the lost ground in the arms race. But we are not doing that. Nobody in this country is being required to sacrifice much, if anything. Labor walks out on the mobilization program, and does not come back until it gets what it wants. Businessmen gather their record-breaking profits. The politicians continue to play the political game—if anything, with a greater vengeance than before. If we are really buying time with the Korean war, we are not using that time to the best advantage. We are wasting the precious hours that are being bought with the lives of the young men on the firing line. And that, in the simplest language, is a crime—a crime that should lie heavily upon our conscience.

Increases in Natural-Gas Rates

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement prepared by me relating to the increased rates for natural gas in Wisconsin and two editorials from the Milwaukee Journal on the same subject.

There being no objection, the statement and editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILEY

I have before me two editorials from the Milwaukee Journal on the critical subject of Public knowledge of the details of congressional business, and of the personalities involved, can be a great force toward raising the level of competence among Congressmen and the decisions they make.

The overwhelming argument in favor of televising Congress is this: pepole will take a far greater interest in their Government—and have a far greater understanding of public issues.

Did you know that the total number of eligible citizens who vote today in congressional elections (between Presidential years) is only about 40 percent of the voting population?

COULD BRING OUT THE VOTE

In the 1950 congressional elections, only 42,324,232 out of 98,641,000 voted. Even Presidential elections bring out only a little over 50 percent. A recent survey showed why: 62 percent of all nonvoters complained they did not know the candidates well enough to make a choice.

But our 100 television stations and 3,000 radio stations could bring Congress t practically every one of our 45,000,000 families.

One wise political columnist says that the next President of the United States will be the man whom the public judges best fit—after watching him on TV.

For the first time in our history, every American may soon have a chance to watch or hear his Government at work. A whole nation may sit in the galleries of its own Congress.

Third Anniversary of the Founding of the State of Israel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. IRVING M. IVES

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the text of two addresses delivered last night by the distinguished senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON] and myself at the celebration of the third anniversary of the founding of the State of Israel, at Carnegie Hall, in New York City, May 6, 1951.

There being no objection, the addresses were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY SENATOR IRVING M. IVES

It is an honor to be with you at this celebration of the third anniversary of the State of Israel. I was also privileged to be with you at the first and second commemorations. I no longer consider myself a guest, but rather a confirmed participant in a historic event, in the shaping and bringing to life of which I took part.

Americans feel a deep kinship with Israel. It is true that many States have gained their independence in recent years with the moral and material assistance of the United States. Even now American soldiers are shedding their blood to protect one of these states from aggression and to preserve its independence. Yet, none of these new nations is so intimately related to America in common ideals as is Israel.

The dream of restoring the ancient land of Israel to the dispersed, homeless, and persecuted Jews had challenged the imagination of Americans for many generations. Our statesmen, reflecting the mind of America, advocated the restoration of the Jewish Nation and encouraged those who toiled for the realization of that great dream. American diplomacy and American technology and American resources contributed a major share to the mighty task of creating and developing the proud Republic of Israel. It is only natural, therefore, that we look with keen satisfaction upon the amazing progress achieved by the Jewish people in the cherished land of their fathers.

When we think of Israel, our minds turn to the Holy Bible and to the prophets of that ancient land which provided the world with the never-failing bulwarks of faith and morality. The Jewish religion which is based on the dignity and equality of man was the forerunner of the modern doctrine of the inalienability of human rights and indeed of liberty itself.

Today these great spiritual fountainheads from which spring the common purposes of all free men are under attack. The lamps of culture and freedom throughout the world are being snuffed out one by one. It is therefore fitting on this occasion to turn our thoughts once more to the land of Israel to find in its symbolic resurgence the new faith that is needed to meet the new and greater obstacles that lie in the path of freedom.

It is significant that Israel was reborn in the pangs of a world struggle against a marching conqueror who is striving for world dominion and the extinction of human liberty. We defeated the tyrants in a war which cost the Jewish people one-third of their total number; and we thought peace was assured with the destruction of nazism. We were mistaken.

Once more the world is threatened by aggression and a brutal marching dictatorship. Another flood of aggression has been let loose upon humanity. A new totalitarian religion, not unlike that of vanquished nazism, is again threatening to engulf the world in darkness and in servitude. Again free nations are compelled to man their ramparts in defense of their independence, and indeed their very survival.

Under these chaotic conditions, when fear and suspicion stalk the streets, it is imperative that we keep proper perspective and do not lose sight of the basic aim of our struggle, which is the preservation of the essential dignity of the individual and the corrollaries of justice, freedom, and equality that emanate from that great Hebraic religious concept.

We must beware of becoming entangled in the ideological net of the cynical Soviet philosophy that the end justifies any means. We must guard our basic liberties and our religious concepts of right and wrong. We must avoid the easy temptations and the ephemeral benefits of appeasement. Careful in the choice of partners in this struggle for democratic survival, we must not permit the wolves to don sheep's clothing and surreptitiously to sneak into our ranks as codefenders of liberty. We should have learned our lesson by the sad experiences of the last war. I refer to the tragedies of Yalta, Teheran, and Potsdam.

The incipient resurgence of nazism is a matter of grave concern to every American. Our policy toward Germany must be scrutinized and reexamined constantly, lest we too fall victims to Soviet cynicism.

Democratic statesmanship must possess the capacity of penetrating analysis, of farsightedness, and of broad realism. Unfortunately, our State Department is not blessed with these qualities and its patent failure fully to appraise the critical importance of the Middle East, and particularly the role Israel can play in that area, is indeed disturbing.

Our chief exertions very properly have been directed toward Europe and toward the Far East. Yet, it would be a grave mistake to minimize the Middle East and to rule it out as a potential danger zone. For it is the Middle East where our defenses may be threatened and outflanked. The danger signals from Iran are ominous and must be heeded by our Government.

The Middle East with its vast natural resources can well become the critical nerve center in the conflict between the East and the West. It is the gateway to three continents. The strategic lines of communication which link together the continents of Europe, Africa, and Asia cannot be held unless that region is protected from attack. Last, but not least, the godless Communist rulers must never be allowed to conquer and rule the land which was the cradle of religion and the source of faith to humanity. As a great moral principle, the Holy Land must be stoutly defended from Soviet aggression. We have little time to lose in mending our Middle East defenses.

The Soviet Union cunningly strives to undermine our position in that part of the world by creating disturbance and chaos. It is utilizing the internal weaknesses of the social order and the backwardness of the region to create an atmosphere of hostility toward the democracies and to gain allies among the native population for its sinister plots of conquest and enslavement. The Kremlin is also manipulating the inner conflicts of nationalist groups to retard the political and economic integration of that area and to prevent it from becoming a barrier to Soviet designs.

Our Government's point 4 program aims to remedy the social and economic ailments of the Near East. Though a just and wise policy, there may not be sufficient time to put it into effective operation before the Kremlin may strike.

There is only one country in the Middle East which has demonstrated its readiness and willingness and ability to serve as a spearhead for the defense of the western democracies in that part of the world. That country is Israel. Israel by its history and the character of its people is a natural ally of America and of the Western World. Israel, through its technique and industrial know-how and the zeal of its people, can serve as an effective base for the western armies in time of war. Israel does not suffer from the fatalism and the social and economic maladjustments with which other Middle East states are afflicted. Already the Kremlin agitators have found it futile to attempt to disrupt the national life of the Jewish state and thereby to weaken its resistance to their schemes. The love of the Israelites for their land and their devotion to freedom make them a natural and reliable ally in any crisis. The thrilling military performance of the young Israelite Army, which recently astounded the world, is assuredly a calculated deterrent for any aggressor. Israel, then, is the only pillar of reliance in that critical sector of the world and it should be fully utilized by the United States and our allies.

It is for this reason that I am sponsoring the grant-in-aid bill to give Israel $150,000,000 for the purpose of strengthening her economy. The Israelite state is now performing the miraculous task of receiving, housing, feeding, and integrating hundreds of thousands of uprooted Jews who, but for the advent of Jewish statehood, would have been sentenced to political death. The fulfillment of this program and its daring projection is truly a great historic achievement; and while it has saved human lives and fortified the security of the Jewish state, it has also served the interests of America and the entire free world. For every Jew brought to the shores of Israel, however weakened his physical condition, is nonetheless a potential soldier and defender of the west.

The $150,000,000 which we propose to grant to Israel will be devoted to a great humanitarian and national endeavor. At the same the reckless increases in natural-gas rates which have been imposed on the people of Wisconsin. I have previously commented on this matter on the Senate floor, pointing out the possibility that it may be necessary to introduce a resolution for a thorough investigation of this whole situation in order to prevent a further price gouging of the people.

This week, numerous distinguished officials of the State of Wisconsin, including our Governor, the Honorable Walter Kohler, Jr., and the mayor of Milwaukee, the Honorable Frank Zeidler, will be in town to confer with Chairman Wallgren, of the FPC. It is my earnest hope that out of that discussion may come a mutual agreement on ways and means of protecting the public interest, instead of allowing it to be further damaged.

I send the two editorials to the desk for printing in the RECORD.

I want to emphasize that I do not feel that we should allow our preoccupation with foreign affairs to divert our attention from the fact that millions upon millions of Americans in the low and middle income brackets right here at home are practically at wits and trying to make ends meet. Each day my office is literally flooded with appeals from these hard-pressed folks who set out in great detail their family budgets and who ask how they can be expected to pay the rent, buy clothing for the children, buy nutritious food for the family, and still meet rising prices.

Bureau of Labor Statistics data shows Milwaukee to be the highest cost of living area in this country, and the Phillips Petroleum Co. is apparently determined to help keep Milwaukee in that spot.

It seems to me that the Congress has an obligation to fulfill its promises particularly to the families of men fighting in Korea.

I ask my colleagues to think about the plight of a typical wife with one or two youngsters whose husband is fighting abroad and who finds that the serviceman's allotment barely covers subsistence needs. But whether or not our people have boys or relatives fighting in Korea, they are entitled to protection from being gouged.

The State of Wisconsin has a great tradition of preventing the arbitrary use of power in either public or private hands. If the Phillips Petroleum Co. expects to run riot without the public officials of Wisconsin taking remedial action, it has another think coming.

I have sent my comments as printed in a previous issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to Mr. Eric Johnston of OES and Mr. Michael DiSalle of OPS, asking them to reply as soon as possible on what they and their staffs propose to do about this aspect of the stabilization problem. I have also brought my comments to the attention of Chairman Johnson of the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee, whom I may ask to launch an investigation of this situation. Such an investigation has been widely urged throughout Wisconsin; but I hope it may not prove to be necessary, in view of all the other staggering responsibilities on the Congress. But if we must have such a probe, I for one will strongly demand it.

[From the Milwaukee Journal]

IS THE FPC PLAYING FOOTSY?

Senator WILEY has told the Senate that the Federal Power Commission "is playing footsy with certain private interests" in the Phillips Petroleum Co. natural gas rate case.

No other conclusion could be drawn from the FPC refusal to end almost 3 years of delay in giving Wisconsin a hearing on charges that Phillips is charging too much for gas at the wellhead.

The FPC has opened itself further to the charge of playing footsy by granting Phillips a hearing on whether the commission has jurisdiction over Phillips' rates, jurisdiction spelled out in law and court rulings.

Senator WILEY made two appeals in the interest of Wisconsin consumers. First he asked the FPC, for the umpteenth time, to reconsider its refusal to hear Wisconsin's pleas. Then he asked Eric Johnston, director of the Office of Economic Stabilization, to have his staff investigate the effects of the drastic increase in natural gas rates on the inflationary spiral.

These requests are worth making, but the record of the FPC in the Phillips case does not promise much hope for action.

There would appear to be more hope in another step Senator WILEY is considering. If something isn't done to give Wisconsin a hearing, the Senator will ask that a Senate Interstate Commerce Committee subcommittee "investigate the background of the Phillips company's dealings with the Michigan-Wisconsin Pipe Line Co., as well as related natural gas operations."

If the FPC doesn't move quickly to give Wisconsin its hearing we recommend the Senator's proposal for an investigation. Wisconsin consumers, in the words of Senator WILEY, "are being gouged." An investigation seems to be their only recourse against the game of footsy the FPC is playing with the natural gas producers.

WHAT'S THE COURT DECISION FOR?

Mon C. Wallgren, Chairman of the Federal Power Commission, has helped verify the Wisconsin and Milwaukee contention that the FPC is giving consumers the run-around in the Phillips Petroleum Co. natural-gas-rate case.

The FPC has stalled hearing Wisconsin's claim that Phillips charges too much for natural gas. The FPC first wants to decide whether it has jurisdiction over Phillips' rates—jurisdiction Wisconsin insists the FPC has by law and precedent. Wallgren, in a letter to Governor Kohler, gives substance to Wisconsin's position. He writes:

"The Supreme Court decision in the interstate case (331 U. S. 682) indicates that the Commission does have such jurisdiction."

But, he adds, Phillips doesn't think so, so the Commission will give Phillips a hearing.

Why? What good are law and court decisions if the Commission is going to start the jurisdictional fight from scratch in each case that comes before it?

The rate case has already been delayed 2½ years. Is Phillips to be allowed to delay it further? Is the FPC going to carry out its job of protecting consumers or continue to give in to natural-gas interests on an issue that even the FPC admits was settled long ago?

Let's Televise Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JACOB K. JAVITS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, the question of the broadcasting and televising of House sessions is currently under considerable discussion. I have proposed this in a resolution, House Resolution 62, which is the subject of Discharge Petition No. 3. Appended is an article from the May 6 issue of the Sunday magazine Parade, found in the Washington Post and other papers throughout the country, considering this subject:

LET'S TELEVISE CONGRESS

(By Representative JACOB K. JAVITS, Twenty-first Congressional District, New York)

A leading newspaper told its readers the other day that I was in favor of removing Congress from the closet and placing it in a goldfish bowl.

That's an excellent summary of my bill (H. Res. 62) which proposed the televising of debates in the House of Representatives. Radio broadcasts would be authorized, too.

I got the idea from the enormously successful televising of United Nations debates. The face-to-face arguments between the Western leaders and the Soviets have been the greatest lesson in foreign affairs our people have ever had.

To clinch any question of doubt about the impact of television, along came the hearings of the Senate Crime Investigating Committee under Senators KEFAUVER, TOBEY, and their colleagues. For the first time in history, such hearings were brought into millions of homes.

There are about 10,000,000 television sets in the United States today and new ones are being installed at a rate of 750,000 a month. With this potential audience there seems to be no good reason why we should not televise Congress. Not the day-to-day proceedings, which are often dull, but the big battles over important national issues.

There is a lot of opposition to my bill in Congress, however. Arguments that have been made against it are: (1) It might develop a snooping camera; (2) it might emphasize absence of Members from the floor when they are elsewhere doing necessary work on committees; (3) it might cause debate to deteriorate into "ham acting" and demagoguery, with senior Members "hogging the floor."

But when I introduced my resolution last January 12, I said I was seeking the maximum amount of public information—not a snooping camera to catch Members off guard. Under House rule 35, televising and broadcasting of House debates would be at the discretion, and under the control, of the Speaker.

LEGISLATORS WOULD BE ON THEIR TOES

As for "ham acting," Senator TOBEY feels with me that TV would, on the contrary, cause Members to choose their words and concentrate their efforts with even greater care—knowing that they were being televised.

My own opinion is that debate will become more concise and clear—so that it will be understandable to the vast audience.

And as for absences, I think citizens would pretty soon be able to judge general performance. They would learn for the first time the vast amount of work Congressmen have to do both on and off the floor. They would discover, too, that it is whether, and how, Congressmen vote that really counts.

Perhaps one of the strongest arguments made against my bill is that under congressional immunity, unfair charges made against groups or individuals get immediate and enormous circulation. However, it seems to me that it might work the other way around to protect the rights and reputations of citizens.

Members who take advantage of their congressional immunity from libel would be judged on the spot for their unfairness. Senator WILEY, Republican, Wisconsin, suggests a code of fair play to protect persons mentioned unfairly on TV or radio.

Suggestions already advanced in Congress for self-discipline—perhaps even opening the courts to aggrieved individuals by permitting damage suits—will get greater consideration.

come in spite our tears and our prayers, one of its primary objectives will be the control of the Near East. The tremendous oil resources and the strategic military location of that area dictate such a conclusion.

The progress and stability of the entire Middle East is what the United States desires. Thinking men generally concede that the best way to protect its wide areas of backwardness and dearth from chaos and decay is to encourage there the development of industry and agriculture through the modern methods which have been applied so successfully in the United States. Furthermore, repeatedly we have assured the Arab States that we want to promote friendly relations with them. We know that by helping Israel to help herself we are assisting all of the Near East.

In these circumstances one can hardly estimate the advantage to the United States to have a close and dependable friend in the Middle East. In America's crusade to establish and maintain world-wide peace we need to nurture this strategically determined friendly little country.

The Arabs as fellow Semites, claiming Abraham as a common ancestor, must reconcile their differences with the Israeli people. In fact, since our common enemy sits by like a deadly cobra ready to strike, all freedom-loving people must band together and put aside their relatively petty differences. Israel can become the workshop for the common defense of the Middle East. Israel, because of its fast-increasing industrial capacity, can become the cornerstone of their common interest to move forward in war or in peace.

Most unfortunately Israel's neighbors look upon her rehabilitation as a heterogeneous element disturbing the Arab unity. They have two major fears: political expansion and economic expansion. They fear that sooner or later Israel is bound to burst out of its existing frontiers. They support this view by pointing to the great immigration program predicted for the future.

Since most of the Arab countries are mainly agricultural, having a rural population and using out-of-date methods of production resulting in an appallingly low standard of living, they are worried on the economic front that Israel will dominate the Middle East through her awakened industries. A broader and more realistic outlook would develop a far different conclusion. Israel with her westernized modern industrial and agricultural economy which can only subsist by finding new markets for its products through the adoption of improved standards of living in the whole Mediterranean area must be regarded as the friend and not the enemy of that impoverished land. The political leaders of the Arab States are making a serious blunder if they think the Middle East is destined to continue forever its role of destitution and human misery. The hour of awakening for a sleeping giant has arrived.

Temporarily Israel has had to import heavily but her economy has touched bottom and slowly she is on the way up. In 1949, for example, all fertilizer had to be imported; in 1950, production was begun from imported raw materials; in 1951 Israel will produce all the fertilizer she needs; and in 1952 she will be an exporter of fertilizer.

The same encouraging picture is reflected in other fields. Her agricultural program is moving forward rapidly—desert, swampland, and rocky hillside are being reclaimed. In their traditionally bold spirit of adopting scientific methods the Jews have expanded their farming operations with emphasis on diversified crops and the growing of citrus fruit, an important export item. As a result, agricultural production while not keeping pace with the rapid increase in population is making important headway and will continue to improve as irrigation water is brought to the sun-parched lands and barren wastes. Something like 18 percent of the Jewish working population is engaged in agriculture, forestry and fishing. Here in the United States approximately 14 percent of our gainfully employed are found in these pursuits.

Industry too has taken a great spurt since independence day 3 years ago. Foreign industrialists have been encouraged to build branch plants there. Notable among these is the Kaiser-Frazer Corp. which has constructed an automobile plant in Haifa, and Philco Corp. which is turning out 40 to 60 refrigerators in an 8-hour shift. The entrance of General Tire & Rubber, and the Ford Co. is further evidence of this salutary trend. Recently our Government concluded its point 4 program agreement with Israel which will permit the setting up of specific projects for the training of Israeli technicians.

The plain fact remains, however, that the economy of Israel has been subjected to such a severe strain by reason of the vast influx of immigrants that its productive capacity has not been able to keep pace with consumption. Its financial burden has been heavy. Additional capital is urgently needed to strengthen its economy. That is why I joined with my distinguished friend and colleague, New York's fearless and forward looking leader, Senator IVES, and 34 other Senators, in the sponsorship of Senate bill 1247 which provides for financial grants to Israel. That legislation is in response to the formal request submitted to our State Department by the Government of Israel. If we are successful in securing its enactment, it will make possible the purchase of materials for desperately needed housing units, grains, cotton, petroleum, hides, and other raw supplies required by the mills and factories which when processed into consumer goods will halt the dangerous inflationary pressures which are arising there. The $500,000,000 bond issue soon to be floated in the United States is a mighty sound investment for Americans and will give Israeli industry the financial support it must have to get under way. The conception of this bond issue is one of the boldest and most constructive things which has happened to the Near East in recent years. Every cent of it is dedicated to production because its sponsors realize that through production only can Israel remain free and prosperous.

Since Israel's capacity to produce has not kept pace with its vast increase in population, its imports far outstrip its exports. Its foreign trade deficit is huge. In 1950 exports paid for only a little more than one-seventh of the imports. Although agriculture increased its output by 75 percent in two and one-half years, the import food bill alone ran up to $70,000,000. As a result the people have been compelled to accept an austerity program that is much more severe than that experienced in Great Britain.

Nevertheless the State of Israel has come a long way in 3 years. I extend my heartiest congratulations to all who have helped to make this possible. The Jewish people, with their indomitable courage, faith in Jehovah's far-seeing vision, and tenacity of purpose, these people who have the Holy Bible and Christianity to the world, have built a citadel of freedom and have staked out a claim for democracy and right living in the very cradle of civilization. The democracy which the American Zionist wants to preserve there had its birth with the tribe of Abraham and Isaac.

We should not expect the ills which beset the human race to be cured over night. There will be heartaches and suffering. But in spite of the bewildering complexities that engulf us and the darkness of despair which hangs over the world, if we are patient and use the intelligence which the Creator has bestowed upon us, everything will work out all right. It is fortunate for the world that the rebirth of Israel came when it did.

The new Jewish state has emerged from its cocoon of long preparation the tragic time in history when the world is undergoing cataclysmic changes. Life is intricate and insecure. Every nation on this earth is in more or less of a general turmoil. World problems are so baffling that some despair that we shall ever solve them. Through the creative genius of our great scientists and engineers we have developed and harnessed forces which have great power for good or for evil. But these forces have not been brought into focus and balance with the world's slower economic progress. Science has outrun the social and political processes.

Nevertheless in these trying days, especially when we recall that entire nations are being ground to bits under the iron heel of a godless dictatorship, it is comforting to have a people happy at work building a strong vibrant democratic society on nineteen centuries of ashes and futility.

An inspired citizen of Israel and world statesman David Ben-Gurion, uttered these symbolic words of noble purpose: "In assuming its place within the family of free nations after so many centuries of aggression and exile, Israel is determined to support to the best of its capacity every measure which strengthens world peace, promotes understanding among peoples and insures the rights of men and equality of nations."

It is with this noble expression and broad, sensible and realistic outlook with which I associate myself tonight when I extend my warmest greetings and heartiest commendation to the Zionists of America and the world and to the peoples of Israel; and repeat my conviction that this free-thinking, cooperative and independent state will prove to be a tremendous factor in restoring sanity to a mad world and in preserving world peace through many, many generations.

The Defense of the Farm Against Biological Warfare

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL ELLIOTT

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, if and when the possibility of biological warfare becomes a reality, it will probably be directed in a coordinated pattern with poisons and germs against people in the centers of population on the one hand and with pests and diseases aimed at the crops and livestock of the farmers on the other hand.

Biological warfare can be considered as a special weapon of war, and it is well to presume that our potential enemies know quite as much about it as we do.

Also it is well to realize that a strong defense can be built against it.

I include as a part of my remarks the following article from the April 1951 issue of Farm Journal, written by Richard Gerstell and Claude Gifford, entitled "It Could Hit Your Farm Tonight":

IT COULD HIT YOUR FARM TONIGHT

(Our farms would be a prime target for attack in the event of biological war. This accurate and realistic article prepared by the Farm Journal should be read carefully time, it will serve as an investment in the security of the United States and of those who follow our leadership in the fight for freedom.

I am most hopeful that the grant-in-aid bill will pass as submitted to the Congress and I pledge you I shall do my utmost to see that it does pass.

I should also like to emphasize that I do not consider the granting of this money as the limit of our assistance in making Israel strong. Wise statesmanship and sound strategy dictate a closer link between the preparedness of America and Israel for the defense of our common heritage of freedom. In fulfilling this necessity I suggest that our Government approach the State of Israel diplomatically for consultations relative to the defense of the Middle East against Soviet aggression. The American military position would seem to dictate the granting of military aid to the Israeli Army in the form of modern weapons so as to make it a real and formidable force for securing peace and tranquillity.

We have reached a dangerous position where anything can happen. We cannot leave the security of Israel to chance. We must not, through our negligence, invite a second Pearl Harbor or a second Korea. The wise course is to be prepared; for only prepreparedness can halt the hand of aggressor.

The first step in preparing the defense of the Middle East is to move decisively for the conclusion of a formal peace between the Arab States and Israel. The present unsteady armed truce between Israel and the Arab States is fraught with danger, for the slightest spark may start a conflagration to the detriment of our own interests. The Kremlin agents hope for a renewal of the war between Israel and the Arabs and for an opportunity to intervene. The Kremlin is intent on preventing the economic stabilization of the Near East. The Arab boycott of Israel and the Egyptian blockade of the Suez Canal preventing the flow of oil to Israel are already causing serious dislocations to the economy of the whole region and are playing directly into the hands of the Soviets. Who, I ask, shall take the leadership in correcting these conditions that lead to strife instead of peace, if not the United States?

The Government of the United States is confronted with a mighty challenge. Will it assume the leadership to defend the Holy Land, dear alike to Christian and Jew, from the godless hand of communism. It is my ardent hope and prayer that we shall meet that challenge and I pledge my unstinting support of every effort to meet it.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR EDWIN C. JOHNSON, OF COLORADO

ISRAEL THE HOPE OF A MAD WORLD

It is indeed a very great privilege to celebrate with you the third anniversary of the rebirth of the world's oldest and yet youngest nation. Someone has said there are three Israels, the Israel of the past, the Israel of the present, and the Israel of the future. Historically that may be true, but spiritually there has been and there can be but one Israel. Measured in things spiritual, and things spiritual alone are endowed with everlasting continuity, Israel stands foremost in the family of nations. The most beautiful and enduring religion was revealed to man in this very old and this very new state. In my very early childhood my Christian mother taught me that one day, known only to God, the exiled Jew would be returned to his ancient home. I rejoice that in our time this spiritually important event was destined to take place. I shall not attempt to analyze the deeply religious implications of the formal return of Judiasm to the ancient scene of its sacred and glorious triumphs.

Suffice to say the burning desire for tranquillity and justice and the unshakable courage and faith in God which inspired the noble men and women who have pioneered in this return to the ancestral-home movement, had to succeed. They are building a new and better society of freemen, and in doing so they are using as their yardstick the ideals of the Jewish Bible. To me it is unique and praiseworthy that this program is being carried out voluntarily and through the democratic processes and not under the whiplash of any of the arbitrary or tyrannical processes so common to crusades. Accordingly, this great and noble experiment deserves the full support of people the world over. I commend and congratulate the Zionists for their vision, their faith, and their perseverance.

Birthdays are excellent occasions for taking stock of situations; of looking back to see where we have been; of acknowledging one's failures; and of dreaming and planning for the days ahead.

The inspiring story of Israel offers new proof of the powers of the creative spirit of a people who hold fast to deep religious conviction. All who are familiar with past and present Israeli history must believe it to be the prologue of a resplendent record of prophecy endowed achievement. Victor Hugo once said that no army can withstand the strength of an idea whose time has come. It is only 3 years since the State of Israel proclaimed its independence thus ending the British mandatory regime. In these 3 years Israel has striven successfully to earn a place of leadership among the other States in the Middle East. Today, few will question the fact that she will continue to play a significant political role in this backward but vital region.

In 1948, when Israel's independence was proclaimed, almost its entire southern half, neglected for thousands of years, was a sun-beaten waterless desert and wasteland. There was not a pound of coal, not a drop of oil, not an ounce of available iron in all Israel. Forests were cut down centuries ago, and practically every stick of wood had to be imported.

When the British left the state was without a government, without an army, without a police force, without trained civilians to run the country. Temporary officials to exercise what authority was necessary were literally recruited from the streets.

This was the grim picture that greeted the people of Israel on their day of independence. It would be hard indeed to imagine a more formidable challenge than that which faced this community.

But inspired and sustained by the promise of Jehovah to the faithful, they did survive this initial chaos. Instead of contemplating failure they rolled up their sleeves and they proceeded to put into effect and to carry out a constructive program of restoration and rehabilitation.

Thirty years previously, when the victorious nations at the Versailles Peace Conference pledged their support in the establishment of a Jewish state, Palestine had a Jewish population of only 65,000. On independence day in 1948 the Jewish population had swelled tenfold to 650,000.

Successive and continuous waves of immigration have boosted this total, until today there are more than 1,200,000 Jews and some 175,000 Arabs in the State of Israel. It is a tiny land of only 8,100 square miles, not larger than New Jersey. Newcomers are arriving at the rate of nearly 20,000 a month, an influx which will add another half million people by 1953. This would be a phenomenal population growth even in a much larger, better established, and more productive community.

These home seekers come by boat and chartered plane and from every corner of the globe, and from every walk of life; craftsmen, merchants, artists, scientists, peddlers, or just plain misfits. Most of them are penniless, and many have undergone such harrowing experiences that their health and spirits are broken. Some 63 countries are represented by them. In small packages and bundles they brought their pitifully few world belongings. They have a common religious faith, but not a common language. Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion well said: "Israel is not a melting pot; it is a pressure cooker."

Israel has taken "the world's tired and poor and huddled masses yearning to be free" and has given them a home. In this "in gathering of the exiles," she faces the task of the transformation of an overwhelming urban population into one properly balanced between towns and villages. A largely unproductive society must be trained to be productive, and peoples from all countries of the world must be integrated into one nationalized and cooperative enterprise. The problem of blending these pitiful and persecuted remnants of the Jewish people into a homogeneous community is indeed difficult. But the spirit of the leadership in the new Israel is strong. With a faith that man with God can do the impossible, they have entered into their almost hopeless task with great enthusiasm and full assurance.

Along with the other almost insurmountable problems must be added the jealousy and hostility of unfriendly neighboring states. Indeed, the first year was characterized by a military struggle for sheer physical survival. Israel was considered defenseless against neighboring armies trained and equipped by a European power, yet the newborn State with an undying faith in its right to live and to pursue its life according to its own dictates rallied fiercely against superior armed forces, drove them from her borders, and, God be praised, did survive.

With the challenge of aggression behind her, the central theme became the struggle for international recognition. Membership in the UN was important because this young state wholeheartedly believed in the principle of collective security and international cooperation. All of us rejoiced when Israel became the fifty-ninth member of the United Nations. Too, it is a source of great pride to all of us that the United States was the first to grant official recognition to Israel as an independent nation.

The real riddle of Israel's future, however, is whether her political and military victories can now be crowned with economic success. It would be folly to underestimate the grievous problems which remain unsolved before the spiritual aspirations of the Jewish people will be fully realized.

Israel's big headache is to reduce the tension existing in its relationship with the various neighboring Arab states. Tension is perhaps inevitable in the wake of the war which Israel was compellel to fight against aggression to assure its independence. The current border incidents between Syria and Israel cause concern in many quarters because of the explosive nature of world conditions. We must give her every assistance within our means to resolve these differences with justice, firmness, and dignity. At a time when the world is badgered with actual and potential military and political crises, few things could be worse than the outbreak of hostilities between Israel and its neighbors. The only gainers from such a catastrophe which well might set the entire Middle East aflame would be the men of the Kremlin and their forces of international subversion and aggression.

It is important to the world that Israel remain a free and independent democracy. The Middle East today is the fever spot. Without any question, this whole area is of incalculabe importance to the Allied Powers. When world war III comes, and may God grant it may never come—but if it does

by every farmer"—Millard Caldwell, Federal Civil Defense Administrator.)

(By Richard Gerstell and Claude Gifford)

Let's suppose that some morning this year, or maybe next, you go out to the barn and find one or two of your cows drooling at the mouth and looking strangely sick. You call the veterinarian, who takes one look and says: "Foot-and-mouth disease."

How could that be? How could foot-and-mouth germs possibly get to your place? The answer is that agents of an enemy government may have brought them in. And on that day—if it ever happens—biological war will have come to your farm.

Let's hope that it never happens. But let's not think that it can't.

Biological warfare—sometimes called germ warfare, or BW for short—could start tonight. Not just in cities, with poisons and germs directed against the people crowded together there, but on farms, with pests and diseases aimed at our crops and livestock.

The enemy might try to sneak in foreign pests and diseases long before a shooting war—in hopes that he could whittle down our food supply, and undermine our strength for a long struggle. So don't think that BW has to wait for the shooting to begin.

This is not something to become hysterical about. It's true that there has been wild talk about wiping out whole cities and entire crops with poisons, insects, and diseases. But the facts are, BW is just another special weapon of war—and not a new one by any means. There's a defense against it.

Our best defense is to be prepared to detect any new insects or foreign diseases quickly, and be ready to stamp them out fast. And the better prepared we are, the less likely the enemy is to try biological warfare, or to make much headway with it.

Actually, nature is constantly waging her own biological warfare against our crops and animals. And to fight back, we have built up a tremendous arsenal—bigger and better than anywhere else in the world—of insecticides and medicines for use against bugs and diseases. Our farmers have more skill and know-how in using them, and more equipment for doing it. We have more and better veterinarians, entomologists, crop-disease men, and other scientists.

Because of our better defenses, an enemy would think twice before he started BW, and invited us to strike back. We could wage a pretty terrible biological war ourselves if we had to.

Fortunately, farm people aren't likely targets for germ attacks on human beings. They are too scattered. Germ raids, and possible insect attacks, on farms would be directed mostly against livestock and crops.

Where would raids likely begin? Probably in hatcheries, stockyards, sales barns, feed-mixing plants, railroad terminals, and other centers where large numbers of animals pass through on their way to farms. That's more likely than attacks against single farms.

Other possible targets are commercial laboratories where serums, vaccines, and other medicines are made.

On the crops front, the targets would include seed houses, fertilizer-mixing plants, and places where spray materials are made.

You may think that we have about every imaginable livestock disease now. If so, you were never more wrong. Some of the worst animal plagues on the face of the earth are still outside this country. They might be brought in any time. For instance:

Rinderpest, an Asiatic cattle plague that kills nearly 100 percent of the animals it strikes. Foot-and-mouth disease, an infection that spreads like wildfire. (It's a miracle it hasn't crossed the Mexican border.)

Glanders, an Old World disease of horses and mules that is highly fatal to humans unless it is recognized early.

Fowl pest and foreign strains of Newcastle disease, probably the two most destructive poultry diseases in the world.

Accidental outbreaks could be serious, too. Look what happened in 1914 when foot-and-mouth disease got a month's start in Michigan. It spread to the Chicago stockyards, and went out to 22 States before it was halted. More than 3,500 herds had to be slaughtered—172,222 animals in all—at a cost of nearly $6,000,000 for indemnities to owners—and those were 1914 dollars.

In Mexico we've spent $90,000,000, and fought the disease with hundreds of inspectors and veterinarians for 4 years, and still haven't completely stamped out the disease.

We've had fowl pest in this country once (in New Jersey), and just last March Asiatic Newcastle got into a California establishment through a shipment of game birds from Hong Kong.

Want to know what that disease was like? It killed 41 of the 42 chickens on that place. Thanks to a quick diagnosis, it was stamped out before it spread to other farms.

These experiences show that spotting a dangerous disease or a new insect early is the key to a strong defense. Scientists believe that the Japanese beetle got at least a year's start on us; even then we probably could have wiped it out completely by spending $50,000. We didn't and we've got the beetle in 28 States today. Very likely we could have backed the gypsy moth off our map with a few thousand dollars if we'd got at it when we discovered the pest. Now it has spread all over the northeastern United States.

Here's what biological warfare could mean to growing crops. Government entomologists say that there are literally hundreds of crop pests and diseases that have never reached our shores. Some are as bad as any we now have, or worse.

How could these diseases or pests be brought in? By smuggling them across our borders; by dropping them from enemy planes; by setting loose foreign rusts, scales, and blights in our fields, and by scattering over larger areas the diseases and pests we already have. It wouldn't be too hard to do.

One man with a few test tubes full of rust like the new 15B which attacks wheat could spread a little all the way from Mexico to Canada, and within a year or two we could have a new scourge all over the Great Plains.

Some of the more serious insect pests which might be used against us in biological warfare are the Mediterranean fruitfly, the citrus blackfly (just across the border in Mexico—see the September 1950 Farm Journal, p. 34), the Oriental fruitfly, and seed weevils that attack legume seeds. There are many others.

What is our Government doing to protect us against BW?

They have been working on it since the beginning of World War II. You didn't know it, but at the peak of that war 4,000 men—including some of the Nation's top scientists—were investigating ways to protect us against germ and pest attacks.

From that work came a new toxoid that will protect you from botulism, the deadliest type of food poisoning; a vaccine that gives animals reasonable protection against rinderpest; and a wealth of information about "plant growth regulators," some of which has been put to use in peacetime.

Our present line of defense is this:

It's up to the Armed Forces to cut off attacks by planes or germ-filled missiles or shells.

The FBI is on the look-out for sabotage and undercover raids.

The USDA watches for foreign diseases and pests at our borders, ports of entry, and our international airports. That work is still pretty much on a peacetime basis.

The rest is up to civil defense. There we are making a start—but only a start. We are still largely in the "we've got to do something" stage.

Special courses in trouble-making animal diseases that the enemy might use have been given to 25 USDA veterinarians by the Bureau of Animal Industry. These vets are located in key spots around the country—one could get to your farm or ranch in a matter of hours if needed. But we need to train a lot more veterinarians and pathologists—25 are not many. And we need to do it right now.

And consider this: With foot-and-mouth disease within a day's drive of the Mexican border, we've fiddled around for 3 years about establishing a foot-and-mouth laboratory. We need such a place, under our control, where we can study foot-and-mouth and other virus diseases—a place where we can develop and produce vaccines if necessary.

(Contrary to public belief, we haven't even settled on a location for such a laboratory. The whole thing was snugly bottled up by the Appropriations Committee in the House—and has stopped there.—Editor.)

Meanwhile, the rinderpest vaccine that we and the Canadians developed during World War II probably has been lost. The BAI admits to that.

What else could we expect? We and the Canadians developed the vaccine on an island in the St. Lawrence River. Then we pulled out after the war. With no place close at hand to continue studying the disease, and with no control over the way the vaccine was made or protected in other parts of the world, this valuable vaccine strain—as far as anyone knows—was frittered away and eventually disappeared.

The SDA could do a more thorough job of inspecting materials coming in from foreign countries—if it had the money. But it hasn't. In the year ending this July, the Bureau of Animal Industry will have spent about $373,653 for inspection and quarantine of animals and animal products—less than half a million dollars to protect a $15,000,000,000 livestock industry. With this the BAI must watch all our ports and borders except the Mexican border. The regular budget for this same work for the next year, starting in July, is only $100 more than last year.

Wouldn't it be good insurance to use some of our huge defense sums for strengthening this work—and for building an animal disease laboratory?

Also, we need a disease and pest reporting system that can work quickly. We've needed it for a long time. Last summer when the hog-cholera variant broke out across the corn belt, Farm Journal tried to find out how many cases there were, and where they were. No one knew. Veterinarians and officials—including those in the Bureau of Animal Industry—could only guess.

In all probability we need more men looking for sabotage in centers where livestock, feeds, seeds, medicines, insecticides, fertilizers, and the like are either being manufactured or on their way to farms.

Those are some of the problems confronting the civil defense people and the United States Department of Agriculture as they plan for better defenses against bacterial war. They are planning to set up State organizations, which in turn will help to organize units in your local community. Their jobs will be to pin down raids and stamp them out.

You have a part to play, too. Local government defense agencies may call on you to (1) help spot and stamp out accidental outbreaks or possible bacterial war raids in your neighborhood; and (2) help prevent attacks or accidental epidemics by keeping raid-proof conditions on your farm. Here's what they may ask you to do:

If you notice anything of importance that's out-of-the-ordinary in your fields or garden, notify your county agent, or phone the local civil defense office. If members of your family get sick from what you believe may have been polluted water, food, or milk, report it to your doctor. If any of your poultry or livestock get suspiciously or seriously sick with a strang disease, call in the veterinarian.

It will be up to you not to get excited over little things—too many calls would put too big a load on local defense officials. Ask your local defense people to find out, then tell you, the sort of thing they want you to look for—then if you have good reason to suspect a germ raid, act quickly.

Sometimes you may be called on to give an animal, or some of its blood, for laboratory examination. This might save you and your neighbors big losses by detecting a disease early before it has a chance to spread.

In case of an emergency, you might be called on to help out with inspection, quarantine, vaccination, and possibly with slaughtering infected animals. Also with cleaning and disinfecting contaminated areas.

The second big task the Government may ask of you is to keep your place "raidproof." This is nothing more than using good everyday farm practices that will make it hard for disease to take hold and spread. How? Well, local defense officials may suggest this:

Ask strangers to keep away from your flocks and buildings; select your part-time help carefully; keep handy the phone numbers of your veterinarian, county agent, local civil defense officials, and State police. Get all the "shots" suggested by your local health authorities; keep prepared feeds in ratfree, covered bins that can be locked at night; do as good a job as you can of killing off rats, mice, fleas, lice, stray pigeons, and flies. Don't let dead animals and poultry lie around; watch everything for first signs of illness; feed cattle away from public roads if possible; in emergencies, keep wells covered and the pump house locked.

They also might suggest that you buy poultry and livestock only from definitely reliable sources; buy animals that have been immunized against the more common diseases; keep new stock separated from old stock until diseases have had time to show up. Disinfect pieces of equipment that come with, or have been used by, new stock; disinfect shoes and boots when leaving quarantine pens; buy only recognized medicines and feed stuffs, and those from trusted places of business with a good name; and keep yourself in good health.

That is the story on biological warfare. It is entirely possible. It might start tonight, this year or next, or it might never start. The possibilities are frightening only if we get panicky; and only if we do not understand what might happen and what to do. If we do understand, and are well organized, we can meet any attacks successfully and bottle them up. Just putting the damper on accidental outbreaks will be worth every ounce of effort.

One thing is sure: we need far better protection than we have, and we need it now. See that your local, State, and national defense set-ups get moving.

Remembrance of Richard

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, many of our young men are being killed in Korea in this terrible war. Every now and then, it strikes close to our home districts, emphasizing the awful tragedy of death.

Mr. William McManus, of Owego, N. Y., is the grandfather of the late Sgt. Richard McManus, son of Mr. and Mrs. Maurice McManus, of Vestal Center, in my district.

Sergeant McManus was killed in action in Korea on February 12 of this year.

I am including a poem written by Sergeant McManus' grandfather in memory of him:

REMEMBRANCE OF RICHARD

The sun was sinking in the west
Where fell its lingering ray
Upon a Korean battlefield
Where a dead soldier lay
Wrap the flag around him boys
And gently lay him down
Where the sun will shine next day
So coldly on that mound.
Gather all around him boys
And offer up a prayer
For his dear old Mother and Father far away over there.
We know he did his duty: and did his duty well,
Alas, in the saving of a comrade, poor Richard fell.
No more will he see his native land
He'll roam its hills no more
So gently wrap the flag around him boys
For our hearts are heavy and sore.
Now gather all around him boys
And offer up a prayer
For all of his beloved ones far away over there.

VA Letter Hits Bottom on Readability Meter

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THADDEUS M. MACHROWICZ

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. MACHROWICZ. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following news article which appeared in the May 5, 1951, issue of the Vet-Times, a national newspaper of veterans' affairs published in Washington, D. C.:

VA LETTER HITS BOTTOM ON READABILITY METER

WASHINGTON.—Gobbledygook?

The Veterans' Administration has it—and bad. Don't take our word for it. Ask Dr. Rudolph Flesch, readability expert, labeled "Mr. Fix-it of Writing" by Time magazine.

Dr. Flesch came to town last week with a VA letter in hand. After reading that horrible example of gobbledygook, he had a Department of Agriculture seminar audience rolling in the aisles.

Here's Dr. Flesch's story: Several months ago a GI in Korea wrote VA about possible GI bill training after discharge. He got a 2-page reply that was (1) completely unintelligible, and (2) did not answer the question.

The GI appealed to Dr. Flesch, believing the readability expert could surely decipher it. No soap. Dr. Flesch couldn't make head nor tail of the letter. He wrote VA seeking the answer to the GI's question. He got virtually the same answer. Neither he nor the GI to this day know what VA meant.

Dr. Flesch, Associated Press consultant for 3 years, devised a measurement yardstick to test readability. A newspaper story will generally test between 60-70. The VA letter—hold your breath—tested minus 13.

You can't go much lower, or at least Dr. Flesch hopes not. He declined to reveal the specific gobbledygook, feeling a confidence would be violated. He said, however, that it would have been much better had VA merely replied, "so sorry." The GI would then have a clearer idea than he now does, holding VA's gobbledygook letter.

Dr. Flesch, a New York University professor, believes the country is being drowned in gobbledygook. The cost to the taxpayers is staggering, he asserts.

He speaks with somewhat more authority than an observer. Dr. Flesch had the painful duty of translating OPA price directives into readable language 5 years ago. That service convinced him that the Government was a huge structure of paper.

His booklet, How Does Your Writing Read, published through the Civil Service Commission, has helped. But he believes the 53,000 copies distributed is just a drop in the bucket.

The real solution, he believes, can be achieved through establishment of basic writing standards. Such standards—properly tested and adhered to—could sizably dent United States gobbledygook, Dr. Flesch claims.

He pointed out that the Agriculture Department's extension service has made the most strides. A readability unit is helping the Department improve its letters and publications.

Dr. Flesch maintains not only written letters, but reports, bulletins, and memorandums need improvement. And he had a word to say about Government press agents. He said that while the press had made great strides in improving readability, Government PRO's hadn't kept up.

He is the author of The Art of Plain Talk, which has sold over 90,000 copies. A new book, How To Test Readability (Harper & Bros., $1) went on sale recently. He also wrote the Associated Press writing handbook.

While serving as consultant for AP he told writers not to use more than 19 words to the sentence. He told a Vet-Times reporter the same thing.

We don't know about AP, but this story meets his standards.

Equal Opportunity in Employment for the Physically Handicapped

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON

OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, Admiral Ross T McIntire, Chairman of the President's Commission on National Employment of the Physically Handicapped, on behalf of this organization recently sponsored a Nation-wide essay contest open to all high school students in the States and Territories. Thirty-four States and Territories responded.

Miss Sylvia Doyle, a senior in the Colorado Springs High School, was the Colorodo winner, and went on to win fourth place in the nationwide contest, the subject of the contest being "Equal Opportunity in Employment for the Physically Handicapped."

Because of the excellence of the essay written by Miss Doyle, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, where Members of Congress may have opportunity to read it.

There being no objection, the essay was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EQUAL OPPORTUNITY IN EMPLOYMENT FOR THE PHYSICALLY HANDICAPPED

(Essay by Miss Sylvia Doyle, of Colorado Springs, Colo.)

Fifty years ago the handicapped individual had little opportunity to lead a normal, self-supporting life. He knew he would always be a burden either to his family or to society. In more recent times, possibly as a result of two wars which left many veterans disabled, we are becoming increasingly aware of the problems confronting the physically handicapped, and are making attempts to help them find a useful, productive place in the business world. Now that society realizes there should be equal opportunity in employment for the physically handicapped, it is necessary to establish the meaning of the word "equal" in this connection. One who has lost an arm cannot plan to become a musician or a surgeon, nor can a blind man expect to succeed as an accountant. Obviously there cannot be equal opportunities in all types of employment, but in this case is meant equal opportunities for positions where the physical defect can be ignored or overlooked in consideration of other more important qualities. Naturally the field of employment is limited for the handicapped, depending on the nature of the disability, but no one can be qualified to fit every job, and some compatible position can now be found for almost every disabled worker.

Today there are many veterans' agencies, trade and State schools that can teach the physically handicapped to succeed in the jobs for which they apply. A person will compensate for a physical defect by developing himself in other ways. For instance, most blind people have their senses of hearing and feeling sharpened to an unusual degree; a person paralyzed below the waist or without lower limbs will develop powerfully strong arm and shoulder muscles, while one without arms or hands often becomes adept at using his feet for writing, painting, or various kinds of manipulation. Therefore in the field requiring specialized skills for which he has been trained, the handicapped are sometimes physically better qualified to handle the job than most people would be. In order to compete with the normally fit they may have to do more intensive practice and persevere harder to achieve their goals, but as a result they are usually better workers; their records in ability and efficiency are high. A firm employing handicapped workers is not necessarily being philanthropic. The slogan "Hire the Handicapped—It's Good Business," makes sense.

In order to help the physically handicapped and to make employers realize they are good business prospects, National Employ the Physically Handicapped Week has been established. Its aim is to advance the cause of these disabled people, who don't want charity or pity, who don't want to be coddled, but simply desire an equal chance to work on a competitive basis in the industrial world.

These physically handicapped people are equipped with courage, stamina, and alertness. They often develop talents that would have lain dormant if they had not been disabled. Recently in a veterans' rehabilitation hospital a group of partially paralyzed boys staged a combination circus and vaudeville for their fellow patients. Because they had such a wonderful time practicing and presenting it, and because the show was such a grand success, the boys put it on for other hospitals. Although they had no previous experience in entertaining, they have now made it a career. It is fascinating to watch the way they maneuver their wheel chairs through formations similar to the complicated dance routines of a musical comedy as they sing appropriate songs. There is a separate act in which a man rides his wheel chair over a high wire. With wit, courage, and hard work these boys have made a worth-while place for themselves despite their handicaps.

Of course few can belong to such a troop, but for those handicapped people who simply want to enter the business world, many more fields are open than is commonly supposed, as additional firms are learning that these people make dependable employees. Various departments of our Government also take on qualified handicapped persons when possible. The deaf may be used in shoe shops, restaurants, dry cleaning establishments, and printing offices. When jobs for the blind are mentioned, most people think of broom making or of conducting concessions in post offices, but there are numerous other opportunities open for the sightless. Those with musical ability may become piano tuners or play in bands and orchestras. Like the deaf, the blind can work successfully at printing and run certain types of machines in manufacturing plants. For a time two different blind couples ran grocery stores in a Colorado town which also boasts a successful blind lawyer. Handicapped people with artistic ability can compete easily with others in most fields of art, either free lancing or in connection with industry. Lame and crippled workers can take many kinds of jobs not requiring much moving about. These few positions mentioned are picked at random from the many to show the broad scope of opportunity for these people.

Finding good employment prospects is naturally a harder task for the handicapped than for the able bodied, but it is by no means too great an obstacle. Prejudices against hiring them are being overcome as business takes on more and more such employees.

The physically handicapped labor under many problems that the great majority of people do not. They are often sensitive and bitter about their condition. We owe it to them not to give them too much sympahy, not to give them work simply because they are unfortunate. They deserve the American right to get ahead on their own initiative; they should accept the competition of the rest of the world just as others do. Only in this way will they have a chance to lead normal, happy lives, as they surely have an equal right to do. It is to the advantage of all to keep these people self supporting in jobs won on a competitive basis. Business should take an interest in them because of their ability, not because of compassion. Handidcapped people who are self supporting are, for all practical purposes, no longer handicapped.

These people don't want pity—they want only the same chance others have to make something of themselves. They aren't asking for a handout—they're asking for a chance to handle a job for which they are qualified. They would like to be tested as others are; it is their privilege by right of birth as human beings. Surely we owe this much to the physically handicapped as well as to all mankind.

Proposed Shipment of Wheat to India

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the Committee on Foreign Relations in the Senate and the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the House of Representatives have both taken affirmative action on a proposal to provide 2,000,000 tons of wheat for the people and the Government of the Republic of India. These measures await favorable action on the part of both the House and the Senate. The hour is late. The specter of mass starvation hangs like a cloud over the land of India. The Government of India has appealed to our Nation for assistance. It is fitting and appropriate that we should quickly respond in a spirit of American generosity, Christian compassion, and fraternity.

When the wheat-for-India bills are debated in the respective Houses of the Congress the arguments in favor of the proposed legislation will be documented and clearly outlined. During the past weeks throughout all areas of America voices have been raised in support of wheat for India. Religious leaders of all denominations have challenged Protestant, Catholic, and Jew to join in this crusade against hunger.

The Reverend Leland Stark, rector of the Church of the Epiphany, Washington, D. C., on Sunday, April 29, 1951, delivered a sermon entitled "Lazarus at America's Gate." Within the confines of this splendid sermon are to be found the summation of all arguments in support of this proposal. We are deeply indebted to the Reverend Stark for his understanding, his brilliant presentation, and his challenge to Christian action. I ask unanimous consent that his sermon of April 29, 1951, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the sermon was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LAZARUS AT AMERICA'S GATE

"There was a rich man, who was clothed in purple and fine linen, and who feasted sumptuously every day. And at his gate lay a poor man named Lazarus, full of sores, who desired to be fed with what fell from the rich man's table; moreover the dogs came and licked his sores. The poor man died."

So says Jesus in His telling of the story of Lazarus, the poor man, and Dives, the rich man, and everything indicates that Lazarus died of starvation within sight of the sumptuous tables of Dives, the rich man. The sores on the body of Lazarus, of which Jesus speaks, were probably those ulcers which frequently spread over a starving body, and Our Lord's reference to the dogs who came and licked the sores on Lazarus' body suggests that he was too weak to beat off the unclean beasts of the street, who, far from being like our dogs, were ferocious, unclean mongrels who may well have been waiting for Lazarus to die so that they could attack his body. That sort of thing frequently happens in famine-ridden areas of the world.

It wasn't that Lazarus was asking Dives, the rich man, to go hungry on his account; all that Lazarus wanted were those bits of bread on which well-fed orientals, in lieu of using napkins, wiped their fingers. But this rather meager and uncertain diet evidently did not contain enough calories, and Lazarus died.

Before I come to the application of this scripture to a contemporary situation, I feel constrained to intrude a personal observation. Those of you who have known me these nearly 3 years I have been your rector know that not once before in that period have I used the privilege of the pulpit to speak directly on impending congressional legislature. Normally it is out of place in the pulpit. But occasionally there comes before America an issue to which the Christian gospel has so direct and obvious an application that the pulpit remains silent only if it is cowardly evasive. So I speak to you now as a Christian minister to Christian people on a matter to which the Christian gospel directly applies.

Come back now to the words of Jesus. "There was a rich man, who was clothed in purple and fine linen and who feasted sumptuously every day. And at his gate lay a poor man named Lazarus, full of sores, who desired to be fed with what fell from the rich man's table."

My friends, I say to you that Lazarus lies today at America's gate—a Lazarus in the person of millions of people of India who are threatened with starvation, and this very week there come before Congress bills providing for a loan, or half-grant and half-loan, of 2,000,000 tons of wheat for India in order to stave off that famine which otherwise may take the lives of millions of people.

The general facts of the matter are so well known I shall mention them but briefly. India has high hopes of becoming self-sufficient in its food supply by next year, but last fall a series of natural calamities—drought in this area, torrential rains in another, locuts, and crop disease, and even earthquake—resulted in such a decimation of India's food supply that millions of people are now threatened with famine. The Government of India has already imported as much gain and rice as it can from elsewhere, but life or death for millions is now directly dependent upon the 2,000,000 tons of wheat provided for in the wheat-for-India bills that are scheduled to come before both Houses of Congress this very week.

As everyone knows, America can lay hands on that much wheat and can spare it without any American going hungry. We always raise more than we can eat in this country. Out in the breadbasket of the Middle West, I myself have seen grain and corn actually heaped on the ground and exposed to all weather simply because the granaries and elevators were already choked to capacity.

Why don't we see to it that India gets the grain, then? Well, in a less complex period of history we probably would, purely on the basis of Christian humanitarianism, but today every move on the international scale carries political connotations and must be made with reference to the global struggle between communism and the free world so that if India is going to get these 2,000,000 tons of wheat from us—either by grant or by loan or by half-grant and half-loan—we must satisfy ourselves that this move meets our humanitarian and political conditions.

And that is a valid consideration. If, for instance, it were the people of China whose Government was applying for 2,000,000 tons of wheat, we would have to let political considerations override humanitarian ones because China unhappily is now our enemy.

And here we come to the nub of the matter. From our point of view, India's political position is suspect. In the struggle between communism and the free world, India is politically on the fence, in some cases for us and in other cases against us. Many Americans therefore, not a few of them in the Halls of Congress, feel that unless India comes into this struggle wholeheartedly on our side, we ought not to help them with the food they need. Other objections are also raised along that line, and the upshot of it is that there is likely to be a real battle in Congress over whether India gets the needed wheat for her people, and the opposition to India is so sizable and so strong that America, through its Congress, may actually say no to India's starving millions.

Let us for the moment put aside any considerations of Christian compassionateness and look at this problem purely on the basis of American self-interest. Admittedly, India is trying to straddle the international political fence, but that being the case, ought not we to do everything we can to get India to come down on our side of the fence rather than to push India over into the Communist side? China with its 450,000,000 people is already on the Communist side—are we not interested in keeping the next largest Asiatic power—India with its 280,000,000—from going Communist too? Isn't that just elementary common sense?

If you thought for months of some way by which India's friendship could be won, could you think of a better way than to save millions of her people from starvation? And if you thought for months of some way by which India could best be alienated from us, could you think of a better way of alienating that nation from us than to say in effect, "Let them starve to death for all we care." Suppose Congress by saying "No" to this bill were to say that very thing in effect—what would the result be?

Well, suppose all of us lived in the south of India, and we were caught in the famine. Day by day we would be growing weaker, gradually passing that invisible line between malnutrition into actual slow starvation. As average, simple, poorly educated Indian people, we would not know much about political issues between communism and the free world. By this time we wouldn't know much more than that we were hungry—desperately, gnawingly hungry—and even worse would be to watch our children with their bloated, empty bellies. We have been told America has more food than it needs and that the American Congress is considering sending some to us. But then week after week after week drags past without the matter even coming up to the American Congress. Then when it finally does, week after week passes of seemingly endless debate, and those among us who can read the newspapers tell that those debates are seldom relieved by any note of compassion. We find this hard to understand from a country that has prided itself on being a follower of the One who taught His followers to feed the hungry. Then the blow falls—America through its chosen representatives says "No" to us.

Somehow—let us say—some of us survive. All of us have seen loved ones die terrible deaths, and we could do nothing for them. What is now our feeling toward America? Is it now one of affection? Do we now feel attracted to its ideals? Do we look upon America now as the champion of the right, as the proponent of the doctrine of the brotherhood of man? The moment you and I put ourselves in the place of the Indian people, we know what their reaction will be if America, with the power of death or life for millions in its tongue, says "No" to the starving.

The fact of the matter is, of course, that the Communists are already shrewdly exploiting the advantages we have yielded to them by our unconscionable delays. Right now—so an official of the Indian Embassy admitted to me last Friday—representatives of India, probably frantic by now (as well they may be) that we may turn down their pleas for wheat, are in Moscow and Peiping. Already Red China has sent them some rice in exchange for India jute, and they are negotiating now for a million tons of grain from Red China. As yet no decision has been made in Moscow. Believe me, it will be one of the turning points of history if Red China and Soviet Russia were to come forward with offers of the needed grain so that India, rightfully anxious that we may say "no" to her, could then withdraw her request for our wheat—then there won't be much question as to which side of the fence India would come down on, is there?

Some folks say that there is no danger of Red China and Soviet Russia giving India the needed grain because neither country has any surplus. That is very true. But don't we know enough about the wily ways of totalitarianism to know that they would not hesitate to take it from their own people if they felt that India could then be captured for communism? Furthermore, they would capitalize on it. I can almost hear what they would say: "America," (they would say to India) "that home of bloated capitalists, with such surpluses of grain they don't even know what to do with it all, wouldn't even loan you food—much less give it to you—out of their surplus. They were going to let you starve until we Communists came along" (they would say). "But Communists really practice the brotherhood of man, and poor as we are, with no surplus of food in our lands, we sacrificed in order to share with you what little we had because we could not stand by callous and indifferent and watch you starve. America has proved by its heartlessness that they care nothing for you; we have proved our friendship for you by our self-sacrifice." So the Communists would say of us.

And what could we say? How could we answer that? If we say "no" to India now and if someday the 280,000,000 Indian people fall like China into the Communist net, then we know that we can write all of Asia off as lost. And if that happens, the awful truth will be that in large measure we shall have carved the calamity out for ourselves by our own heartlessness and by our incredible short-sightedness in the face of the most elemental demand of the Christian gospel, to feed the hunrgy.

Don't anyone think but that America is this moment under the judgment of God. They are looking at us—now look into their faces if you can. Men who once stood straight with self-respect now looking at you out of eyes that burn with the haunted look of cornered beasts; women stretching out bony claws that once were smooth and soft like the hands of your women; children with fearfully distended stomachs gazing uncomprehendingly out of pinched and tiny faces.

"I was hungry and ye gave no food," said the Lord Jesus Christ in His account of the great judgment. And those to whom He said it, looked at Him in amazement: "When saw we thee an hungered * * * and did not minister unto Thee?" they protested. "Verily I say unto you, inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me." And then Jesus Christ uttered the most awful words that can ever be uttered, "And these shall go away into everlasting punishment."

I can claim no special knowledge of history, but I can think of no other time in history when our national self-interest and the call of Christian compassion have so closely coincided as in this matter. To be sure, in the complex of global problems, this particular one is a relatively small one. But a small key can unlock a huge door, and sometimes the solution of a small problem is the key that unlocks the door to the solution of a great problem, and it could even be that providence is proffering us the key to the very heart of Asia. Certainly, at the very least, seldom if ever have our own national self-interest and Christian compassion so cordially walked hand in hand.

There may be those in this congregation who, believing that what has been outlined does represent the Christian position, are now asking the question, "What can I personally do about it?" Let me give two quick answers to that question.

First, as indeed some of you have already expressed yourselves to me, if you feel that you wish to do something over and above what—pray God—our Government may ultimately be doing, you may then welcome the knowledge that you can send monetary gifts to the Indian Ambassador for the purchase of wheat. Or, of course, the clergy of this church, as we often do in one cause or another, will be glad to see that anything handed or sent to us will reach the right place.

Second, while most of us in Washington are disenfranchised citizens, most of us personally know Congressmen, and it will be worth any amount of trouble to talk to them or write to them or telegraph to them to bring the knowledge of our deep concern. That knowledge may help them reach a Christian decision.

"There was a rich man, who was clothed in purple and fine linen, and who feasted sumptuously every day. And at his gate lay a poor man named Lazarus."

America, in the name of Jesus Christ, don't let him die.

H. R. 88, a Bill To Prescribe Safety Requirements for Natural-Gas Companies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. HESELTON
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, in connection with consideration of H. R. 88, I am glad to make available to the membership the following reports of the Federal Power Commission and the Department of Commerce:

REPORT OF THE FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION ON H. R. 88, EIGHTY-SECOND CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION, A BILL TO AMEND THE NATURAL GAS ACT TO AUTHORIZE THE FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION TO PRESCRIBE SAFETY REQUIREMENTS FOR NATURAL-GAS COMPANIES

The Federal Power Commission is of the opinion that enactment of H. R. 88 would be in the public interest. This bill would authorize the Commission to prescribe such requirements, restrictions, and conditions with respect to the construction, extension, operation, and maintenance of facilities for the interstate transmission of natural gas as in its opinion are necessary to the promotion of safety.

Natural gas is a highly inflammable and fugacious commodity. Unless the gas is closely contained and properly handled in transmission, it becomes an agent which may endanger both life and property. This fact has been illustrated by the damaging explosions which have occurred on interstate natural-gas transmission lines in recent years.

At the present time there are no Federal or general regulations governing the construction or operation of interstate natural-gas transmission facilities. Some States have enacted rules and regulations, in the nature of police regulations applicable to interstate pipelines. But scattered and nonuniform regulation of segments of large-scale interstate operations cannot be effectual or satisfactory. Comprehensive and uniform regulations are required.

The only standard guide now generally available for construction and operation of natural-gas transmission facilities is the Code of Pressure Piping which was published in 1942 under the sponsorship of American Society of Mechanical Engineers, and approved by the American Standards Association. Although there have been several minor revisions of that code since 1942, it does not provide adequate standards for modern high-pressure transmission pipelines. Nor is its observance compulsory.

The natural-gas industry in the last few years has been engaged in a tremendous expansion program. Most of the pipelines constructed during this period—as well as those now proposed—are designed to operate at high pressures ranging up to 970 pounds per square inch, and more. And some of such pipeline mileage has been, or will be, constructed through densely populated areas in close proximity to homes and other buildings. This construction is being performed without adequate safety standards, including rules such as those which would prescribe the depth of the pipeline in inhabited areas, its proximity to homes or other buildings, and the media to be used in testing pipelines. There are no provisions of this nature in the above-mentioned ASME Code of Pressure Piping. There should be such regulations to provide the maximum of protection to the public.

Regulations governing the operation of pipeline facilities also are needed to provide minimum safety standards which would serve as a guide to operating companies.

The Commission believes that substantial benefit will result if it is delegated specific authority to prescribe safety requirements for natural-gas companies, as provided by H. R. 88.

The Commission does think, however, that it should not also be made responsible for the enforcement of safety regulations. The inspection of the thousands of miles of natural-gas pipelines which are constructed yearly would present a project of such magnitude as to require manpower wholly disproportionate to the benefits which probably would result and the continued policing of the operations of all natural-gas companies would be an insuperable task. Furthermore, if reasonable regulations are promulgated, there is every reason to believe that companies would adhere to them in their own interests.

The Commission recommends that H. R. 88 be enacted.

Respectfully submitted.

FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION,
MON C. WALLGREN, Chairman.

THE SECRETARY OF COMMERCE,
Washington, May 2, 1951.

Hon. ROBERT CROSSER,
Chairman, Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This letter is in further reply to your request of January 5, 1951, for our comments concerning H. R. 88, a bill to amend the Natural Gas Act to authorize the Federal Power Commission to prescribe safety requirements for natural-gas companies.

H. R. 88 would amend section 7 of the Natural Gas Act by adding thereto a new subsection which would authorize the Federal Power Commission to prescribe safety requirements with respects to the transportation facilities of natural-gas companies.

In view of the rapid increase in mileage of interstate natural-gas pipelines, and in view of the public-utility nature of natural-gas transportation facilities we would have no objection to the enactment of this bill. This new authority would appear to be consistent with the regulatory powers exercised by the Federal Power Commission in the natural-gas field, and would appear to be desirable from the standpoint of protecting the public.

We have been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the submission of this report. If we can be of further assistance, please call upon us.

Sincerely yours,

THOMAS W. S. DAVIS,
Acting Secretary of Commerce.

General MacArthur Opposes a Decision Now on Universal Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOWARD H. BUFFETT
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, our greatest general, Douglas MacArthur, made it plain last week before the Senate committee that he believes it unwise to pass a universal military training bill at this time.

General MacArthur declares this scheme needs more study. He also urges that a decision be delayed until the present emergency is over.

Americans everywhere are hoping that Congress will heed his message on this vital matter.

The following excerpt from the Senate hearings carries most of his testimony on UMT:

Question. Since we are living now, and will continue to live for years to come, in a world of uncertainties, I wonder if you do not think that some system of universal military training which would guarantee that all of our young men would be made available for service, and they would be trained young men, should be invoked so that when the Nation was threatened we would be prepared?

MACARTHUR. As I said, Senator, I am for preparedness, and the maximum preparedness, and the maximum utilization of all our resource.

Now, whether universal military training accomplishes that fact would have to be pretty carefully considered by me.

There are other demands upon our manpower. Whether the total effort to train these great masses of millions of men, whether in actual combat those men would go into the niches for which they have been trained, I don't know. I have not studied the bill. I have not studied the potentialities of it.

WAR BASED ON INDUSTRY

It is not a question, I think, that can be settled by merely whether you are for or whether your are not for it. I am for the utilization of the total manpower that we have.

But whether the program of universal military training all youths along practically the same line, which I understand is the point considered, whether that will reduce and produce (sic) the greatest military effectiveness, I would not attempt to say until I had studied the problem very, very thoroughly.

I believe the greatest possible consideration has got to be given to the demands of industry. I believe that if you are going to prepare the youth, that you have got to understand that modern warfare has as its basis industry.

I believe that you have got to understand that the money that is involved is not limitless; that you have got to get the maximum efficiency for every penny you spend.

WOULD DEFER DECISION

Now, I would not have the slightest hesitation in completely approving that, if I thought that was the best way to get the effectiveness.

Now, at the present moment, of course, this is a future plan you are working on; at the present moment, as I understand it, it is not applicable. There are other and more acute demands.

I should advise most seriously, if I were considering the problem, that I would wait and get through with the emergency that faces us now, and then on what has resulted and what exists then, I would sum up the facts, and make my decision.

If universal military training is the best way to do it, I would unhesitatingly advocate it. The question is the survival of the Nation, and I believe it is every citizen's duty to give that need in time of necessity that is required by the Nation.

JOHNSON. General, do you have any recollection of ever having recommended or advocated universal training of our young men?

MACARTHUR. Oh, yes. I not only many years ago when I went to the Philippines requested the Philippine Government to try to organize it for the blow that was manifestly certain to come, but the first thing I did was to introduce universal military service as far as I was able to accomplish it.

JOHNSON. I mean, as it applied to this Nation.

MACARTHUR. I am quite sure that 25 years ago had we had universal military service, the whole situation would have been different.

It is my belief that had we been prepared before either of these World Wars, there was a very excellent chance that they would not have taken place.

The only thing I address myself to, any doubts that I would have, is as to the efficacy on the military potential that the country could produce.

PHILIPPINE SITUATION DIFFERENT

Now, over in the Philippines, the situation was entirely different. They didn't produce anything; everything was supplied to them.

What was necessary there was to get the manpower to use what was supplied to them; so, there was no question there that universal military service was the proper thing.

Before the First World War, and the Second World War for that matter, industry hadn't assumed such an important part as it has now.

I believe that thing should be carefully studied, Senator, after we get over this present crisis that exists; and, if the best method at that time is for universal military service, as producing the maximum efficiency—like Abou Ben Adhem, my name would lead all the rest.

Endorsement of H. R. 88

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. HESELTON
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, in connection with H. R. 88, on which I have requested an early hearing by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I have received the following letter. It is most encouraging to receive the support of Transcontinental, which has the biggest single natural-gas pipeline installation in the country.

TRANSCONTINENTAL GAS PIPE CORP.,
Houston, Tex., May 3, 1951.

Hon. JOHN W. HESELTON,
Member of Congress,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HESELTON: Thank you for your letter of April 30, together with the Federal Power Commission report on your H. R. 88.

Transcontinental favors this legislation. While I do not want to be specific about other companies, I know that there are other natural-gas transmission systems that likewise favor what you are attempting to do.

We would like to have your committee set hearings on this bill as early as possible and get the ball rolling.

With all good wishes and kindest regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

CURTIS MORRIS,
Vice President.

Let's Do Our Own Thinking

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include, and commend to the attention of the membership of this august body, an editorial by J. J. Jachowicz which appeared in Local 1344 News, published by and for members of local 1344, USA–CIO.

This editorial is entitled "Let's Do Our Own Thinking," and the recommendations which it contains are very appropriate at this time when so many persons throughout the land have been neglecting to use their reasoning faculties. If our Nation is to remain strong, and cope with the challenge which history has thrust at us, we cannot allow emotionalism to rule our actions. The times are perilous, and require steady nerves and calm thinking. The enemy who faces us has given much time to planning the course which he is pursuing. We cannot hope to thwart his plans through actions motivated by emotions alone—our course must be based on reason and experience.

A nation is only as strong as its people. If the people become irrational in their actions, the nation is doomed. Let us think before we speak, and think before we act—let us do our own thinking.

The editorial follows:

LET'S DO OUR OWN THINKING

(By J. J. Jachowicz)

The importance of individual thinking to the preservation of our democracy and our freedom cannot be over emphasized. Too often we let the others do our thinking. Just what do we mean by thinking? To think is to exercise the facilities of good judgment, conception, or inference—to put our good common sense into action.

Any one person who first acts or speaks before he thinks is this country's worst enemy—he is as bad as the person that has other people do his thinking. * * * When the German people defaulted their thinking to Hitler, they surrendered their freedom. When the Russian people defaulted their thinking to Lenin and Stalin, they surrendered their freedom. We must learn to control emotions instead of being controlled by emotions. We must stay away from emotional idolatry of personalities that so beclouds our national thinking today. We must keep far away from bitter cynicism and hatred of those with whom we differ in opinion, we must disagree agreeably and with constructive respect.

We must realize that this wonderful country of ours is greater than any individual woman or man—that its fate and security should not be made a political football to be kicked around by clashing personalities greedy and envious of political power. Too few people in this country realize that too many people in this country are defaulting their thinking to demagogs and that we today are closer to surrendering our freedom than most of us are willing to recognize and admit. When we accept the statements and proposals of demagogs because we are too lazy to think and test their statements and proposals, we can blame no one but ourselves for subsequent events.

The articulate action of a citizen must be constructive, must seek to improve, to build instead of tear down and destroy—must be preceded by serious and responsible thinking. We must do our utmost to preserve our democracy and peace by: (1) Independent thinking; (2) making that thinking articulate by translating it into action at the ballot boxes and in everyday life; and (3) being constructive and positive in that thinking.

Is It Un-American To Be Fair?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE L. HAYS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I would like to include a little article from Newsweek magazine of May 7, 1951. While I hold no special brief for the British, I do believe in being fair, and I do not think the families of the 900 dead and missing men from the Gloucestershire Regiment could be much comforted by some of the unfair criticism that has been thrown at the British. This criticism is largely by American politicians who care not what happens to their country or its friends so long as they can gain political advantage. I, too, have criticized British politicians in the past and may do so if I think it warranted in the future, but I have never deliberately distorted the truth and said the British will not fight. I think the following article will show that they will:

ONLY THE GLOUCESTERS

The Chinese "threw everything at us except dragons," one Briton of the Twenty-ninth Brigade gibed last week, when the Reds waded the waist-deep Imjin River on the moonlit night of April 22. By dawn the Gloucestershire Regiment's 257-year-old First Battalion, nicknamed The Slashers, which stormed Quebec for General Wolfe and wears the Sphinx for battling Napoleon at the Nile, was trapped atop Hill 235.

For 80 harrowing hours the Gloucesters battled against 16-to-1 odds, against gnawing hunger, against burning thirst, against sleeplessness, killing a dozen Chinese for every Briton. They ran out of ammunition, but they waved away Flying Boxcars lest any airdrop by mistake fall to the Chinese only 35 yards away. Their radio remained reassuring up to the last message. "Batteries running down. Still holding out." Only after the United Nations withdrawal from the Imjin had been made good did their commander, Lt. Col. J. P. Carne, order his companies to break out to safety, while he, a chaplain, and a doctor, stayed with the wounded.

As the 100-odd survivors of the 1,000-man battalion trickled back to the U. N. lines, Brig. Tom Brodie, commanding the Twenty-ninth Brigade, wrote in the records of the Gloucesters: "Only the Gloucesters could have done it.".

Great Debate Is Marked by Many Paradoxes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY
OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, I should like to call attention to the following article by Mr. James Reston, special correspondent of the New York Times:

GREAT DEBATE IS MARKED BY MANY PARADOXES—MACARTHUR IMPRESSES MANY OF HIS FOES AND RAISES QUESTIONS FOR FRIENDS

(By James Reston)

WASHINGTON, May 5.—General of the Army Douglas MacArthur succeeded in doing one thing this week that nobody thought was possible—he managed to shake some of the prejudices of both his supporters and his detractors in the Senate, and he left most of the Senators both a little more impressed and a little more perplexed than they were when he arrived.

He disappointed and yet impressed his detractors because he proved to be a skillful witness—quick, clear, eloquent, and independent in his judgments, sometimes bitterly opposing the administration's views and then again supporting the administration.

At the same time, he both wowed and depressed his most rabid supporters because, while he hit the administration hard, he often used arguments which contradicted the pet themes of Senators TAFT and WHERRY, and once even refused to confess dark suspicions about Secretary of State Acheson.

AGAINST THE RULES

This, of course, is against the union rules in Washington. If a man is against the administration he is expected to be against everything it supports, except the Constitution. Also, he is expected to be loyal to, or at least considerate of not only his own prejudices, but the prejudices of his supporters.

The general, however, probably because he has been away so long, did not always comply, and in the process he illustrated both the emotional appeal of his arguments and the element of paradox in the whole controversy.

Two arguments ran through his voluminous testimony, both expressed with great passion, both having great emotional and political appeal for Senators: First, that nobody had any right to buy time in Korea with the blood of his young fellow-countrymen, and, second, that if it was victory the Senators wanted, he could get it for them wholesale.

Since the devil you know is always worse than the devil you don't know, this argument won powerful support, particularly since the general testified to the weakness of the Soviet transportation system and the vulnerability of Red China to economic, naval, and air blockade. But the element of paradox kept coming into his argument as the hours went along, and this element disturbed many of his most faithful supporters. For example:

(1) The general said it was the responsibility of the administration to decide last year on whether Communist China was going to intervene in the Korean war. A theater commander, such as himself, had only limited opportunities to make an estimate of any such decision, he testified. Yet he did not hesitate to base his proposal for the bombardment of Manchuria on his own estimate that the Russians would not intervene—an estimate not shared by the administration.

(2) The general proposed a strategy in the Far East which he conceded might bring about a major war, though he guessed that it would not, but at the same time he conceded that global strategy was not his responsibility, that he did not know the details of United States or allied preparedness, of Soviet strength in Europe, of the Soviet atomic bomb stockpile, or even of our own atomic development.

NO ATTACK ON RUSSIA

(3) It was imperative, the general said, that once you get into a war, you destroy the enemy's capacity to make war upon you, but he shied away on various occasions from any suggestions that we should attack the Soviet Union, which is the source of the enemy's effective war-making capacity.

(4) He bitterly criticized the administration's limited war policy in Korea, yet he proposed a limited war of his own: No United States land battles in Asia, no attacks on the Soviet supply routes, etc. Nor did he explain what he would do if by attacking Manchuria the war were merely pushed deeper into Asia, with Soviet territory instead of Chinese territory being used as the Communists' privileged sanctuary.

(5) Communism, he said, was the enemy, but he refused yesterday to identify the Soviet Union as the center of that world conspiracy. Indeed, he based a great part of his argument on the thesis that, while the Soviet Union and Red China were in a limited partnership for the present, the center and decisive enemy in Korea was the Peiping regime.

(6) The center of Soviet industrial strength, he testified, was in European Russia, and it was important to have bases from which that strength could, if necessary, be attacked. Indeed, allies, he agreed, were useful, but he outlined a policy for the Far East which he agreed was opposed by all our principal allies.

(7) Moreover, one of his main complaints, shared by the whole committee, was that the allies were not doing enough to help us in Korea. Yet he insisted that if we expanded the war in the Far East, our allies would go along just as they did when the Korean war broke out. Leadership was what they needed, he observed.

(8) Finally, though he has repeatedly testified in the past that the President and only the President could make great decisions of policy involving the military, he rested his argument on the thesis that the Joint Chiefs of Staff were in "substantial" agreement with him (though they disagreed on bombing Manchuria and did not pass judgment on the political questions involved in the President's decision to oppose the MacArthur strategy).

This element of paradox runs through many other aspects of the debate as well. The general was dismissed, not because he differed with the administration's strategy, but because he carried his differences over the head of his Commander in Chief to the people. Yet this aspect of the matter was minimized in the Senate hearings.

The general has been noted in the past for the discipline of his command, though he insisted this week that all officers should have the right, if they disagreed with their commanding officers, to carry their disagreements to the public.

STRIKING PARADOX

As a matter of fact, the most striking paradox of all is that the general comes out of this week's testimony as the most enthusiastic supporter of the most ambitious interpretation of the Truman doctrine and is being opposed by President Truman for doing so.

Communism is the enemy and wherever it shows its face we should attempt to meet it, he testified. Moreover, he insisted (while still protesting that he did not know the details of our preparedness or our allies' or the Soviet Union's) that we should meet it in Korea in accordance with his strategy, without the Western Allies, if necessary.

One ally we would have in that event, he felt sure, was Chiang Kai-shek and his Chinese Nationalists, and between us, he concluded, "victory" in the Far East could be won.

The general would not be drawn into discussion of the cost in manpower and dollars of opposing Communist aggression everywhere in the world. All he would say was that he was for adequate preparedness.

Thus, the general left many of his supporters with the unhappy feeling that he was more internationalist than the Truman administration, more willing to take risks, more ready to place the country on a war footing than many of his backers are.

At the same time, the administration was equally disturbed by the end of the week because of the personal impression the general had made and the emotional appeal of his proposals to end the slaughter.

Early this week there was a tendency among administration supporters here to dismiss the general's great popular successes in New York and Chicago. Wait, they said, until he has to submit to the hard give-and-take of questions and answers on the Hill. Now that the questions and answers have taken place, however, the administration is not so sure.

PERSONALITY VERSUS LOGIC

In any conflict between a great personality and a logical argument the outcome here is never very sure. General MacArthur was an impressive witness. The members of the Foreign Relations and the Military Affairs Committees, with the outstanding exception of Senator BRIEN MCMAHON, of Connecticut, hesitated to go much beyond the $32 questions. They found many vague areas in the general's thinking and developed various inconsistencies in his testimony, but they had no answer to his persistent references to the casualty lists in Korea.

Moreover, the contacts between the State Department and Capitol Hill have been so poor now for so long that the administration's case for the limited war is not even understood by most of its own supporters in the Senate.

General MacArthur thus moved into something of a vacuum himself. He is benefiting not only from his own illustrious record as a soldier and proconsul in Japan but from the decline in the prestige of the civilian branch of the Government, and particularly of the Department of State.

Thus, the final paradox of the situation is that, while this started out as a debate on the civilian control of the military, the administration will now depend, in its rebuttal, not on the first civilian Cabinet officer, Secretary of State Acheson, but on the military: General Marshall, Gen. Omar Bradley, and, if the going gets too tough, on General MacArthur's former aide, Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower.

Address of Hon. Christian A. Herter, of Massachusetts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT HALE
OF MAINE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, many of us have from time to time been troubled by the distinctions, if any, between treaties and executive agreements. Many of us have also been concerned by the implications of article 9 of the North Atlantic Pact. Indeed, there has been in another body a great debate about constitutional rights and duties under this treaty. In a fairly wide reading on this subject, I have seen nothing so informative as the address delivered on April 26, 1951, by my friend and colleague, the Honorable CHRISTIAN A. HERTER, of Massachusetts, before the American Society of International Law. The text follows:

ADDRESS BY HON. CHRISTIAN A. HERTER TO THE AMERICAN SOCIETY OF INTERNATIONAL LAW, APRIL 26, 1951

Three years ago you did me the honor of inviting me to appear before you to discuss the relationship of the House of Representatives to some of the more pressing international problems then pending before Congress. At that time I pointed out the increasing importance of the role which the House was inevitably called upon to play in the international scene chiefly because of the many economic or fiscal matters being dealt with by international agreement which could only be implemented under our Constitution through legislation initiated in the House. At that time I was concerned by the problem of educating the House to deal appropriately with such matters when at best only 6 percent of the Members, namely, those serving on the Foreign Affairs Committee, could be expected to sit through the long, intricate hearings upon which final decisions had to be made. That problem is no less acute today than it was 3 years ago. If anything, it is more acute. Prior to the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, fiscal and military matters in the international field were assigned to the Banking and Currency Committee and the Military Affairs Committee, respectively. These are now referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

All of you are of course conscious of the fact that our economic and our military participation in international affairs is becoming increasingly important. This means that the House of Representatives must more and more be consulted and counted upon for informed action to implement and make effective the international agreements which may be entered into by the Executive. What then should be the role of the House with respect to responsibility for approving of those agreements in the first instance?

It is my contention that any international agreement entered into by the Executive which requires ultimate implementation by the Congress as a whole should, in the first instance, be approved by the Congress as a whole. To call such an agreement a treaty and submit it to the Senate alone as a treaty gives effect to the constitutional safeguard of requiring a two-thirds affirmative vote by the Senate, but completely overlooks the fact that the House of Representatives has withheld from it the educational process which must inevitably accompany any form of approval of that treaty, and likewise places upon the House of Representatives the burden of responsibility of initiating necessary legislation for implementation, with no initial voice in its approval.

The question as to whether or not an agreement should be submitted to the Congress in the form of a treaty or of an Executive agreement requiring congressional action by joint resolution or as an Executive agreement entered into without approval of the Congress is a matter of Executive judgment. In my opinion, however, that Executive action, in the absence of any constitutional change with respect to the approval of international agreements, should follow very simple lines. First, any international agreement which does not require any implementation but which provides for a departure from the existing status quo as between our country and any other country or countries should be submitted to the Senate alone as a treaty. Second, any international agreement which merely clarifies existing agreements without altering their substance should properly be considered Executive agreements requiring no approval by the Congress. Third, all international agreements which require implementation on the part of the Congress to become effective should be submitted to the Congress as Executive agreements requiring formal approval of both branches by joint resolution. I specifically suggest a joint resolution rather than a concurrent resolution because a joint resolution has the force of law, having been signed by the President after the action of the Congress, whereas a concurrent resolution is an act of the Congress alone.

The executive branch of the Government has, to a certain extent, followed the course which I have suggested in a number of international agreements which required implementation. As I recall it, the original UNRRA legislation (Public Law 267, 78th Cong.) is an excellent case in point. Before submission, administration leaders discussed with legislative leaders in the Congress the question of submitting our ratification of United States participation in UNRRA in the form of a treaty or a joint resolution to be approved by both Houses of Congress. The latter method was decided upon, in view of the fact that ratification by the United States in the form of a treaty would have still required implementation by both Houses of the Congress. The matter of financial contribution to UNRRA could, of course, not be made effective by treaty, but had to be dealt with by both houses of Congress. During the Eightieth Congress, the United States became a member of, and assumed international responsibility in, the International Refugee Organization (Public Law 146, 80th Cong.), the World Health Organization (Public Law 643, 80th Cong.), the revised International Labor Organization, the ILO instrument of amendment (Public Law 843, 80th Cong.), the Caribbean Commission (Public Law 431, 80th Cong.), the South Pacific Commission (Public Law 403, 80th Cong.). In addition, during the Seventy-ninth Congress, the Congress, through both Houses, exercised its power to bring about United States membership in the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank (Public Law 171, 79th Cong.) and in the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (Public Law 174, 79th Cong.)

However, there has been a notable exception to the practice followed by the executive with respect to agreements which require implementation. I refer to the North Atlantic Treaty. That treaty was never given consideration by the House until the question of its implementation arose, and in that implementation there are still certain gaps to be filled on which I personally believe that the House should take action. I refer specifically to the very controversial one with respect to the sending of troops to Europe to be placed under the command of the Supreme Allied Commander, Europe.

The North Atlantic Treaty in its major provisions is clearly not a self-executing treaty. Whereas certain general pledges are made in articles 3 and 5, article 9 is the article which makes provision for the manner in which the implementation of those pledges shall be furthered. In order to refresh your recollection, the text of article 9 is as follows:

"The parties hereby establish a council, on which each of them shall be represented to consider matters concerning the implementation of this treaty. The council shall be so organized as to be able to meet promptly at any time. The council shall set up such subsidiary bodies as may be necessary; in particular it shall establish immediately a defense committee which shall recommend measures for the implementation of articles 3 and 5."

You will note that the council set up in the article merely has the power to consult, and that the defense committee provided for can only make recommendations. Thereafter, each contracting nation must take action under its constitutional system upon the specific recommendations.

There is only one specific recommendation which has been made public and then been acted upon by the United States. That is the recommendation with respect to the appointment of the Supreme Allied Commander, Europe. Although the same recommendation provided in some detail for the organization, command structure, and general operational procedure for an integrated NATO force, for security reasons, this document is secret. But the President's letter to General Eisenhower designating him as Supreme Allied Commander, Europe, as well as operational commander of all of the United States forces in Europe, the Eastern Atlantic, and the Mediterranean was made public on December 19, 1950. That letter made it clear that General Eisenhower would serve in two capacities. It likewise provided in the third paragraph, and I quote:

"Subject to overriding requirements of the Supreme Allied Commander, Europe, the mission's routine employment, training, and administration of these forces will continue to be handled through command channels heretofore existing."

That paragraph makes it clear that General Eisenhower, as the Supreme Allied Commander, Europe, can in his own discretion override General Eisenhower as commander of the American forces in Europe and hence, in his capacity as a commander on behalf of the 12 participating nations under the North Atlantic Treaty operate under certain circumstances free from the chain of command which leads to our own Commander in Chief, namely, the President of the United States.

I do not want to stress this point unduly, but I think that an objective consideration of it will indicate that a serious constitutional question may be posed as to the right of the President to alienate American troops from his own command without congressional approval. In view of this doubt, it would appear to me to be important that both branches of the Congress should specifically give their approval to whatever assignment of troops may be made to this command.

I am reinforced in this belief by the steps which have already been taken by the Congress in implementation of the North Atlantic Treaty. In October of 1949, the Congress passed Public Law 329 of the Eighty-first Congress, known as the Mutual Defense

Assistance Act of 1949. Let me read you the first section of that act:

"SEC. 101. In view of the coming into force of the North Atlantic Treaty and the establishment thereunder of the Council and the Defense Committee which will recommend measures for the common defense of the North Atlantic area, and in view of the fact that the task of the Council and the Defense Committee can be facilitated by immediate steps to increase the integrated defensive armed strength of the parties to the treaty, the President is hereby authorized to furnish military assistance in the form of equipment, materials, and services to such nations as are parties to the treaty and have heretofore requested such assistance. Any such assistance furnished under this title shall be subject to agreements, further referred to in section 402, designed to assure that the assistance will be used to promote an integrated defense of the North Atlantic area and to facilitate the development of defense plans by the Council and the Defense Committee under article 9 of the North Atlantic Treaty and to realize unified direction and effort; and after the agreement by the Government of the United States with defense plans as recommended by the Council and the Defense Committee, military assistance hereunder shall be furnished only in accordance therewith."

This section anticipated the development of defense plans by the Council and the Defense Committee under article 9 by making certain goods and services available to the nations party to the North Atlantic Treaty even before specific recommendations had been made by the Defense Committee. The act then went on to detail the amount of money that was authorized, the purposes for which that money should be spent, the areas in which it was to be spent, and the types of equipment and services which could be furnished. Under section 406, it specifically gave authority to the President to assign civilian personnel of the Armed Forces to any agency or nation for the purpose of enabling the President to furnish assistance under the act, and authorized the employment of technical experts and engineering consultants not to exceed 15 persons at any one time, also to implement the act. Furthermore, section 405 went so far as to permit the Congress by concurrent resolution of the two Houses to terminate assistance to any nation under the act. Public Law 621 of the second session of the Eighty-first Congress, which was passed in July of 1950, reiterated the principal provisions of the 1949 act, but made provisions for further detailed implementation.

My point in referring specifically to these two acts is that both of them were initiated in the House of Representatives and that both of them went into meticulous detail with respect to the method by which, under article 9, matériel of war of all kinds including civilian personnel and technical experts could be furnished by the President in implementation of article 9 of the North Atlantic Treaty. However, no reference whatever was made in these acts with respect to the assignment of troops by the President, and it certainly appears to me to be an absurdity that the Congress should be called upon for detailed authorization with respect to inanimate objects and specialized personnel, but should not be called upon to take action with respect to combat manpower.

It is true that the Senate has passed both a Senate resolution and a concurrent resolution approving of the sending of four divisions to Europe to be placed under General Eisenhower's command, but from present indications, it would appear as if the executive does not feel it necessary to get House approval to such a resolution. The concurrent resolution was passed by the Senate on April 6, sent to the House, and referred to the House Committee on Foreign Affairs. No hearings have yet been held on it, nor is there any indication that any such hearings will be held. In my opinion, this is a serious mistake. A mistake which may lead to serious difficulties.

No one can deny that the House of Representatives has a constitutional duty to initiate appropriation bills and must participate with the Senate in passing legislation to raise troops. Ten days ago, when the bill for the raising of additional troops through selective service and universal military training was before the House, an amendment to prevent the use of the troops raised under that bill from serving in the European theater was defeated by the small margin of five votes. It was an amendment which could, of course, only apply to men hereafter raised under the terms of that particular bill. However, an appropriation bill making an appropriation for the Armed Forces for the coming year will soon be before us. Without any question an amendment will be offered to that appropriation bill which would limit the use of the men provided for therein to the military service in such a way as to prevent the sending of troops to Europe without the specific consent of the Congress. There is, in my opinion, a very real possibility that such an amendment will be adopted. And if it should be adopted and concurred in by the Senate, the whole question as to the sending of troops to Europe would remain unresolved and would have to be considered de novo by the Congress. For this reason, it would seem to me to be a much wiser procedure for the House to be called upon to act on the Senate concurrent resolution at the soonest possible moment in order that this issue may be resolved.

While I have spent considerable time in examining the relationship of the House to the North Atlantic Treaty, I have done so only for the purpose of reemphasizing my original contention that the North Atlantic Treaty, as well as any other treaty which requires implementation, should be submitted to the Congress as an agreement requiring joint action by the two branches. Too many uncertainties with respect to the action which the House might take arise if the latter is not called upon to act when policy is first made. If I am correct in this conclusion, then I believe that unless executive procedures consistently follow the course outlined, it would be wise to consider seriously a constitutional amendment making such procedure mandatory.

The Marvel House Mother's Day Message

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BROOKS HAYS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following excellent statement by Mrs. C. E. B. (Blanche) Ward, organizer of the League for the American Home and Marvel House, Inc., whose address is 1214 Carnegie Hall, New York City:

MOTHER'S DAY MESSAGE

The French skeptic, Voltaire, emphasized the mother's dominant place as the source of spiritual life when he said, "My mother made it impossible for me to be a Christian but Wesley's mother made it impossible for him to be anything else."

Dr. Henry C. Link, of the New York Psychological Center, similarly stresses the mother's conspicuous function as guide in the child's development of faith. He declares, "The strategic time is when the child is too young to understand but not too young to accept." That malleable period when he unconsciously absorbs everything around him, and subconsciously tucks it away for conscious adult use.

If modern psychology can be trusted in its assertion that the permanent bent of a child's life is determined before it is 2 years of age, then the early home atmosphere and training provided by the mother with her sympathetic insight, is a nation's most priceless possession.

Mrs. Compton, having received the degree of doctor of laws for her successful motherhood in the rearing of her four famous children, when besieged by reporters for her formula, laughed, "Formula? Just the Bible and common sense."

The American heritage of freedom and Christian civilization hang upon the acceptance and practice of this fundamental conviction. Napoleon when asked by his advisers, "What can we do to make a stronger, more invincible France," replied, "Train French women to be good mothers."

We should pray that our legislators may consider these ponderous facts when determining their most pregnant, far-reaching policies, and make their appropriations accordingly. All any nation needs is men and women with good hearts and minds. For nothing can ever go so ill with a nation that character cannot cure it.

Universal Military Training Fails in England—Generals Are Cursing It

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOWARD H. BUFFETT
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, before this Congress goes further toward the goal of the militarists, UMT, it should study the record of conscription in England.

In England now, as in France, Germany, Italy, and Japan in past decades, UMT is a one-way street to disaster and national decline.

Military conscription was initiated in England in 1947.

Already it has become a millstone around her neck, threatening to sink her both militarily and economically.

This judgment, Mr. Speaker, is not mine. It is the expert appraisal of B. H. Liddell Hart, famous British military analyst.

Captain Hart is described by General Guderian, chief of German armored forces as "the best analytical brain in the world."

Gen. George Patton declared, "I have been nourished on his books for 20 years."

I urge Members who want America to be effectively defended to read Hart's latest book, Defense of the West.

In the following passage from that work, Hart sums up the colossal failure in England of universal military training:

When the National Service bill was introduced in 1947, almost all the generals welcomed it and gave it their blessing. Now they are cursing it. The way that expert opinion has swung around is most remarkable.

It was natural that they should favor it in principle, since it promised a larger army than could possibly be raised by the voluntary system, and seemed likely to remove many of the problems of recruiting and organization that had been a worry in the past.

But the experience of peacetime conscription has changed their views, and led them to see that it produces more problems than it solves—and worse ones. The now common note of condemnation is testimony to the common sense of present-day generals.

Whatever the theoretical advantages of conscription, in practice it is ruining the efficiency of the army, and proving fatal to its readiness to meet an emergency.

The attempt to work a mixed system, combining short-term conscripts with long-term regulars, is failing in both ways.

Conscripts cannot be trained in 18 months, or 2 years, to the high grade of skill required for modern warfare. By the time they are trained even to an employable level, so little of their period of service remains that their employment is bad economy.

It swells the bill for transportation out of all proportion to the service they render—the estimated cost of movements is $31,600,000 for 1950–51 compared with $5,600,000 before the war.

At the same time the mixture heavily handicaps the training of the regulars and their effective utilization. A very large proportion of them are absorbed directly or indirectly in the training machine for the conscripts and in caretaker jobs at home and overseas.

The enlarged size of the army has much increased the scale of administrative duties, and regulars are naturally called on to undertake these. In sum, far fewer than before the war are available for incorporation in fighting formations.

That means Britain has, in effect, a much smaller force available to meet an emergency than she had in 1939. With so few formations, commanders and staffs cannot get adequate practice in exercises with troops—so that even the force Britain has cannot be properly trained. Worse still, it cannot be adequately equipped—because the money that is needed for new weapons is swallowed up in paying for useless mouths.

Pay alone absorbs $238,000,000 of the money that is being spent on the army. In 1939 it absorbed only $33,600,000, yet pay rates were proving more attractive to recruits than they are now.

As the value of money has depreciated, however, it is fairer to put the contrast in terms of percentages of the total cost of the army. Pay now absorbs nearly 30 percent of the army's budget, compared with 8 percent in 1939. But pay is only part of the ordinary cost of maintaining a soldier, irrespective of the army's operative equipment and more permanent requirements.

This mere man-maintenace cost (pay, food, clothing, carriage, and other supplies) absorbs nearly 60 percent of the army's budget, compared with 30 percent before the war. On the other hand, scarcely more than 10 percent is now given to the provision of warlike equipment, whereas in 1939 nearly 40 percent was devoted to it.

These figures show how little security value Britain is getting for the present immense outlay. They make it clear that Britain is maintaining the most uneconomic kind of army.

If the number of men were cut down, a much larger percentage of the money could be devoted to military equipment without any increase in the budget. That would also release more manpower for industry, and thus help Britain's industrial effort. With a smaller number of men, if they were all regulars, a large number of fighting formations could be produced, ready for action.

Conscription is a millstone round Britain's neck—threatening to sink her both militarily and economically.

Mr. Speaker, will America learn the lesson before it is too late?

France, Germany, Italy, Japan—and now England—have become victims of universal military training.

Again I challenge the proponents of UMT to present some credible evidence that its evil consequences elsewhere will not follow in America.

The Truth Will Out

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, as part of my remarks, I am including a timely editorial that appeared in the Washington Times-Herald, May 6, 1951:

THE AWFUL MYSTERY THAT EXPLAINS ITSELF

Piece by piece, clue by clue, the most terrible and suspenseful detective story of all time continues to unravel before our eyes.

The latest chapter in this blood-spattered tale is, of course, the case of MacArthur now coming to the light in spite of all frauds and maneuvers.

THE RAW DEAL HAS CRASHED

When the President fired the general in the dead of night those short few weeks ago, the whole world was shocked to an alert. A President does not suddenly, at 1 a. m., send for the newspapers and announce that he has cut himself off from the ablest man he has ever met.

That is, no President in a sound condition does such a thing.

The firing of MacArthur, taken with the manner of his firing, made a basic fact plain to everybody from the Politburo in the Kremlin, to the boys in the back room of the late Charley Binaggio's Democratic vote-stealing emporium in Kansas City.

Vast and profoundly important internal explosions are shaking the Truman gang loose from its grip on the governmental power.

The Raw Deal's pitch for the moment after Mr. Truman's midnight brainstorm was the smear that MacArthur had been relieved of duty because he was not only insubordinate, but incompetent.

That foul effort was hardly begun before the Congress, in response to national demand, invited the supposedly disgraced and broken insubordinate to come before it and say something.

THE POWER OF HONESTY

And so he came and spoke and told his story in words that brought tears. Why? Because dignity and candor and honesty of spirit are so rare in this city at this time that men cannot bear their presence without emotional anguish.

We are so long, now, poisoned by the press agent's flash and the phrase maker's twisted version, that for a citizen of powerful character and powerful mind merely to rise and speak the truth as he sees it, is to dislocate everybody's system of behavior.

When MacArthur had finished his address to Congress, that would have seemed enough in itself to jar the last sleeper awake.

But now following has come his smashing point-by-point in the Senate testimony that has been forced out into the light—once more against all the artistry of men long skilled at smothering the truth that hurts.

Thus, we have the running record of the general's testimony and with it, too, the cheap and narrow, penny ante attempts of such cross-examiners as Senators MCMAHON, FULBRIGHT, and KEFAUVER, the Chattanooga goo goo.

It is a devastating exposure. For it does happen, now and then, in spite of all the snide denials of shallow minds, that a human being turns up who fits the title, "hero."

MacArthur's calm, unhurried, unshaken fidelity to the truth in the record tells all who read it why he is one who fits the title. Heroism is not mere insensibility to whipping bullets.

Heroism is also the power of the soul to stand calm against every dog in the pack snapping at your heels, for that which you can show to be the right.

Thus, the MacArthur text is worth the reading, to help you understand a hero.

But even more than that, it helps you understand the burden of death, desolation, and ruin the United States of America, of 1951, is brought to carry because three Presidents of the United States have been failures.

THREE PRESIDENTS WHO HAVE FAILED

The historic fact is that Woodrow Wilson, Franklin D. Roosevelt, and Harry S. Truman, each in his hour of decision, did not understand his job or would not live up to it.

Karl Marx was an insane political adventurer of the nineteenth century Europe who preached that all the world must be destroyed so it could be rebuilt in the image of nothing human. The short title for this was called communism.

Marx was a triviality in the politics of the world until Woodrow Wilson, with the help of like-minded men in Britain and France, failed the moment of power after the war of 1914–18. That let communism come to world significance in Russia.

In 1933, Franklin D. Roosevelt saved world communism from collapse first by recognizing the Soviet Government of Russia and then by allowing Communists to penetrate the Government of the United States so far that even yet we do not know all. Alger Hiss is but a surface symbol of the hidden total.

Again, in the war of 1939–45, Roosevelt let communism harvest victory at Tehran and Yalta.

Truman, as soon as he took office, began at Potsdam the unrelieved succession of blunders that now has Americans dying in Korea and the best American soldier of our time, with relentless courage, dynamiting the truth out into the light at last, here in Washington.

The truth is coming out. And it is awful to behold.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in the RECORD two articles from the New York Times, on Sunday, May 6, 1951, the first by Mr. Gladwin Hill, who is doing much to arouse the Nation to the need for a better farm-labor policy, and the second by the North American Newspaper Alliance:

PENALTY FOR HIRING WETBACKS HAILED—EMPLOYERS AND EMPLOYEES GIVE QUALIFIED BACKING—POLICY WOULD REVOKE CONTRACTS

(By Gladwin Hill)

LOS ANGELES, May 5.—The inauguration this week by Federal officials of a get-tough policy in regard to the employment of illegal Mexican aliens on western farms received hopefully favorable, although qualified, responses from both employer and labor quarters.

The employment of the Mexican wetbacks who cross the border illegally in numbers responsibly estimated at upward of 1,000,000 a year, although generally tantamount, to harboring a fugitive from justice, has been held to be not a prosecutable offense under present law. But such employment by farmers who also use legally contracted labor from Mexico is a violation of the United States-Mexico agreement covering the temporary importation of Mexican nationals.

However, the practice of employing low-paid wetbacks (so called because they wade across the Rio Grande), often alongside of legally contracted Mexican labor, is widespread in the Southwest. Up to now it has been ignored officially as far as the international agreement was concerned.

CAMPAIGN OF ENFORCEMENT

This week the United States Employment Service announced its intention of starting, in collaboration with the United States Immigration and Naturalization Service, a vigorous campaign to enforce the agreement and penalize farmers employing wetbacks by revoking their contracting privileges. Mexican labor is hired under contract to make up for purported shortages of domestic citizen farm labor.

B. A. Harrigan, secretary of the Imperial Valley Farmers Association at El Centro, 15 miles north of the border, said, "We'll have to watch and see how effective the new program is."

Although the association has a nominal policy against wetbacks employment, it has been one of the principal targets of recent complaints on this score.

"If they can get this program on a workable basis, we'd prefer legal labor any time." Mr. Harrigan said. "We've always been for a legal labor program, but the processing has been too slow to fill our requirements."

PROCESSING OF APPLICATION

He said it had taken from early January to mid-April to process a recent application of the association for legal contract labor, by the end of which time the need for it had passed.

"We've made up our minds," he said, "to sacrifice crops rather than go out and scream about this."

Dr. Ernesto Galarza, vice president of the National Farm Labor Union, AFL, which has been campaigning against wetback employment as discriminatory against citizen labor, said:

"The union expects that the new policy of law enforcement on violations of the Mexico-United States farm labor agreement will begin here and now in the Imperial Valley.

"The record shows that the Federal agencies responsible for these obligations have exercised very loose discretion as to how much they would let the corporation farmers get away with."

Glenn Brockway, United States Employment Service regional director in San Francisco, said the rigorous inspection of farms to be launched immediately would constitute a formal investigation of complaints made last February against the concern of O'Dwyer & Mets, a leading vegetable company. Keith Mets is president of the Imperial Valley Farmers Association, and Frank O'Dwyer, his partner, is a brother of William O'Dwyer, United States Ambassador to Mexico. About 300 wetbacks were apprehended on their ranch, and the Farm Labor Union demanded that, under the international agreement, their contracting privilege be revoked immediately.

This was not done, the ensuing interval having been taken up with a preliminary investigation by the Employment Service. Details of the investigation have not been made public.

Dr. Galarza indicated this week end that the Employment Service's apparent intention of dealing with the O'Dwyer & Mets concern only on the basis of current employment conditions would not be considered satisfactory by his union.

DEPORTATIONS RISE TO 580,000 A YEAR—RATE IS 50 TIMES THAT OF 10 YEARS AGO—DRIVE ON ILLEGAL ENTRIES ALSO STEPPED UP

WASHINGTON, May 5.—The United States is yearly deporting 50 times as many aliens as was the case 10 years ago. In the drive to bolster internal security it is also stopping a record number seeking to enter the country illegally, the ratio being six times that of 5 years ago.

The Immigration and Naturalization Service, according to A. R. Mackey, Acting Immigration Commissioner, deported in the past year nearly 580,000 aliens, roughly double the total of the previous year. He stated that arrests of those seeking entry totaled another 470,000, which also was almost double the total of the preceding year.

In addition, he said, 154 aliens were free under bond pending court determination of their deportability on subversive charges. About 200 others were under arrest on similar charges, he added.

Smuggling of aliens went on along the seacoasts and along the Mexican and Canadian borders, he declared. The Mexican border, he added, was the avenue for thousands of European aliens being smuggled in as Mexicans seeking migratory farm work.

European aliens inevitably succeeded when they sought to cross the Mexican border, he asserted, factors being a thin border patrol and illegal entry of Mexicans that had reached such proportions that it is now comparable to an invasion.

The Commissioner said that the crush of those seeking entry, legally or illegally, had been terrific since the end of the war and that the trend was still upward.

He stated that, in the past year, immigration officers had boarded 60,000 arriving ships and 87,000 airplanes in the drive to cull out the undesirables and the ineligible.

"All indications point to an anticipated increase in the number of attempted smuggling operations," he warned.

Korean Campaign

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, I should like to include in the RECORD the following article by Mr. Hanson W. Baldwin. Mr. Baldwin is known throughout the world as one of our best-informed writers on military affairs. The article appeared in the New York Times yesterday. It is an excellent analysis of the Korean campaign. Many persons have alleged that we were guilty of faulty troop dispositions last fall when the enemy forced us into a rapid retreat. I note that Mr. Baldwin is of the opinion that the enemy's success at that time was due in part to our mistakes, including our faulty troop dispositions.

The article follows:

CHINESE ARE REPULSED BUT BATTLE ISN'T OVER—ENEMY IN KOREA SHOWN TO BE UNABLE TO CARRY ON A SUSTAINED OFFENSIVE

(By Hanson W. Baldwin)

The Communist spring offensive in Korea took a breather last week as the enemy regrouped his forces, possibly for a resumption of the defensive, or a second blow.

The balance sheet of battle after the first round in the long-anticipated drive was, so far, in our favor, but there was unending fighting ahead, and the enemy had scored some gains. The enemy accomplishments in the first 2 weeks of attack were:

1. Maximum advances at points of deepest penetration of 30 to 35 miles. In part our retreat was clearly attributable to enemy breakthrough, or enemy pressure, but in part it represented a planned rolling with the punch.

2. Clearance of all UN forces, except in a small sector near the east coast, from North Korea. This retreat south of the thirty-eighth parallel—though unimportant militarily—is of potential significance psychologically and politically if the enemy should soon prove willing to negotiate an end to the war on the basis of the status quo in Korea prior to last June—something that seems unlikely.

3. Severance by the enemy of the Seoul-Chunchon lateral road—not by any means vital to our defense but useful for supply purposes—and capture of Chunchon, important road junction and pivot in central Korea, for possible further offensive operations.

PSYCHOLOGICAL FACTORS

4. Emphatic reassertion of the Chinese Communist combat and psychological superiority over the South Koreans. The breakthrough of the enemy on the central front was against a South Korean division. As an officer puts it: "A very unusual thing is happening in Korea. The South Koreans now fight very well, indeed, when they are opposing North Koreans. But just let one lone Chinese come at them, with possibly the intention of surrendering, and the South Koreans break and run like hell. I suppose this is a throwback to the centuries of oppression which the Koreans suffered under the Chinese. Also they know that the Chinese have no mercy on anyone, themselves included."

5. The imposition of fairly heavy casualties—killed, wounded, prisoners, and missing—on two South Korean divisions, the Fifth and Sixth, and on one British battalion and a few American smaller units.

UNITED STATES-UN ACCOMPLISHMENTS

These enemy gains to date were, however, in no sense decisive and they were more than balanced by United States and UN accomplishments:

1. Seoul, unimportant militarily, but of some significance logistically and of considerable importance politically and psychologically if the enemy should contemplate cease-fire negotiations, was still in our hands at the end of the first phase of the enemy's offensive.

2. More important, our Army was still intact, it had fought a canny retirement; the enemy had failed to trap or destroy any portions of it.

3. The enemy offensive was still far short of what might have been its ultimate goal—the ejection of UN forces from Korea; in fact, this goal at the week end was not even in sight.

4. For limited and indecisive territorial gains, the enemy's losses had been very large—possibly between 40,000 and 70,000 total casualties since the attack began 2 weeks ago. Although casualties in some South Korean and a few small UN units were high, the over-all casualties of United States and UN forces were small; the ratio was probably at least 10 to 1 in our favor.

From this balance sheet to date of the results of the enemy's spring offensive certain conclusions can be drawn.

A NEW UNITED STATES ARMY

Perhaps the first and most important one, which has been increasingly obvious ever since Lt. Gen. Matthew B. Ridgway assumed command in Korea in January, but which deserves restatement, is that the United States troops now fighting in Korea are a far call, indeed, from the inexperienced, undisciplined units that were first committed to Korea last summer. We now have an army in Korea of which Americans can be proud. It has two great factors of superiority to the enemy—superior firepower and superior mobility—and, of course, an element inherent to both these factors—a far more ample supply system. This has enabled us to meet and, so far, defeat, the enemy's numerical superiority of about 2½ to 1.

Our superior firepower is primarily attributable to our artillery and airpower; our superior mobility is due to our far more complete motorization, and to the fact that we are no longer road-bound as we once were, but have now developed the "goat-legs" necessary for the cross-country mobility essential to Korea. We still, of course, have weaknesses and some units are superior to others. One of the weaknesses is our failure to exploit or utilize adequately all intelligence sources; our combat intelligence still leaves much to be desired.

The greatest weakness is still the South Korean army, an army now 10 divisions strong (about six of them at or near the front), which must be used, despite its weaknesses, if a line across the Korean peninsula is to be held.

IMPORTANCE OF MORALE

Another potential weakness, which may be magnified by time, is United States troop morale. Excellent now, after a low point in December and January, it cannot be expected to remain at the same high level if the war drags on indefinitely, if the front—as it eventually will be—is affected by the dissensions at home, and if the rotation system, which has been started, does not progress rapidly. The difficulty will be, as far as the latter point is concerned, that Lt. Gen. James A. Van Fleet, new commander of the Eighth Army, is in a damned-if-he-does-and-damned-if-he-doesn't position. To keep morale up, rotation is important, but if rotation is practiced on the scale projected—the replacement of some 500 veterans a day by men from the United States—the combat efficiency of the Eighth Army is likely to decline, at least temporarily.

Another conclusion that can be drawn from the spring offensive to date is that the enemy is unable, even after a long period of preparations, to mount and maintain a sustained major offensive in the face of our superior firepower and mobility. The attack at the end of April was the heaviest yet delivered against the UN forces in Korea and the first major all-out offensive since the Communists struck us in late November and early December.

The enemy successes last fall, it is now apparent, were due not only to their superiority in numbers, but also to our faulty troop dispositions and to our own mistakes; and our retreat on the west coast was more precipitate and extensive than it need have been. It may well be that the enemy will commence a second phase of his spring offensive at any time, but on the other hand his defensive and cautious attitude last week indicated the possibility that he has temporarily shot his bolt.

AIR FORCE HELD BACK

As a possible corrolary to this conclusion, one may also reason that the enemy today is no more anxious to extend the war in Korea than our administration is. His failure, so far, to commit the 800-odd planes of the Chinese Communist Air Force to unlimited support of his attack indicates (a) awareness that this air force is still weak and not prepared to support adequately (without direct Soviet help) Communist ground troops; (b) understanding that an all-out air attack upon our ground troops or bases would eliminate the "privileged sanctuaries," which both sides—due to mutual air restraint—have enjoyed; (c) comprehension that such air attacks would provoke a less limited war and might lead to unpredictable consequences; and (d) a possible decision to keep us fighting indefinitely in Korea but not to try to expel us.

STRATEGY OF ATTRITION

These last conclusions, however, are purely tentative and, of course, subject to future change. There long has been general agreement that about the most damaging strategy the Communists could undertake would be a strategy of attrition, rather than an attempt, at unlimited cost, to push us out of Korea altogether. However, the enemy probably realizes that if his spring offensive fails to accomplish more decisive results than it has yet done, and if the fighting settles down to unending attrition, a reconsideration of our entire strategy in Korea and of the means we might take to bring the war to an end, is inevitable, particularly in view of the MacArthur attacks upon the administration's policy.

General Viewed as the Father

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NORRIS POULSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting in the RECORD this article by Dorothy Thompson, which is very cryptic but right to the point. I even suggest you read the current issue of the American Mercury:

GENERAL VIEWED AS THE FATHER—PEOPLE DESPERATELY FEEL THE NEED FOR PROTECTION—LEADERSHIP LACKING IN WORST CRISIS OF HISTORY

(By Dorothy Thompson)

The current American Mercury has an article on the business career of President Truman, which if it is not true is sizzlingly libelous, and which, if it is true, is a further terrifying revelation of the state of the Union and its leadership during the worst crisis in the history of this Nation, and of western civilization.

Like others, we have speculated on the reasons for the extraordinary, even hysterical, popular demonstration accompanying the return of General MacArthur.

We do not know, but we doubt that this demonstration has much to do with the obvious controversy. Every poll has shown that the Korean war is profoundly unpopular. On the direct issue—that of extending the war or restricting it—we would guess that the people want less, rather than more war, and anyhow, on the ostensible issue the quarrel between the President and the general is, in our opinion, more apparent than real. But the ostensible issue does not account for the emotional upsurge greeting the general. It is a more complicated mass phenomenon.

The American people feel that there is "something rotten in the State of Denmark." They have had unrolled before their eyes and ears revelations of errors and misdemeanors unique in American history: Of secret international agreements whose deadly seeds now bear their poison fruits; of spies, native and alien, who have penetrated into state secrets with the utmost ease and sometimes with the collusion of high officials of Government; of brazen collusions between gangsters and police officers; of Reconstruction Finance Corporation funds to reward political henchmen—scandals reaching right into the White House.

There is an immeasurable crisis of confidence. The people are outraged in every moral instinct, and wounded in their pride, at a moment of great reverses in a war they never sought.

Into this crisis comes a man about whom there has never been a hint of corruption. While all this has been going on, he has been serving his country, with bravery and honor. He had no part in any of the conferences that have produced the poisoned fruits. Among all the victors he was the most magnanimous; of all the postwar administrators the most admirable. For 14 years he has not set foot in America, but wherever he stood has been America—and many cannot find America at home. He exudes independence—the most traditional American characteristic. He looks the way Americans picture the ideal American man. He bears himself with ease and dignity. He is aloof among backslappers, but without superciliousness. In his speech there is an echo of the old schoolbook texts that have formed part of the American subconscious. As he rides through the streets, with his young son at his side, shy but poised, he is the picture of a father who neither unfairly punishes nor spoils.

I submit that in terms of public response, the matter of whether his opinions are right or wrong is negligible. The throngs cheering themselves hoarse are not responding to an opinion but to a personality. They hold him responsible for no ills; his life has not been devoted to money; they are confident that he would never betray, nor cheat, nor lie, nor behave dishonorably. They cannot imagine him surrounded by crooks and 5 percenters. In the Augean Stables he appears godly and clean. They feel him to be morally admirable, at a time when they feel morally debased, in a collective sense of shame.

He is, to use a psychological term, the perfect father image to a people who have begun to feel that they are not the legitimate sons of their present political fathers—and who desperately feel the need for protection.

New York Times Disagrees With General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, let me call attention of the Members to a very interesting editorial which appeared in the great New York Times on Monday, May 7, 1951:

DEBATE IN WASHINGTON

Quite apart from any personal or partisan issues, the opening sessions of the Senate hearings and General MacArthur's testimony have paved the way for a searching debate on our policies in the Far East. The atmosphere in the Senate committee room has been grave, as it should be. Momentous questions are being posed. General MacArthur has made a substantial contribution to the tone of the hearings by his sense of decorum and his forthrightness. Similarly, his questioners thus far have kept the hearings on a high plane and have reflected the temper of the thoughtful public in an earnest search for truth and judgment.

The general has repeatedly made plain his preoccupation with the events of the Korean battlefield. Those events themselves give additional significance to the testimony that is presented. During the past week the first phase of the present Chinese Communist offensive has spent itself. The character of the attritional defensive war that is our official policy has been admirably illustrated. In a limited sense, as General Van Fleet has pointed out, this phase of the operations has been victorious. That does not mean, unfortunately, that there is in sight any early end to the hostilities.

The debate, whose groundwork has been laid by General MacArthur, must necessarily resolve about the ways and means by which such an end can be achieved. General MacArthur makes it quite clear that he believes that a limited extension of operations will bring that early end. This belief is based on the willingness to accept the risk of formal Soviet intervention and the conviction that such intervention is less likely than many persons fear.

We are unable to concur in these basic beliefs and assumptions. It has not been made convincingly clear, as far as we are concerned, that extended air operations and a naval blockade of Communist China would materially shorten the war or reduce to any appreciable extent our grievous casualties. Likewise, the possibility of formal Soviet intervention is, in our judgment, a graver risk than it appears to be in General MacArthur's calculation.

Similarly, we cannot accept a course of action that would almost certainly estrange us from our major allies. To accept the Korean struggle as a United States operation rather than as an operation of the United Nations would be to destroy all the advance that has been made toward the concept of real collective security. It is quite true that we bear the brunt of the collective action but we dare not, unilaterally, deny its collective character.

With General MacArthur's appeal for tightening the economic ring on Communist China through the imposition of embargoes we are in entire sympathy. There is no excuse for strengthening an enemy that is making war on us, even if our military action in return is limited in scope. So long as we are being shot at it is common prudence to provide no bullets to the enemy.

The Senate hearings are clarifying the question of the equipment, training, and use of the Chinese Nationalist force on Formosa. This force has been organized thus far for essentially defensive purposes, and it is our present policy, wisely, to aid in this effort. It is not seriously argued that the Chinese Nationalists are now in a position to undertake an invasion of the Chinese mainland. The issue in the present debate is whether this force could and should be used for diversionary purposes.

The very sharpness with which the testimony has pointed up real differences in opinion and judgment has also made it possible to see clearly that what is really being debated is tactics rather than grand strategy. There has been no suggestion in these hearings of a retreat to any insular American "fortress." There is no hint of abandonment of our vital obligations in Europe and elsewhere in the world. There is agreement that we must resist Communist aggression. There is, on the other hand, sharp disagreement as to the best means to employ in that resistance in one specific theater of operations. That disagreement can be the means of bringing about the broad exploration of our policy, the correction of some mistakes and the building up of closer integration and greater strength.

What's Ahead: Peace or War?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 8, 1951

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the very enlightening debate on the American Forum of the Air on Sunday, April 6, 1951, between the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR] and the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN]. The subject was What's Ahead: Peace or War?

There being no objection, the debate was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT'S AHEAD: PEACE OR WAR?

ANNOUNCER. Good afternoon, it's time again to join the American Forum of the Air. Today the American Forum of the Air presents a discussion on the vital topic What's Ahead: Peace or War? Here with us today to discuss this problem is Senator ROBERT S. KERR, Democrat, of Oklahoma, who says: "Peace can only be achieved through bipartisan unity at home and cooperation with other free nations." And Senator HARRY P. CAIN, Republican, of Washington State, who says: "The indecisive and futile course of action in Korea could lead to a global war."

And now, here is your moderator, who 23 years ago, founded the American Forum of the Air, Theodore Granik.

Moderator GRANIK. General MacArthur's dramatic and exciting testimony before the United States Senate has focused the spotlight of world attention on American foreign and military policy.

The great debate is on again—in the Congress, in the homes, in the schools, and on every street corner. Everyone asks, "What's ahead: Peace or war?" We pose this vital question to our two distinguished guests, Senator KERR, who has been one of the administration's leading spokesmen on the MacArthur issue, and Senator CAIN, who is the author of two opposing Senate resolutions—one calling for a declaration of war against Communist China, and the other calling for withdrawal of all American troops in Korea.

Now, gentlemen, I would like to open today's discussion with a quote from an article by Walter Lippmann entitled "The Point of No Return," appearing in the May issue of Reader's Digest, America's leading magazine. He says, "World war III can be fought. There is no prospect whatsoever that it could be finished. Nothing is so certain, no prophecy is so sure, as that once world war III started it would spread like a prairie fire and would become an uncontrollable, inconclusive, interminable complex of civil and international wars."

Senator CAIN, would you care to comment on Mr. Lippmann's views?

Senator CAIN. Mr. Granik, the first public statement I ever made when I left the Army at the end of World War II was that if civilization was to live, war must be abolished. I could not agree with Mr. Lippmann's contention more, but I am completely convinced our present national policy and international policy in Korea can but lead to more war, to more blood, to more death, to more futility and frustration, to more tragedy, and, finally, to complete appeasement.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator KERR.

Senator KERR. Mr. Lippmann has said that world war III can be fought. There is no doubt about that, but I think world war III can be avoided and I think that we are following the policy which has the best chance, first, to avoid world war III; second, to win it, if it is forced upon us. I do not agree with Mr. Lippmann that if world war III is forced upon us, it will mean the end of our country, or of our civilization. Nor can I agree with my distinguished friend here that the present policies of our Government, which in the main have been worked out on a bipartisan basis, lead to confusion and appeasement. On the contrary, they lead to the suppression and prevention of aggression, and that alone—that alone—is what will prevent world war III.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator CAIN.

Senator CAIN. Mr. Granik, there are a number of things that I want to say in my own right with reference to my good friend, the Senator from Oklahoma. I want to ask him, What is the administration's policy in Korea?

Senator KERR. I will be glad to give that to the Senator.

Senator CAIN. Please do.

Senator KERR. The administration policy in Korea: First, to punish the aggressor, to limit the conflict, to prevent its spread, to bring an honorable settlement as soon as possible, to remember that Russia is our No. 1 enemy, that the prevention of world war III is our No. 1 objective, and that the passage of each 24 hours is another victory, first, in the avoidance of world war III; second, in the building of greater strength.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator CAIN.

Senator CAIN. Mr. Granik, I think it was on the 27th day of June 1950, more than 10 months ago, that the United States of America and 52 other free nations of this world, members all of the United Nations, signed a solemn resolution that their mission in Korea was to be that of expelling the enemy, whoever that enemy might be, from Korea, and making of Korea a free, a united, and a self-controlled nation. That mission to which the United States lent its name, its power, its prestige, and its courage, has never to this minute been changed, but I will tell you what has been changed: Our administration in the middle of a war has changed its policy. No longer are we Americans together with our Allied friends determined to repel and expel an enemy from Korea, as was our initial determination; but now we have decided to resist aggression. Aggression is bent and determined to destroy freedom in its entirety from the face of the earth, and now we free people, according to what Senator ROBERT KERR, of Oklahoma, has just said, are content and satisfied to resist an aggressor who is determined to overrun us; and I say, from my point of view, I think it is an impossible attainment to undertake.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator KERR.

Senator KERR. In resisting and stopping and punishing the aggressor, we do not undertake nor must we ever permit ourselves to be forced into the posture of bringing on a bigger war and a greater conflict in the name of achieving victory in the lesser conflict. Our purpose is to restore peace. Our purpose is to punish aggression. Our purpose is to prevent aggression. And that we can best do on the basis we now operate, rather than on the basis either as proposed by my distinguished friend, the Senator from Washington, to declare war on China, on the one hand, or pull out and abandon Korea on the other.

Moderator GRANIK. Which of those resolutions do you want to comment on, Senator CAIN?

Senator CAIN. Mr. Granik, at the moment I want to say that the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma has not told the American audience why the administration seeks to change its mission in the middle of the war. The answer to that is relatively simple—there is no answer for it. ROBERT S. KERR has said that we set out now to punish the aggressor.

Senator KERR. I said, "We set out first to do that." We still seek that. That was our objective and that is our objective.

Senator CAIN. These good people here are entitled to all of the facts in this tragic bloodbath in which we are now engaged in Korea. Admittedly, we punish the enemy, and we punish many badly with what we have and under the restrictions which are imposed upon men, many of whom today are dying because they do not have a proper chance to die for themselves. But the testimony in the last 3 days before the joint committee of the United States Senate is that already there have been suffered in 10 months a million battle casualties and more than a million casualties among civilians, a total of more than 2,000,000 casualties in ten short months on a narrow corridor and peninsula known as Korea. I ask anybody to point out to me, if they can, where, in the annals of all history, there has ever been so much blood shed, and can they give me one simple, solid answer as to how we are ever going, in high moral and principle terms, if you please, to carry out our mission of making Korea free again if now our sole determination is to keep from being thrown back in the sea by resisting on or about the thirty-eighth parallel. History has no parallel to this fantastic situation.

Senator KERR. If this is a one-man discussion, say so; otherwise let me give the people the facts. There has been terrible tragedy in Korea. There is terrible tragedy in Korea. But what, I ask the Senator from Washington, would it be if this Nation became involved in an all-out war in the mire and the jungle of China. Certainly, there is tragedy in Korea. Certainly, there is bloodshed. But its purpose is to prevent a greater conflict. Its purpose is to punish the aggressor, repel the aggressor, and restore peace. That is the reason why today the Koreans support this effort with fanatical loyalty and devotion. That is the reason that they pray God that the United Nations will not leave there until they have restored peace and unity in Korea, and that is the reason that the people around the world hope that that awful bloodbath will not be visited on the rest of the world. One atomic bomb, one atomic bomb raid in this country, which could easily come about by reason of our pushing the war into China, as advocated by General MacArthur, or the Senator from Washington in his resolution to declare war on China—one atomic bomb attack—could bring to our own country and our own citizens 10 times the bloodshed that has taken place in Korea, and it is to prevent that, Mr. Granik, that we are punishing the aggressor; it is to prevent that that we refuse to permit the spread of the conflict if we can prevent it; that is the reason that we oppose those who would provoke a greater more terrible war.

Senator CAIN. Ten months ago in June the administration was very brave and very bold. It set out to repel an aggressor from Korea. Ten months later that aggressor, many Americans, and many of our allied friends throughout the world are scared to death. They say if we carry the war on to our enemy, all kinds of possibilities may happen. Why, if that is their present decision, did they not take the time to think 10 months ago, when every risk and every hazard to which they make reference today was clearly and apparently and obviously present in front of all of us? The Senator from Oklahoma says that we seek to carry war to the jungle, and I think his words were "in the mire of China." He can find no scrap of testimony or evidence from any authoritative source that that is the desire of any among us, who seek only to defeat the enemy in Korea and carry out our declared intentions last June.

Senator KERR. I would not know what else would be in the mind of one who seeks to declare war in China. I could not know what else would be in the mind of General MacArthur when he said, "I would issue an ultimatum to China that if she did not cease fire we would regard it as a declaration of war." I would not know what else was in the mind of General MacArthur when he seeks to send the troops of Chiang Kai-shek on to the continent to open up a second front. I would not know what else was in the mind of General MacArthur when he said, "Let us bomb the bases of interior China." We must not lose sight of the fact that our objective is peace—not war. We must not lose sight of the fact that to win the peace we must limit the conflict as much as possible and fail and refuse to provoke the conflict into that global structure, which is the thing we all fear and dread and are determined to prevent.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator CAIN, would you care to comment on your resolution?

Senator CAIN. Senator ROBERT KERR and I are both very serious and very sincere in our contrary points of view and the American people ought to listen to everybody they have a chance to these days. I feel that to continue to fail to carry out our mission in Korea is to provide the greatest incitement and the greatest likelihood I could possibly define of the coming of world war III because do not fail to bear in mind that 53 nations 10 months ago said that collectively we are going to stamp out the fire of aggression wherever it may crop up, and now our first incitement, our initial undertaking, is taking place in Korea.

Moderator GRANIK. Would you declare war on China? How far would you go?

Senator CAIN. Speaking for myself, we have been heavily engaged in one of the greatest major wars in all history, and particularly with Red China since November of last year. If a man wants to recognize the obvious, certainly, I think if he is a Member of the Congress of the United States, he ought to be willing to declare war in order that as a Member of Congress he can have something to do with the management of that war. I am a sturdy Republican, a very positive one, but I do not criticize the President of the United States for what I sometimes think is mismanagement when I, as a Member of the Senate, have not had an opportunity to assume any responsibility for the management of those undertakings. Of course, I would declare war.

Senator KERR. Not even Senator CAIN would say we went to Korea to declare war on China. We went to Korea to avoid war with Russia. The only way I know of to carry out an objective is to carry it out, and the only way to do that is to know what it is, and not what it is not, and therefore we must not lose sight of the limited objective in Korea by casting the god of war out yonder to another and different and violently opposed objective, which would be not only becoming involved in a world-wide struggle, but deliberately provoking it ourselves.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator CAIN.

Senator CAIN. We did not go to Korea to declare war, as Senator ROBERT KERR says.

Senator KERR. On Red China.

Senator CAIN. Wait a minute. We went to Korea to get rid of our enemy at that time. On, I think it was the 28th day of November, Red China entered that war against us and our allies, and since that time they crossed the Yalu River, the United States has been opposed, and our allies in Korea, by two enemies—the North Koreans and the Red Chinese—and we still have our initial mission of repelling that enemy and restoring freedom, and the greatest people who suffer today, sad as our tragedy today is in America, and Great Britain, France, and Turkey, and the rest, are the Koreans. More than a million of them have died in this accordion war that not only has gone up and down that peninsula four or five times, but Senator ROBERT KERR is the last man to tell me how many more times. It is going to go up and down until the Chinese either give up, or until they offer terms at the peace table unrelated to the conflict in Korea and out of which comes appeasement on the part of free people.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator KERR?

Senator KERR. No matter how many Red Chinese are in Korea—and I remember back yonder about the last of November MacArthur said that before they struck us there were about 60,000 of them, and after they struck us he said there were a million of them. He was just as badly in error in the second instance as he was in the first. But, regardless of how many there are, it is not 2 percent of their available manpower, and if we went into China, if we carried the war to China, if we declared war on China, if we issued the ultimatum to China, then we ourselves would be deliberately provoking the all-out war with all the manpower of China, not 2 percent of it, as we now have in Korea and where we have the opportunity to punish them sufficiently to where they themselves will either seek or accept responsible peace and refrain from aggression, but if we ourselves carried it to them we would open up that which Walter Lippmann described so dramatically. While I do not agree with its pessimistic finality, I do realize that it would be terrible beyond all description.

Moderator GRANIK. Do you want to answer that?

Senator CAIN. Mr. KERR knows there are many answers for some of what he has said just now and he knows that I have them. He talks of intelligence and by inference condemns General MacArthur when we know that intelligence to be effective cannot be collected by the commander on his immediate front but comes out of the chancelleries of the world and through our Central Intelligence Agency over here. It is for those who are in authority to send intelligence to the commander, and BOB KERR ought to know that.

Senator KERR. Those who would expect that from MacArthur do not know MacArthur.

Moderator GRANIK. The first question? Go ahead, sir.

Colonel SMITH. I am J. R. Smith, a retired Army colonel. My question is addressed to Senator KERR.

Ever since 1933 there has been constant appeasement of Soviet Russia by our administration and State Department. Now Socialist Britain is also favoring it. Do you believe such tactics insure future peace for the United States?

Senator KERR. I do not believe either statement. I am positive that appeasement is destined to failure, whoever practices it. But anybody who thinks that we are appeasing in Korea certainly does not know what is going on and, as I said awhile ago, I do not agree with the man's premise, I deny and I defy and I decry appeasement by this Government at any time, at any place, for any purpose.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator CAIN?

Senator CAIN. You want me to answer that?

Moderator GRANIK. Yes.

Senator CAIN. I could not agree more with Colonel Smith, who made that statement. All we have to do, in other words, is to look at statistics, which are important occasionally. How many Communists were there on the face of the earth in 1945? How many more are there today in the Far East than there were in 1945? How many have been added since the Secretary of State went out into the Far East to force and require a coalition government between the Communists and the Nationalists? You could no more do that than you would make oil and water mix. Of course, I think there has been appeasement.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator KERR?

Senator KERR. I am amused at the statement of the Senator from Washington that by reason of the fact that there are more Communists today it necessarily follows that we have appeased them. I want to say that the farmers in Oklahoma have been fighting the green bugs all my life and there are more of them this spring than I have ever known.

Senator CAIN. Then that is just as little a compliment to the management that you exercise in Oklahoma as there is in the State Department.

Senator KERR. That is a recognition of the fact that green bugs are like Communists.

Senator CAIN. Please talk about China.

Senator KERR. That was not what the question was.

Moderator GRANIK. Another question?

Mr. GETTELSOHN. My name is Bernard B. Gettelsohn, a manufacturer. My question is to Senator CAIN.

If your resolution on declaring war on Red China is adopted, will we have the full support of the members of the United Nations?

Senator CAIN. That matter must be decided in the future. So far, there has been an unusual—I find it difficult to understand why, because I think they, collectively, and that includes us, too, are likely to commit collective suicide. But the free nations of the world, those who are supposed to be engaged with us in Korea, have either been very reluctant in their contributions or, thus far, have not contributed anything at all. I believe in working with all the free nations of the world, but it is a two-way street, and if we seek and want to live, the time has come when there must be equal contributions from equal partners.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator KERR.

Senator KERR. We know that we would not have our allies, we would not have the American people. They do not want to declare a war on China. That would be the way first not to commit collective suicide, because our allies would refuse to join us in that self-imposed hara-kiri.

Moderator GRANIK. We will take another question.

Mr. HAWVER. My name is Carl F. Hawver. I am employed in the Capitol, and I have spent some time in Russia. This question is addressed to Senator KERR.

Can we reasonably expect true peace under any conditions short of defeat of the communistic stronghold in Russia?

Senator KERR. We can expect true peace when we and our allies have reached that stage of collective strength that Russia recognizes that to attack us is suicide for her. When we have achieved that unity and that collective strength we can compel the Soviet before the bar of world judgment. We can compel peace with responsible guaranties, and only, however, from the position and foundation of that united strength that will enable us to be in position to back up what we say and compel them to back up what they say.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator CAIN?

Senator CAIN. Mr. Granik, I think there is a chance for peace with Russia, and on the face of the earth in the future, but that peace can only come when the aggressors, imperialist Communists everywhere in the world become totally convinced that the collective forces and determination and spirit and courage of the free people are sufficiently strong to make any war undertaking unlikely. It is for that reason I keep my chief preoccupation on the initial undertaking of freedom to stamp out the fire of aggression on the basis of the way in which we are presently and have been going for 10 months. I think that world war III is very, very likely, and I am sad about it.

Senator KERR. I am glad Senator CAIN based his hope for peace on that collective strength when the collective forces are strong enough because that is the structure that we now have in a small way; that is the structure we must build; that is the structure we must keep.

Moderator GRANIK. Another question?

Mr. LEVY. My name is Warren Levy, New York City.

Senator CAIN, you have asked for a declaration of war against Communist China.

Senator CAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. LEVY. Are you actually willing to risk a war with Soviet Russia through such a declaration?

Senator CAIN. I am much more interested in winning the war, young man, in which we are engaged as an individual citizen of this Republic. As an individual Member of the United States Senate, I think we ought to declare war, but, what is much more important, for that imparts a moral question, we ought to get on with winning the war in which we have, and now are, engaged in and in which more than 2,000,000 people in 10 short months have been destroyed in one way or another.

Moderator GRANIK. Time for summaries, Senator KERR?

Senator KERR. In answer to the question, What is ahead: peace or war? I believe that if the American people will truly work, it can be peace. However, this cannot result from wishful thinking. It will not come about by accident. Bernard Baruch has said, "To win the peace, we must wage the peace." Paul G. Hoffman has said, "I contend that we still have the opportunity to avoid a general war, if we begin at once to wage the peace with imagination, boldness, and a sense of dedication."

The late Senator Vandenberg, who made one of the most heroic efforts for peace of all times, said, "Pearl Harbor ended one era. Hiroshima began another. Therefore, none of us can face the facts of life and deny that a nation hereafter can defend its peace alone. The peaceful nations of the world must defend their peace together. They must covenant in advance against the aggressor of tomorrow."

Moderator GRANIK. Thank you, Senator KERR.

Senator CAIN, may we have your summary, please?

Senator CAIN. Mr. Granik, 53 United Nations began a crusade of faith and hope last June, 10 months ago. They announced to the world that they would restore freedom to free men and women and childfen in Korea. This declaration electrified and gave new hope and faith to enslaved people everywhere. In 10 long, bloody months that hope and faith has largely turned to doubt and fear because the United Nations have failed to carry out their stated determination in Korea. I believe down deep inside that if we fail to restore freedom in Korea that freedom everywhere throughout the universe will stand in peril of being completely destroyed in my own lifetime. The challenge of the future lies in the present, which is today, in Korea, where we must do so much more, and our allies too, than we have undertaken to grapple with in 10 long months of war.

Moderator GRANIK. Thank you, gentlemen. You have been listening to a discussion on What's ahead: peace or war? Our speakers have been Senator ROBERT S. KERR, Democrat, of Oklahoma, and Senator HARRY P. CAIN, Republican, of Washington.

General MacArthur's Testimony

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, we are indebted to the New York Times for an excellent summation and analysis of the testimony of General of the Army Douglas MacArthur. The following article appeared in the Times on Sunday, May 6, 1951:

SEVEN ISSUES—MACARTHUR RAISES THEM

At 10:18 last Thursday morning General of the Army Douglas MacArthur strode into the Senate caucus room on Capitol Hill, Washington, D. C. After a few preliminaries, Senate guards cleared the room of all outsiders. Members of the Senate Armed Services and Foreign Relations Committees took seats at a long walnut table. Other Senators crowded around. Then, in answer to a question by Senator RICHARD B. RUSSELL, General MacArthur began to testify.

What followed on Thursday and through Friday and yesterday added up to one of the most extraordinary episodes in American history—an episode fraught with grave meaning for the United States and much of the world. In those 3 days General MacArthur spelled out a bill of particulars against his Commander in Chief, President Truman, against his military superiors, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and against the structure and execution of American foreign policy. His testimony—and the heat and emotion that his personality generates—made the other great debate over troops to Europe seem like a minor political disagreement.

By late yesterday, most of General MacArthur's testimony was in. The administration—through the questioning by Senators who support its point of view—had developed the main lines of the administration rebuttal. That rebuttal will be fully developed this week when the Joint Chiefs of Staff give their testimony.

The dramatic hearings in Washington took place against a grim background in Korea.

There, the Chinese Communists—whose intervention in the Korean war was the touchstone that set off the debate in Washington—brought their spring offensive to a climax. The offensive was beaten back and at the week end the front was stabilized, but all signs pointed to another bitter-end effort by the Chinese to throw the UN forces out of Korea.

THE SETTING

The roots of the MacArthur debate run deep. The controversy ranges over the entire conduct of America's far-eastern policy since World War II. Its bitterness has mounted rapidly in the 10 months since the outbreak, in Korea, of actual warfare in the Far East.

The fundamental argument of the Republicans in the debate is this: The administration's far-eastern policy has been weak all along. The State Department's softness toward communism paved the way for the Communist conquest of China and encouraged the Communist aggression in Korea. Now the administration is making victory in Korea impossible by shying away from strong countermeasures against the Chinese Communists.

The fundamental position of the administration is this: The Communist gains in the Far East are the outgrowth of historic forces which the United States could not entirely control. Communist aggression must be resisted, but if possible the Korean war must be limited, lest the west's capacity to defend the more vital theater of Western Europe be imperiled. Enlargement of the Korean conflict might lead to world war III, for which the United States and its allies are not yet prepared.

This was the context in which the controversy came to a head 25 days ago, with President Truman's abrupt dismissal of General MacArthur from the Korean command for publicly attacking administration policy.

The formal arena of debate is an investigation of the MacArthur affair by the Senate's combined Armed Services and Foreign Relations Committees—altogether 25 men, 14 of them Democrats, 11 Republicans. In preliminaries to the hearings last week there was maneuvering for advantage by both sides in the debate.

MAC ARTHUR'S SUPPORTERS

On the MacArthur side Senator ROBERT A. TAFT threw his full support behind the general's policies. The general's aide, Maj. Gen. Courtney Whitney, said General MacArthur intended to take his case to the country by making "as many public appearances as possible." On the administration side Secretary of State Dean Acheson and Warren Austin, Republican and chief American delegate to the UN, entered strong defenses of the President. Mr. Truman said he was confident the people would support him when all the facts were known.

From the combined committees there came the first of the many documents that are expected to figure in the controversy. On Tuesday the committee released a report, held secret for nearly 4 years, on a 1947 mission to Korea by Lt. Gen. Albert C. Wedemeyer. The Republicans say the report supports their case, since General Wedemeyer warned in 1947 of North Korean aggression. On Wednesday the committee released a record of the talks between General MacArthur and Mr. Truman at Wake Island last October. The administration says the record supports its case, since General MacArthur predicted at Wake that the Chinese Communists would not intervene in Korea.

When the hearings opened Thursday the atmosphere in the caucus room was solemn. The Senators were elaborately polite with the general and with each other. Most of the questioners began with tributes to his record. The general, smoking his pipe, was calm and dignified. He frequently made little speeches, with flashes of the MacArthur rhetoric. Occasionally he displayed emotion, as when he spoke of the bloodshed in Korea.

The line of questioning was clearly partisan. On the whole the Republicans—ALEXANDER WILEY, WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND, HARRY P. CAIN—put questions which brought out General MacArthur's long service in the Far East, the abruptness of his dismissal, the difficulties of his assignment in Korea. The Democrats—BRIEN MCMAHON, J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT, ESTES KEFAUVER—questioned him searchingly. Mr. KEFAUVER was soft-spoken but insistent, in the manner that became familiar during his recent crime investigation. Mr. MCMAHON was on the offensive. His terse questions seemed to nettle the general. Mr. MCMAHON, on his own initiative but with the administration's good wishes, had worked 4 days with his staff drawing up his line of attack.

In this atmosphere the Senate inquiry floated back and forth over the entire range of issues in debate.

THE ISSUES

Out of the mass of testimony—well in excess of 100,000 words by late yesterday—there emerged seven great issues between General MacArthur and the administration. General MacArthur threw down the challenge on those issues; the line of questioning by Senators supporting the administration indicated the essentials of what the reply to the general will be. These are the issues, and the indicated answers:

1. General MacArthur took the position firmly that his responsibility was that of a theater commander and that responsibility for decisions on global matters was not his.

Despite the general's disavowal of the global view, he recommended stern measures be taken against China. This program was based on two assumptions: First, that the policy he recommended would bring quick victory in Korea, and, second, that it would not necessarily bring Russia into the war. These assumptions underlie the second and third issues.

2. General MacArthur argued that the present stalemate is intolerable, and that steps toward decisive victory in Korea must be taken now. The indicated answer is this: That the program might not bring victory at all, but instead might embroil us in a long and major war with China.

3. General MacArthur argues that Russia would not shape her decisions on whether to make war against the West on the basis of what happens in the Korean war. The indicated answer is this: That we must not take any risk of precipitating world war III in which Russia would strike at the European bastion.

The question of the risk of Russian intervention led to the exploration of the fourth issue:

4. General MacArthur said that the enemy was communism all over the world and not Soviet Russia. The indicated answer is this: That the main enemy is the Kremlin, and that all action must be determined on the basis of the best way to resist that enemy.

THE OTHER ISSUES

These fundamental differences lay behind the other issues that came out sharply in the testimony:

5. The general said that his proposals should be adopted even if our allies objected, though that might mean we would have to act on our own. The indicated answer is this: That a prime Russian objective is to isolate us from our allies and that we must not allow that to happen.

6. General MacArthur said that the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Nation's highest military authorities, agreed in essentials with his program. The indicated answer is this: That the Joint Chiefs, taking the Korean war in the context of the global political and military considerations, disagree strongly.

7. General MacArthur said that he had the right to go over the head of his military and civilian superiors and appeal to the judgment of the people. The indicated answer is this: In the nature of military duty an officer must carry out the orders from his superiors to the best of his ability.

Here in detail are the background and the high lights of the testimony on these seven basic issues:

1. GLOBAL STRATEGY

The background: Administration policy is to combat communism by concentrating defenses in key areas. The administration's position is that in carrying out its policy it must plan and act on a world-wide basis, that any move in one part of the world must be considered in the light of its effects on other parts.

In his speech to Congress on April 19 General MacArthur said "the issues are global, and so interlocked that to consider the problems of one sector oblivious to those of another is to court disaster for the whole." Nevertheless, in the remainder of his speech, he laid all his emphasis on Asia, and did not once refer to other areas threatened by Communist aggression.

The testimony: Democratic Senators, particularly Senators MCMAHON and KEFAUVER, doggedly pursued the question of allocating America's strength on a global basis. This exchange took place with Senator MCMAHON:

Question. "General, * * * I am thinking, if this war (against Russia) has to be fought, about the total and complete victory * * *. Now, general, do you think that we are ready to withstand the Russian attack in Western Europe today?"

Answer. "Senator, I have asked you several times not to involve me in anything except my own area. My concepts on global defense are not what I am here to testify on. I don't pretend to be an authority on those things."

About the bomb

Senator MCMAHON, who is chairman of the Atomic Energy Committee, directed this line of questioning to the atomic bomb:

Question. "Have you any intelligence * * * about Russian potentialities in * * * atomic weapons?"

Answer. "Very little."

Question. "Have you sought to get that information."

Answer. "Not at all."

Pursuing the question, Senator MCMAHON asked:

Question. "I want to find out how you propose in your own mind to defend the American Nation * * *."

Answer. "That doesn't happen to be my responsibility, Senator * * * the Joint Chiefs of Staff * * * are working day and night for an over-all solution to the global problem. * * *"

Question. "Have you thought about the possibility of the Russians launching a surreptitious attack on the United States and its vital production centers through atomic sabotage?"

Answer. "In a general way only. Once again, that isn't my theater of responsibility, Senator."

2. KOREAN STRATEGY

The background: From the beginning of the war the administration position has been that the Communists' aggression must be fought within Korea. The policy is to exploit the UN's great advantage in fire power, inflict a bloody toll from the Communist forces, blunt their will to fight, and thus hold open the possibility of a peaceful settlement. The administration stands firmly against what General Bradley calls the proposals of dissatisfied and impatient strategists.

All during the war General MacArthur has protested these policies. In his speech before Congress he spelled out his demands. They are: To destroy by bombing the Communist bases in the Manchurian sanctuary; to lift the restrictions on use of the Nationalist troops on Formosa; to throw an economic and naval blockade along the China coast. In his testimony last week he made an important addition. He said he would have served Peiping with an ultimatum saying that if the Communists did not promptly accept a cease-fire they would put themselves at war with the UN.

The testimony: As to bombing Manchuria, this exchange took place:

Question. "You said if you had been permitted to bomb [the Chinese Communists] before they crossed the Yalu"——

Answer. "If I had been permitted to bomb them before they crossed the Yalu, Senator, they would never have crossed. * * *"

As to Chiang's troops, this was part of the General's testimony:

Question. "What [do] you think is the real strength of the Generalissimo's forces on Formosa?

Answer. "The Generalissimo has probably in the neighborhood of a half million troops. The personnel is excellent. * * * Their material equipment is spotty. They lack artillery. They lack trucks. * * * My own estimate would be [that] after the material [American aid] was there, that those troops would be in very good shape * * * within 4 months."

Question. "How should Chiang's troops be used?"

Answer. "Such a decision should be left to their commander [Chiang]. The possibility of a huge amphibious force landing all that crowd on the mainland might not be feasible."

As to a blockade of China, the General's testimony included this exchange:

Question. "Isn't your proposal * * * the same strategy by which Americans achieved victory over the Japanese in the Pacific?"

Answer. "Yes, sir. In the Pacific we bypassed them. We closed in. * * * The supplies for the maintenance of the Japanese armed forces ceased to reach Japan. * * * Now, the problem with China is quite similar. * * * It is an economy of poverty, and the minute you disrupt it you will turn great segments of its population into disorder and discontent."

Again and again General MacArthur stressed that his proposals would end the Korean "stalemate" and the "slaughter" of American soldiers. He said: "Where does the responsibility of that blood rest? This I am sure—it is not going to rest on my shoulders. * * * I shrink * * * at this continuous slaughter of men in Korea. * * * If you go on indefinitely, you are perpetuating a slaughter such as I have never heard of in the history of mankind." He denounced the "inhibitions" on American air and sea power as "appeasement."

Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE, Jr., Massachusetts Republican, raised the question of whether General MacArthur's proposals would work. This was the exchange:

Question. "If the * * * steps which you recommended do not bring the action in Korea to a successful conclusion, what do you recommend should be done next?"

Answer. "Senator, I would wait and see."

Strong challenges to General MacArthur's specific proposals for Korea policy are expected this week, when Secretary Marshall, General Bradley and the Joint Chiefs state the administration's case.

3. RUSSIA'S COURSE

The background: The Truman administration feels there is a grave risk that the Soviet Union might enter the war if the strong measures against her Chinese ally, particularly the bombing of Chinese bases, are taken. The fear is that such action might bring the Moscow-Peiping alliance of 1950 into play. That alliance says that if Japan or any country allied with her attacks either treaty member the other party will immediately render military or other aid with all means at its disposal. General MacArthur in his speech before Congress on April 19 said that the "Soviet will not necessarily mesh its actions with our moves."

The testimony: The questioning of General MacArthur at first concerned Russia's capabilities. In answer to a question by Chairman RUSSELL, General MacArthur said: "The Soviet in the Far East * * * is dependent for * * * support almost entirely from European Russia. * * * [The Tran-Siberian Railway] line is strained to the very utmost now to maintain on a normal peace basis the forces which the Soviet maintains in Siberia."

What would Moscow do?

Senator MCMAHON pressed questions about how Russia might react if the MacArthur policy were carried out:

Question. "I am to understand * * * that you discount the danger of Russia coming into the war * * * if we should bomb bases in Manchuria?"

Answer. "There is no certainty that Russia will come in. There is no certainty that she will not come in. There is no certainty that anything that happens in Korea will influence her. * * * You have to take a certain degree of risk."

There was discussion of a statement by General MacArthur, as it appeared in the documents on the Wake Island conference between the President and the general that, "We are no longer fearful of their (Peiping's) intervention."

Question. "You did not believe at one time that the Communists of China would come into the conflict in Korea?"

Answer. "I doubted it."

Question. "They did. You now doubt that the Soviets (will enter the war if we attack China). If you happen to be wrong this time and we get into all-out war, I want to find out how you propose in your own mind to defend the American Nation against the war?"

Answer. "That doesn't happen to be my responsibility, Senator."

4. THE MAIN ENEMY

The background: The administration regards the Soviet Union as the chief menace. The argument is that Russia, with its combination of nationalist expansionism and military power, poses the immediate danger of the fall of Western Europe, whose industrial strength would turn the world balance against the free world. In this view, Peiping is closely allied with Moscow at the moment but there remains at least a hope that a wedge can be driven between the two Communist allies.

The MacArthur view is that the danger is communism, wherever it is. In his view communism breeds imperialism in any country, and therefore the Russian threat does not take precedence over the Chinese threat.

Testimony: Senator MCMAHON had this exchange with the general:

Question. "Who is overwhelmingly the main enemy * * *?"

Answer. "Communism—in my opinion."

Question. "General, where is the source and brains of this conspiracy?"

Answer. "How would I know?"

Question. "Would you think that the Kremlin was the place that might be the loci?"

Answer. "I might say that it is one. * * *"

Question. "Would you say it was * * * the main place?"

Answer. "I think world opinion would so locate it."

In questioning by Senator FULBRIGHT there arose the question of Yugoslavia, Communist but anti-Russian, which is getting American aid. This was the exchange:

Question. "I thought of (the main enemy) as being Russian, an imperialist Russia. * * *"

Answer. "I disagree with you completely."

Question. "If the country * * * in fact is antagonistic to (Russia), then I do not see why, such as in the case of Yugoslavia, it is not to our benefit to assist them. * * *"

Answer. "I have expressed my belief, Senator."

5. OUR ALLIES

The background: This issue of our relation with our allies arises out of a fundamental tenet of the administration's foreign policy: that world peace and American security depend upon collective security. The State Department and the Joint Chiefs of Staff believe the United States needs the manpower and the industrial strength of our allies to help contain Communist agression, and therefore we must seek to preserve—if possible—a united policy front with those nations fighting with us in Korea and our partners in the Atlantic Pact.

Some opposition leaders strongly dissent from this policy. Many Republicans have also been critical of the U. N. role in Korea, charging that while the United States did most of the fighting, other U. N. members were ready to appease the Chinese Communists. They resented the strong representation our U. N. allies have made against any bombing of China, and opposition to our Formosa policy.

It has been widely believed that General MacArthur shared these views. In his address to the joint meeting of Congress, he made no mention of the United Nations; and in the letter to Representative JOSEPH W. MARTIN, which led to his recall, he complained that here we fight Europe's war with arms, while the diplomats there still fight it with words.

The testimony: Administration supporters closely questioned General MacArthur on this issue. This exchange took place with Senator GREEN, of Rhode Island.

Question: "[Your] theory that we could win a quick victory * * * simply by * * * bombarding the [China] coast cities and in establishing blockade would * * * indicate we would proceed alone and not with any help from the other United Nations?"

Answer: "I can give you no testimony about the United Nations, Senator."

Question: "What would be your expectation?"

Answer: "My hope would be * * * that the United Nations would see the wisdom * * * of that course, but if they did not, I still believe that the interest of the United States * * * would require our action."

Question: "Alone?"

Answer: "Alone if necessary."

On Friday, when Senator MCMAHON pressed this line of inquiry, the General modified his position somewhat:

Question: "I am sure, General, that you do not underrate the importance of having our allies with us."

Answer: "I would say indubitably it is advantageous for us to have all of the allies that we can get. * * * We have plenty of allies, but the numbers of them do not contribute in the same generous and noble way in which we do."

6. THE JOINT CHIEFS

The background is that the administration maintains that all of the actions taken by President Truman—including the dismissal of General MacArthur—had the full support of the Chiefs of Staff of the Army, Navy, and Air Force and their chairman, Gen. Omar Bradley. On April 17, General Bradley stated: "Any recommended course of action which would enlarge the present war is contrary to our best interests and, by jeopardizing world peace, ultimately would threaten our security."

General MacArthur told the joint meeting of Congress on April 19: "From a military standpoint, [my] views have been shared fully in the past by practically every military leader concerned in the Korean campaign, including our own Joint Chiefs of Staff." Senator TAFT has said, "The Joint Chiefs are absolutely under the control of the administration and their recommendations are what the administration demanded that they make."

The testimony: The key document introduced to support General MacArthur's contention was an extract from a report dated January 12, 1951, which the Joint Chiefs of Staff had sent to the Secretary of Defense. This was how the report was introduced at the hearings:

Question "(Senator RUSSELL). Every member of the committee wishes to develop just how the controversy (over your recommendations) arose, whether it was through a formal request or through discussion with (the Joint Chiefs) * * *."

Answer. "The position of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and my own, so far as I know, were practically identical. On January 12 the Joint Chiefs of Staff presented a study to the Secretary of Defense embodying these conditions."

General MacArthur then read out of a four-paragraph extract from that report in which the Joint Chiefs proposed: An economic blockade of China, a naval blockade depending upon circumstances, and removal of restrictions on air reconnaissance over China and on operations of the Chinese Nationalist forces.

Senators RUSSELL and MACMAHON apparently did not agree that the extract from the report proved that the Joint Chiefs supported MacArthur. Senator RUSSELL pointed out that the General had recommended bombing the Manchurian bases. It was also noted that the UN forces were badly battered last January and evacuation was being discussed. This exchange took place:

Question. "There is quite a difference between reconnaissance and attack, is there not? * * * Did the Joint Chiefs ever suggest that [the Chinese] bases be attacked?"

Answer. "Not that I know of."

Senator MCMAHON implied that the report contained conditions which have not yet been disclosed.

Question: "There is certainly the possibility that [the J. C. S. report] was based upon the contingency of a forced evacuation of Korea. That possibility existed, didn't it, General?"

Answer. "That possibility existed; yes, sir."

7. A SOLDIER'S DUTY

The background: The Administration contends that General MacArthur, as a subordinate, was required to carry out the orders of the Joint Chiefs and of his Commander in Chief without public protest, and that he openly and repeatedly violated his orders. For example, the General was twice ordered not to make any public foreign and military policy statements until they had been cleared by Washington. Yet last March he wrote a letter to House Republican JOSEPH W. MARTIN which called for a reorientation of U. S. military policy—a letter which was made public by Mr. MARTIN without objection from General MacArthur.

General MacArthur maintains that he has always followed orders to the letter. Through his aide, Maj. Gen. Courtney Whitney, he has said the President gave him carte blanche to say "anything he wished" about the Korean war and that he did not have the "faintest idea" why he was dismissed.

The testimony: Senator MACMAHON tried to draw out General MacArthur on whether or not it was his place to challenge his military superiors.

Question: "Assuming for the sake of discussion that subsequent testimony brings out real differences between you and the Joint Chiefs * * * would you then be prepared to admit that the Joint Chiefs' judgment is better than yours and that the American people would be well advised to follow the judgment of the Joint Chiefs? * * *"

Answer. "If [my recommendations] disagreed with those of higher authority, the question of the judgment of that higher authority is not within my hands. * * * That is a matter for public opinion."

Question. "Do you consider, General, that it comes within the province of a theater commander to register publicly with persons in political life, or out of it, for that matter, his differences of opinion while he is still in active charge of the theater?"

Answer. "I believe the theater commander has the responsibility of registering his views as he might see fit, if they are honest views and not in contradiction to any implementing directives that he may have received. * * *"

Question. "Do I take it that you would defend the right of a brigadier general on your staff to give his opinions as to the policy that was proceeding or that was being proceeded with by the Government of the United States?"

Answer. "I wouldn't have a brigadier general or anyone else on my staff that didn't freely and frankly give me his opinions. * * *"

Question. "No, General, we are not talking about the same thing, I don't think. * * *. What I was raising was the question of advisability, if not the propriety, of any subordinate military officer to take his differences of opinion, on a Government policy, when he is in the military chain of command, to people in political life. * * * [For example, your] letter to Mr. MARTIN."

Answer. "It seems to me that the American people are entitled to certain basic facts. * * * I do not believe in the gag rule, if that is what you are talking about. * * *"

Question. "General, you are not going to, by that statement, without a mild dissent from me, place in this record that I am in favor of what you choose to denominate as 'the gag rule.'"

Voice of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ERRETT P. SCRIVNER

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, the House recently reduced funds for the Voice of America. As evidence of the fact the funds should be reduced, the following article by Fulton Lewis, appearing in the Times-Herald, May 3, 1951, is presented:

WASHINGTON REPORT

(By Fulton Lewis, Jr.)

It may come as a surprise to you, but as taxpayers you have been investing millions of dollars in an organization that breaks laws, violates all the basic principles of good business operation, and is bossed by individuals with no previous experience in handling large numbers of people or huge sums of money.

Edward W. Barrett, Assistant Secretary of State, and his aide, C. M. Hulten, appeared before the House Appropriations Committee recently and presented a picture of ineptness, mismanagement and disregard of congressional instructions. They run the Voice of America, successor to Elmer Davis' weird wartime office of war information.

Barrett and Hulten are angling for something like $115,000,000 so they can convince the rest of the world that the United States is kindly toward it.

In private business both would be cashiered in 6 months if they wasted stockholders' money the way they toss our tax dollars around.

For instance, despite explicit orders from Congress, they hired 116 additional employees for the management branch of the Voice at a time when an efficiency report labeled the office overstaffed. They wasted $70,000.

In August the Voice started to film a two-reeler called U. N. Aids the Republic of Korea. Seven months later the film was still incomplete, despite the expenditure of thousands of dollars and the use of hundreds of people who apparently just shuffled the film from department to department. By the time the so-called propaganda experts, Barrett and Hulten, got through with it the war in Korea had moved so fast the two-reeler was obsolete.

The Voice is supposed to sell the United States to Russian and iron-curtain country citizens. There is no positive evidence that the Voice ever actually reaches any of these individuals, although there are schemes afoot to put radio propaganda transmitters aboard merchant ships and on remote mountain peaks. The main trouble seems to be that the Russian peasants not only lack radios, but also lack electricity to run them if they were made available.

Actually, broadcasts to iron-curtain citizens are secondary to the Voice. Most of the talking has been to Americans. This baffled House Members, and they quizzed Barrett and Hulten in detail.

They found out that from July 1, 1949 to January 30, 1951, a total of 364 speeches were made in 29 States, including Washington, D. C., by Voice people.

This led Representative JOHN J. ROONEY, New York Democrat, to remark to Barrett:

"So far as your problem is concerned, I had no idea that you were in the speech-making business to Americans at a time when there should be a lot of speeches and broadcasting directed to those outside the country and behind the iron curtain."

In all, 114 people took part in propagandizing the United States about the Voice, some speaking more than once. Of course, those on the Federal payroll got paid for their gabbing and most, although Barrett was vague about it, got travel pay while touring the United States to convince citizens that peace is impossible unless we fill the foreign air waves with gabble.

Besides diverting funds to pay unauthorized help, the Voice managers diverted cash for building projects. Such activities are violations of authorized Government procedures, to say nothing of being contrary to sensible business practices.

Both Barrett and Hulten are full of imaginative plans for the Voice. Yet neither one, according to their own admissions, has any idea what is going on in their agency. They set up regulations and issue orders calling for progress reports on multi-million-dollar construction projects, but field managers simply ignore them. This failed to trouble either Barrett or Hulten.

On the basis of their own testimony, a conservative estimate is that in private business practice Barrett and Hulten would shove a normal corporation into bankruptcy in 6 months. If we really want to fix the Russians, we ought to lend Barrett and Hulten to them. In 6 months the Kremlin propaganda machine would be off the air, and we'd all enjoy the silence.

Mr. Speaker, I trust the subcommittee now studying the 1952 appropriations for the State Department will consider these facts, and take all steps necessary to stop these highly improper acts.

Witch Doctors in the Upper Colorado River Basin States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, since the timely demise of the central Arizona project bill, certain figures in the upper Colorado River Basin States have carried on a wailing bee over the casket, and have conducted themselves in a manner that leaves their professed sorrow open to grave suspicion.

The Arizona bill (H. R. 1500) was mercifully exterminated in the House Interior Committee by a vote of 16 to 8. The large majority of committee members believed that the legislation contained legal questions that should be answered through litigation before further consideration by the committee of the proposed project.

During the coma in which the Arizona bill lingered, not a single upper basin State doctor appeared at its bedside to minister to it. Yet, immediately after its death, at least two upper basin doctors rushed into print with cries of horror and remorse.

The licenses of these upper basin medicine men should, therefore, be examined with a critical eye. Do they represent the true attitude and policy of all the people of the upper basin States?

Let us consider this situation.

The bill's corpse was not cold before Arizona apostles, in the guise of Attorney Charles A. Carson and Gov. Howard Pyle, scurried up to Denver, calling loudly for aid and comfort. They found it in the hogans of John Geoffrey Will, secretary of the Upper Colorado River Commission, and Judge Clifford H. Stone, the Colorado member of the commission.

For years these two star-gazers of the upper basin waterways—Will and Stone—have built ill-advised careers on a hate-California platform. Now they saw another fine opportunity to cry out despairingly that California had dealt upper basin progress a mortal blow by leading the successful fight against the fantastic Arizona project.

Shortly thereafter Arizona and Colorado newspapers were carrying headlines stating that four upper basin States had decided to back the defunct Arizona project, and would join in a fight against California.

Aside from the fact that this story was a falsehood, the question must be asked: "What have the upper basin States to gain in a hate-California campaign inspired by professional fanatics like Will and Stone?"

California is not seeking a fight with the upper basin States. California sincerely seeks to make friends in the upper basin, and wishes to formulate a program that will benefit all States of the Colorado River Basin.

The assertions made by Will and Stone that California has designs on a share of Colorado River water belonging to the upper basin States are utterly idiotic and are completely refuted by California's long-established record. These untrue statements are issued only for the purpose of deceiving the people of the upper basin. I feel certain that the upper basin States will not be hoodwinked into believing something that is not only utterly false but could not possibly be accomplished under the law.

The fact is that four upper basin States did not agree to back the deceased Arizona project. Contrary to the stories issued by Will and Stone, the representatives of Wyoming at the Denver conclave refused to endorse a resolution approving the Arizona project.

Wyoming's State engineer, L. C. Bishop, pointed out that approval of the Will-Stone resolution "would be at the request of Arizona for use in its fight against California."

Mr. Bishop stated, as reported in the Wyoming State Tribune of April 29:

> We have consistently avoided taking sides in this controversy and especially so in this instance where only Arizona was heard.
>
> It was my opinion then, and I am still of the opinion, that a resolution such as this only adds fuel to the fire and in the long run accomplishes no good purpose and, in fact, might prove detrimental to Wyoming's interests.
> Attorney General Harnsberger, my legal adviser, and Austin P. Russell, my engineering adviser, were in full agreement with the action taken (by Wyoming) at the Denver meeting.

Will and Stone sought to conceal Wyoming's attitude from the press. Nor did they tell their listeners that the Tax Foundation in Washington, D. C., the New York Tax Foundation, the Wyoming Taxpayers Association, the Oklahoma Public Expenditure Council, the National Grange, the American Federation of Labor, and countless other important national and State organizations, including the Nation's leading industrialists, bankers, and manufacturers have exposed the Arizona scheme to mulct the taxpayers of this country of billions of dollars to aid a few selfish landowners in central Arizona.

I believe the true statesmen of the upper basin, and in all reclamation States, will look with suspicion on men who advise them to bet on a scratched horse. Witch Doctor Carson and Radio Crooner Pyle enlisted the aid of Will and Stone because they knew that Will and Stone would tub thump for any proposition, regardless of its truthfulness, aimed at California.

These Arizona promoters are the mouthpieces of big landowners who despoiled Arizona's water resources, and now as the economic bloodhounds close in on them, want the Nation's taxpayers to bail them out with gifts of billions of dollars.

I feel sure that the upper-basin States will beware of charlatans who are among them, mouthing false propaganda that would lead all western reclamation into a sickness from which it might never recover.

Marshall Gives Aid and Comfort to the Enemy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1951

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, in Monday's testimony before the Armed Services and Foreign Relations Committees of the other body, the following colloquy occurred between Chairman RUSSELL and Secretary Marshall:

> Senator RUSSELL. Now, General, as a military man with distinguished service to your country over a long period of years, I would like to get your professional opinion as well as your views as Secretary of Defense as to whether or not the Chinese Reds can be driven out of Korea and Korea pacified without the implementing General MacArthur recommends?
>
> General MARSHALL. When you use the expression "driven out of Korea," I assume you mean all of Korea, both north and south.
>
> Senator RUSSELL. Yes, sir; I mean to carry out the original directive of the United Nations.
>
> General MARSHALL. I should say that if the Chinese Communists continue in force in North Korea with the potential of additional reinforcements that might be made available, and with our situation where we visualize no considerable reinforcement of the United Nations army, that they could not be driven out of North Korea, and I have my own doubts as to whether the actions recommended by General MacArthur would bring the conflict to a victorious end.
>
> I am afraid, in my own opinion, that it might result in a great increase in casualties without a decisive finish, but that is his view to the contrary as the theater commander * * * [10 lines deleted].
>
> Senator RUSSELL. Wait a minute, do you mean to say, in your opinion, there is doubt even if we do bomb them whether they could be driven from there?
>
> General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.
>
> Senator RUSSELL. Is that what you wanted to state?
>
> General MARSHALL. That is what I wanted to state. You can get into the details of this with the Chiefs of Staff. * * * [Thirteen lines deleted.]
>
> Senator LODGE. But you have no objection to having your belief stated that in your judgment the bombing of the Chinese bases would not bring victory?
>
> General MARSHALL. That is correct, sir.

Subsequently this testimony was given:

> Senator RUSSELL. I understand, then, that you recommend a continuation of the present policy in Korea rather than adopting General MacArthur's proposal?
>
> General MARSHALL. That is correct, sir. I must add to that, of course, that if the Chinese Communists with at least equipment support from the Soviets and maybe more support carry the war to us outside of Korea [deleted], then we have to retaliate.

Mr. Speaker, I again call attention to one particular sentence in the testimony of Secretary Marshall quoted above:

I should say that if the Chinese Communists continue in force in North Korea with the potential of additional reinforcements that might be made available, and with our situation where we visualize no considerable reinforcement of the United Nations Army, that they could not be driven out of North Korea.

Mr. Speaker, ordinarily the proper thing would seem to be to reserve comment on this testimony until it was all in, until the record was complete.

But this is no ordinary situation.

This is not merely a reaffirmation of the purpose and intent to conduct a limited war in Korea, dubious as such a purpose and intent—and dubious as the public statement of such a purpose and intent—seems to me to be.

This is an announcement and an acknowledgment of defeat.

This is an announcement and an acknowledgment of failure to accomplish the mission assumed and undertaken when American forces moved into Korea.

This is an announcement and an acknowledgment of the impossibility of accomplishing that mission.

This is the bald admission that the enemy—the Chinese Communists—"could not be driven out of North Korea."

Moreover, this is not an announcement and acknowledgment of failure and defeat made in the secret councils of state, but an open proclamation of that determination and conclusion by the head of the Department of Defense of the United States.

By this incredible statement, Secretary Marshall proclaims from the housetops the inevitability of defeat and the impossibility of victory.

He proclaims it not only to the Congress of the United States and to the people of the United States, and not only to the people of Korea and to our allies—for whose continued support he professes to be so solicitous—but he proclaims it to our enemies, in North Korea, in Communist China, and in the Kremlin.

Most appalling of all, Secretary Marshall proclaims the inevitability of defeat and the impossibilty of victory to the brave American men fighting in Korea while, at the same time, offering them no promise of respite from their deadly stalemate.

The crime goes even farther. Marshall's statement details for the benefit of the enemy the specifications for his victory when it says "if the Chinese Communists continue in force in North Korea with the potential of additional reinforcements that might be made available." Thus succinctly is mapped out for him—the enemy—the sure path to his own triumph.

This is incredible. It defies comprehension. It staggers the imagination.

But there it is. The record is clear and unmistakable.

Think of the psychological, military, and diplomatic implications of that statement. The aid and comfort thereby given the enemy in North Korea, in Communist China, and in the Kremlin is beyond computation.

Now, at least, the American people can understand in some small measure the sense of betrayal experienced by the Chinese Nationalists when this same Marshall, along with Acheson, Wallace, and Truman, and others, stabbed them in the back.

Now, at least, the American people can understand in some small measure the sense of betrayal experienced by the people of South Korea more than a year ago when American officials publicly proclaimed that Korea was outside of this country's perimeter of defense.

Now, at least, the American people can understand in some small measure the sense of betrayal experienced by the people of Formosa when Mr. Acheson publicly announced in December 1949, that this island had no strategic importance and that the American people should be prepared for its surrender.

This time it is the American people themselves who are betrayed by the public proclamation of the counsel of despair and defeat.

How farcical becomes the administration charge that General MacArthur was the offender by reason of his public statements.

How farcical—how tragically farcical—becomes the professed anxiety over the possible betrayal to the enemy of military secrets in the course of the current testimony—for what graver, more fatal military or diplomatic secret is there than this alleged fact of impotence, failure, and dismal defeat?

What more tragic example could there be of straining at gnats and swallowing camels?

This is not appeasement.

This is abject abasement, abandonment, and abdication.

This is confirmation of the fact that continued silence and acquiescence on the part of General MacArthur would have meant his acceptance and identification with the cause and course of treason.

Whatever else may be developed in the course of the present hearings now becomes mere trivia. Except as it may serve to expose the assent of others to this same counsel of despair and defeat, any additional testimony becomes an inconsequential and unimportant detail.

Whether or not we consent to talk with Communist China about diplomatic recognition is of little significance against the background of General Marshall's statement. What could diplomatic recognition add to the recognition which Marshall has so gratuitously extended to Communist China by his incredible acknowledgment of Communist China's assured victory in North Korea? And in the face of this acknowledgment, what strength or firmness of position remains for America in any future bargainings with her enemies?

The choice before the American people and the Congress is clear-cut and unmistakable.

The choice is supine acceptance of this counsel of defeatism, and of the right openly to proclaim such counsel, or the impeachment and removal of General Marshall and of all others in Government who subscribe to and share in this counsel.

God give the Congress of the United States the courage to do its clear and inescapable duty.

Address by Hon. Thomas C. Hennings, Jr., of Missouri, to the National Society Magna Charta Dames

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS C. HENNINGS, JR.
OF MISSOURI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, May 8, 1951

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, recently I had the privilege of addressing the members of the National Society Magna Charta Dames at their annual meeting here in Washington. That organization has the noble purpose of keeping forever alive and maintaining the principles of human freedom set forth in the Magna Charta, principles which have meant so much to mankind since the year 1215. I ask unanimous consent that my address be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

When I was invited to address this distinguished group at your luncheon meeting today, I did not know, of course, that the date would coincide with the appearance of General MacArthur before the joint meeting of the Congress. I am sure, however, that in view of this later development, you will forgive my tardy arrival here.

When my esteemed and dear friend, Mrs. J. Hamilton Lewis honored me by extending such a cordial invitation to be with you today, I was most complimented and was happy to tell her that I would be glad to try to make a small contribution by coming here today and saying a few words on a subject to which I cannot do full justice, so broad and far reaching is its substance and so myriad its implications. Mrs. Lewis contributed immeasurably, in the tradition of so many fine American women, to the distinction and achievements of her husband, the late Senator J. Hamilton Lewis, one of the few men to represent two great States of the Union in the Congress of the United States.

When I received your gracious invitation, I went back and reread the 63 chapters of the Magna Charta, that memorable document wrested by the barons from King John on the plains of Runnymede. Your society is one of few which is dedicated to that great charter of human rights and liberties. Your membership is drawn from women who are the real leaders in the civic, governmental, and social activities of our Nation. It must be a source of real inspiration to all of you gathered here today in common purpose to know that you are helping to further and preserve in the American tradition the concepts of individual rights and human dignity which were set forth so fully and so clearly in that brave declaration.

It is perhaps axiomatic that great leaders and great concepts somehow arise in times of urgent need to preserve civilization as we know it and to reestablish decency in the world. Certainly the Magna Charta was such a concept. It arose out of the hearts of a people bowed under tyrannical and unendurable oppression, but this final revolt might well have remained for generations a seething resentment without open rebellion had it not been for the flagrant and arbitrary flaunting of individual worth by King John.

Similarly, our American Bill of Rights, the cornerstone of our democracy, was born out of revolt against tyranny and abuses foisted upon the colonies by the King. It was the final sense of outrage and the insurrection of the colonists which led to the establishment of a free nation.

Neither the principles of the Magna Charta nor those of the Bill of Rights were easily obtained merely because they had been proclaimed. Nor were those principles easily won in other parts of the world or in other periods of man's history. Indeed not. From the time of the ancient Greeks, men have fought and died, sacrificed, and suffered for the convictions which they held dear.

This is something which we Americans frequently forget. We have become so accustomed to taking for granted our guaranties of personal liberty that we often overlook their devious and difficult development over the centuries. We forget, too, that freedom as we know it, is unheard of in many parts of the world—lands where the people have always lived in the shadow of oppression and dictatorship. Perhaps this gift of freedom which we Americans hold so lightly would be more precious to us if we paused now and again to remember these things. Perhaps we would guard more carefully against hypocrisy and discrimination and suppression and other abuses committed in the name of freedom if we would stop to recall how dearly it was won.

The founding fathers of our country were only too familiar with the burdens of tyranny down through the ages. They had not forgotten how they suffered and fought against the injustices and absolutism of the monarch, and it was their resolve to establish a set of rules for government by the majority, but which also should provide safeguards for the welfare of the minority. With struggle and privation and death still fresh in their minds, they drew up and adopted the first ten amendments to our Constitution known as the Bill of Rights, which guaranteed to all people the fundamental freedoms on which our democracy is based, and which have been strengthened and reaffirmed over the years in the Halls of Congress and in our courts of justice.

The first attempt to violate this constitutional guaranty came in 1798 when the newly established United States was expecting war with France. The Federalist government, encouraged by public indignation over the XYZ affair, passed a number of repressive bills including the Sedition Act. The resentment of the general public to such legislation was one of the prime causes for the fall of the Federalist Party in 1800, and for its disappearance from national politics.

Although numerous prosecutions were made under the act, and although its constitutionality was challenged, none of the cases ever actually reached the Supreme Court for final determination. Fortunately, the act expired with the party that adopted it. When Thomas Jefferson was elected President of the United States, he pardoned those who had been convicted under the Act and were still imprisoned, and some years later Congress appropriated funds for the families of men who had been incarcerated.

The challenge to the Bill of Rights which was met successfully by the people of this country in 1800 has been repeated at other times during our history as a Nation. The guaranties contained in article I, freedom of speech and of the press, have been threatened repeatedly by repressive legislation, but the American system has always stood fast, a mighty citadel, a shining example to the rest of the world.

Today a new threat hangs over the free world. The threat of Soviet imperialism is more than a dark cloud. It is a real and powerful menace to the liberty which we Americans—we who are privileged to live in this blessed and challenging twentieth century—have taken for granted. We must guard this boon of freedom even more zealously, confronted as we are with this real and present danger, lest the lights go out all over the world and mark a swift return to the Middle Ages and to the tyranny—and oppression—and darkness—that held mankind in bitter bondage and arrested all progress and striving and hope.

In our democracy the dignity and worth of each human being is supreme. Our society strives to afford each individual the greatest possible opportunity to reach his highest fulfillment. The forces of totalitarianism despise and hold for naught each of us as individuals of worth and integrity, and deny that we are endowed by our Creator with the inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. In their concept the state is supreme. Human beings are expendable and must serve the state as it directs.

Freedom of religion, freedom to seek truth, no arrest without a warrant, no arbitrary search and seizure, trial by an impartial jury, free elections, government by law, right of contract—all of these guaranties contained in our Bill of Rights are part of the American tradition. But the evil and fanatical forces of totalitarianism deny the existence of God and the rights of man. Theirs is a government by edict and decree, without consent of the governed. Theirs is a government of state controls. Everyone is subservient to the state and information is distorted to serve the purposes of state propaganda. The Politburo dictators who guide the destinies of this international banditry believe in their own infallibility and must be obeyed, not only in act but in thought, under penalty of death without the right of trial.

This malignant cancer of communism, spreading insidiously over the free world, must be met with all the resourcefulness and courage and determination of which we are capable. Our industrial potential and our military might are daily growing more powerful, but our greatest strength lies in our resolve to defend our freedom with all the vigor at our command and to help others to attain it.

To do this we must be united in fact as well as in purpose. We must strive for nonpartisanship in our international policies. Assuredly there will be differences of opinion, but in America, thank God, these differences can be resolved by hammering them out on the anvil of free and open debate and discussion. Ours is a common goal. We must not only fight for it abroad, we must cherish it and work for it at home.

The threat of the Soviet Union is a menace to our liberty, but here in our own country we have a menace to our livelihood. I refer to the growing danger of inflation. If our national economy is not kept sound and healthy we shall be faced with a serious break in our armor as we face the foreign forces that would enslave us. It is everybody's business to stop inflation, for if the value of the dollar is permitted to decline and decline, the future worth of our savings, our insurance policies, our pensions, and much more is at stake.

Before inflation can be stopped, there must be sacrifices—the same kind of sacrifices that we are so willing to make in a fight for the human rights which have been held so dear down through the centuries. All of us will have to make sacrifices in meeting the bill for higher taxes—an inevitable burden in our mobilization for national defense, but those who work for a living must also have a firm assurance that their goods and services are not to become a source of enrichment for profiteers.

Inflation is a thing about which all of us must do something—something more than just talk. It is up to the leaders of Government, industry, and finance to pull together in a patriotic, economic program that will make sense to the millions who must be called upon for voluntary cooperation and national devotion.

In our patriotic zeal, we must not lose sight of the fact that any act that threatens to cut across our constitutional guaranties of civil liberties threatens the basic premise of our democracy—that in the average individual man and woman resides the security and the hope for the greatest experiment ever conceived in the mind of man. If we relinquish the fundamental concepts set forth by the Magna Charta and guaranteed by our Constitution, even though we dominate the world militarily, we will have lost the heart, the essence of liberty, freedom, and justice under law.

It has been a high privilege for me to come here today and to join with you in the renewal of your dedication and fidelity to the Magna Charta. Animated as all of you are by the highest and most lofty principles, I know that you are determined to do your full share as mothers, wives, and daughters to maintain our freedom and security, not only by words but by setting examples of citizenship in your daily lives. Our free Government was not built by lip service alone and will not survive by it. There must repose in the hearts and souls of all of our people the conviction and determination to sustain it and to live up to our highest principles of unselfish service, honor, and integrity under God.

The War in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, May 8, 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD two articles relating to the war in Korea, the first entitled "China Reds Have Not Shot Wad," by Constantine Brown; the second entitled "United States Surrendered Independence," by David Lawrence, both published in the Washington Star today.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHINA REDS HAVE NOT SHOT WAD—UNITED STATES SOLDIERS IN KOREA, FROM GENERAL RIDGWAY DOWN, KNOW ENEMY STILL CAN DELIVER MAJOR BLOWS

(By Constantine Brown)

While our strategists and policy makers debate with a wealth of arguments whether the administration's policy of containing the enemy in Korea or the MacArthur plan of dealing the enemy a determined blow would be our best course, the men in Korea wonder what the enemy will do in the near future.

Everybody from Lt. Gen. Matthew B. Ridgway down to the buck privates is convinced that the enemy has not shot his wad yet. They know that he has the capability to deliver major blows with his reserve power. Many officers in Korea believe that the recent spring offensive was nothing more than a probing attack in force, to find out what we have and what we are up to.

In the last 10 days the Reds themselves have broken off contact, after engaging less than half the force at their disposal. All these military actions raise a number of questions in the minds of our commanders in Korea. Those responsible for the security of our forces are concerned as to where and in what force the Chinese will use the sizable air forces which they now have available.

There are many conjectures on this score. Is the Red high command planning, by any chance, a new Pearl Harbor in Japan, while our Air Force is intent on supporting the ground forces? Will that air force be used to protect the supply lines after the renewed offensive succeeds in pushing southward? Will it be used for an all-out assault when the ground force attacks are stalled? Or are the Russian-trained Chinese generals planning a sizable airborne operation in our rear?

All these are puzzling questions. The intelligence services report large concentrations of troops behind the present lines. They also report a continuous build-up of war materials and there is sufficient information that the Reds do have an air force which, while unable to maintain a sustained effort, could do much damage in one surprise blow.

Where that blow may fall is anybody's guess. What seems certain, however, is that there is no more idea in Peiping of an equitable settlement of the Korean problem now than there was a few months ago. It is still all or nothing as far as the Chinese puppets are concerned. By that is meant the withdrawal of United Nations forces from Korea, the admission of Red China to the United Nations; surrender of Formosa to the Peiping government; and participation of the Reds in the Japanese peace treaty. Unless these conditions are met, there is no disposition on the part of the Mao Tse-tung government to listen to the soft voices from Lake Success.

We talk glibly about the punishment we are inflicting on the Reds. It is true that they have suffered about 750,000 casualties so far. But China has a population of nearly a half billion people and China is fighting on only one front—Korea.

So long as our present strategy continues Red China needs only a thin curtain of police troops on her long coast line. The support which Peiping is reported to have promised Ho Chi Minh, the Indochinese Red leader, can be delayed. It is far more important for Chinese-Soviet plans that they make a serious effort to defeat the U. N. forces in Korea than to help the Viet Minh win a victory over the French. Defeat of the United Nations forces would settle the question of Asia, regardless of what western forces remain in Malaya and Indochina.

The Chinese know as well as we do that in view of our commitments elsewhere there are few American forces available to reinforce the allied armies in Korea. Our casualty list amounts to about 6,500 men a month, or the equivalent of four divisions since the outbreak of hostilities last June. They know that of the available forces in the United States, four divisions are in process of being sent to Europe.

The offensive-defensive strategy, which was used frequently during the last war in the Pacific, seems to have become a permanent line of action. The Chinese realize that so long as that military concept is forced on General Ridgway in Korea, their chances of success are unimpaired.

The war of attrition can hurt us more than it hurts them.

United States Surrendered Independence—General Marshall's Testimony Shows 350,000 Soldiers Were Abandoned to Whim of Foreign Cabinets

(By David Lawrence)

Secretary Marshall's testimony is in many respects even more sensational than that of General MacArthur.

For it tells the American people for the first time that they have completely lost their independence of military action in the midst of a war in which 350,000 American boys are engaged.

It tells that decisions made by the President, the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of State, and the Joint Chiefs of Staff are vetoed in secret by other governments without an opportunity for the public opinion of the United States or of the world to be apprised of the facts.

It tells that, although the United States has contributed the bulk of the troops in Korea, the 13 governments which have contributed token forces decided to deny us the right to apply the military doctrine of pursuing the enemy—known as hot pursuit.

It tells that the United Nations has appointed the United States as agent to conduct the military operations but that the agent cannot perform those military operations without continuously obtaining the consent of these allies.

It tells that the United States, though conscious of the importance of an economic blockade to stop strategic materials and munitions from getting to the enemy, has not succeeded in persuading the principal U. N. countries now involved in that trade to stop it, even though 10 months of war in Korea have elapsed.

It tells that all these troubles and friction between the United States and its allies were never communicated to General MacArthur except in the vaguest terms.

It tells, by implication, that the famous 13-nation declaration which was supposed to bring about a negotiation of a cease fire was never sent to General MacArthur and that only a brief message saying some such announcement was planned went to him on March 20 last.

It tells that the United States Government at present opposes the entry of Red China into the U. N. and opposes turning Formosa over to Communist China but that the United States Government is nevertheless willing to discuss these subjects as matters for negotiation with the Red Chinese when they agree to a cease fire.

It tells that the United States will adhere to that policy but it doesn't tell whether the United States will use its veto to turn down such a reward for aggression or will merely bow to the will of the U. N. countries eventually, as it has done on some of the military measures proposed to the U. N.

It tells that General MacArthur carried out his military instructions as Far East commander and did not violate any military orders but that his public statements—his letter answering a Member of Congress, Representative Martin, and his interviews answering questions that were asked by the press concerning military operations—were distasteful to the President and his advisers and really caused his dismissal.

It tells that only four men sat in with President Truman and recommended summary dismissal of General MacArthur—Messrs. Acheson, Harriman, Bradley, and Marshall.

It tells that the Joint Chiefs favored a replacement but did not have anything to do with the form of dismissal. It doesn't tell whether the Joint Chiefs were told that the President was displeased with General MacArthur's statements and was considering a change in command.

It tells that the summary dismissal was decided on suddenly as a means of preventing General MacArthur from making any further statements to the press and from developing a sort of "cumulative affair" of publicity. This has since come about anyway with probably more cumulative statements and hearings than anybody ever imagined.

It tells that the Secretary of Defense of the United States does not believe the enemy can be driven out of Korea, but he hopes they will withdraw after their offensives fail. He doesn't think bombardment of Manchurian bases will chase them out either, though he concedes that diversionary operations such as a blockade and other military efforts in southeast Asia may cause them to tire of their effort to stay in Korea.

It tells that in a moment of great crisis—when MacArthur's troops were being pushed back last December after Red China entered the war—the U. N. allies became frightened and began to limit the operations of the U. N. troops, especially in fighting back in the air.

It tells that instructions went to General MacArthur forbidding him to bomb even two big distributing centers in North Korea which were 35 miles below the northern border of the country and well within Korea itself.

It tells that, despite General MacArthur's titles as supreme commander in Japan and U. N. commander and commander in chief of the far eastern forces, Secretary Marshall regarded General MacArthur as just another "local theater commander," without the latitude of expression to comment on military events that General Eisenhower had or Admiral Nimitz had or General MacArthur himself had during the last war, and without even the right to engage in psychological warfare in his own theater of action because it might offend U. N. allies.

There are many more things revealed, the significance of which will become apparent as the hearings continue. But none is more vital than the revelation that America, although contributing the bulk of the military forces and the supplies, has surrendered her independence of action and her leadership and has abandoned 350,000 American boys to the whim of foreign cabinets.

Committee Draft of the Republican Platform for Current Year

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT C. HENDRICKSON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 8, 1951

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, the draft of the Republican platform of New Jersey for the current year which I obtained permission to have printed in the RECORD today is as follows:

To Delegates of the 1951 Republican State Convention:

Pursuant to the provisions of R. S. 19: 5-6, the resolutions committee of the Republican State convention herewith submits its tentative platform.

This is a preliminary draft subject to amendment at the next session of the convention on May 10.

TENTATIVE REPUBLICAN PLATFORM, 1951

The Republican Party of New Jersey offers its candidates for the State legislature against a background of solid accomplishments without equal in the history of our State.

Under the leadership of Gov. Alfred E. Driscoll, the Republican Party for the past 4 years has carried forward a program of sound, prudent, progressive legislation so ably begun in 1944 by the Republican administration of Gov. Walter E. Edge.

It is a record of pledges kept, of cooperation between executive and legislature, and of full emphasis at all times upon the welfare of all of the people.

Two years ago, by reason of the adoption of the new State constitution, the citizens of New Jersey were afforded the opportunity to approve the Republican administration then in office. Such approval was voted by the people despite a campaign of misrepresentation by the Democratic Party without precedent in this State. We call attention to the fact that the Democratic Party has given evidence that it intends, once again, to wage a similar campaign in an effort to wrest control from those who have served our State so well.

The Democratic Party is now directing criticism to some legislation of the past few years in complete disregard of the fact that its members voted for much of what they now condemn. In the true fashion of political opportunism, the Democratic Party now, as in the past, seeks to be all things to all persons. It has proposed vast new spending programs while criticizing present State appropriations, yet all the while it is compelled to admit that New Jersey, under Republican administration, has the lowest per capita State tax collection in the Nation.

It is proper to ask how the Democratic Party proposes to carry out its many and varied spending proposals without foisting a State income tax or a consumers' sales tax, or both, on the people of New Jersey.

The Democratic Party has revealed itself to be a party without responsibility, and must be judged accordingly.

In contrast, the candidates of the Republican Party go before the people with this record and program:

1. Civil defense: Under Republican leadership, New Jersey has taken first place among the States in establishing a civil defense program. This has been attested to by the award of Freedom's Foundation, by the Federal Director of Civil Defense, and by the Council of State Governments.

Our compacts with neighboring States are an outstanding example of mutual assistance in this vital matter.

We pledge our efforts to continue and expand this program.

2. Taxes: We shall seek to maintain New Jersey's advantageous tax position. To that end we shall continue to resist the imposition of an income or sales tax.

3. Highways: No State has faced greater problems of highway transportation than has New Jersey, not alone because of its areas of dense population but also because of its unique position as a corridor between two of the Nation's greatest cities, and none has moved more swiftly to meet this challenge.

For the past several years, under Republican administrations, New Jersey has carried on the greatest highway program in its history.

The New Jersey Turnpike, one of the great engineering achievements of our day, was conceived and is being built by a Republican administration, and will soon be in operation.

A major part of route 4 parkway has been opened; others are under construction.

Traffic relief for our cities, such as the Trenton Freeway, has been a prime objective.

Nevertheless, the need for even more immediate relief is apparent. We must approach with courage the solution of the terrible traffic problem which, particularly in our urban areas, threatens the economic strangulation of the State.

Therefore, we urge thorough study of various proposals for highway construction beyond the extent of present appropriations from current revenues.

4. Law enforcement: We pledge our continuing support to the further development of law enforcement in all its aspects.

Establishment of the department of law and public safety, under provisions of the new State constitution, has resulted in the strengthening of law enforcement in all our counties.

Where defects have become apparent, they are being swiftly corrected on the initiative of the attorney general.

5. School aid: (a) State aid for schools is now at an all-time high. Since 1946, under Republican administrations, it has increased 548 percent.

(b) This record has been achieved despite repeal of the annual $16,000,000 State school tax on real estate and the turning over of $5,000,000 in annual railroad taxes to the municipalities.

(c) Under successive Republican administrations, minimum salaries of school teachers have been increased from $1,200 annually to $2,500 annually.

(d) We shall continue to improve the school system and, within the limits of available State revenues, give additional aid to school districts.

6. New industry: (a) During the past 4 years, more than 3,500 new industries have located in New Jersey. This year, more than one-third of all money expended in the Nation for industrial and other research is being spent in New Jersey.

(b) We shall continue to improve the economic climate of our State so as to attract additional industries to New Jersey.

(c) We have recognized the need for additional water supplies for New Jersey and shall continue our efforts toward that objective.

7. Agriculture: New Jersey farms enjoy the highest cash income per farm-acre in the Nation. We shall continue to assist agriculture by our support of research at the agricultural experiment station at the State University and by the development of our State road system.

8. Labor and employment security: Under Republican administrations, New Jersey has set the pace among all States in legislation beneficial to the employee. Our employment security insurance programs should be revised upward to offset the burdens of an inflationary cost of living. Our mediation service continues to function with unsurpassed success to the benefit of both labor and management.

We pledge our continuing support of these and related programs.

9. Institutions, welfare, and health: (a) A $25,000,000 institutional building program, initiated by a Republican administration, is under way. We have achieved great progress in improving the condition of the unfortunate wards of the State. We pledge our continuing efforts in their behalf.

(b) We pledge a thorough study of our many welfare systems to the end that they may be carried on with maximum efficiency and economy.

(c) Great strides have been made in the development of our State health services, as most recently exemplified by legislation for the creation of consolidated health districts. Efficient administration of the State department of health has achieved striking economies which have permitted creation of many new long-needed services. We pledge our support to the improvement of our health program.

10. Medical college: We favor and will support the establishment of a State medical college.

11. Pension and public funds: Our Republican administration, through creation of a division of investment in the department of the treasury, has greatly strengthened the State's investment procedure, with substantial gain to the State's treasury, pension, and other funds. We shall continue to support this program.

12. Civil-service and State employees: Development of our civil-service system has been a major objective of Republican administrations. We shall continue our efforts to adjust the salaries of State employees to meet rising living costs.

13. Conservation and recreation: The Republican Party has consistently supported programs for the conservation of the State's natural resources, the development of its resort areas, and the needs of sportsmen. We shall continue to do so.

14. Motor vehicles: During the past year the Republican administration sponsored legislation for a much-needed revision of the State traffic code, including a realistic revision of the speed laws. Further development of safety programs to reduce the death toll on the State's highways will have our support.

15. Legislative procedure: We recommend the immediate adoption, in the legislative process, of the committee system whereby frequent public hearings will be held, bills reported either favorably or unfavorably, and the committees' reasons therefor made a matter of public record.

16. Economy and efficiency: Adoption of the new State constitution now recognized as a model for all States, has made possible annual savings of more than $2,000,000 in the operation of State agencies. By maintaining the lowest State budget of any comparable State, the Republican Party has demonstrated that prudent, progressive government without loss of essential services can be attained.

17. The courts: An antiquated judicial system has been transformed under Republican leadership into what today is admittedly the Nation's best system, founded upon sound principles, swift in its operations, bipartisan in nature (in contrast to the partisan Federal system), and free of political interference.

18. Civil liberties: Under Republican leadership laws have been enacted guaranteeing to the people of New Jersey greater civil liberties than those enjoyed in any other State.

19. Veterans: Under Republican guidance New Jersey has been first and foremost in providing benefits of housing, rehabilitation, and employment and business opportunities for its war veterans. This program has already been extended to veterans of the present national emergency.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS

The present Democratic administration in Washington stands condemned as completely lacking the capacity for leadership necessary to meet the grave problems confronting us at home and abroad. Through its tragic performance, it has jeopardized the security and freedom of all our people.

The present Democratic administration has countenanced, and indeed encouraged, the destruction of morality in public affairs almost beyond precedent.

The present Democratic administration has sought to impose upon the American people vast new spending proposals, with a resultant increase in the tax burden, at a time when necessary expenditures for national defense require prudence in the everyday affairs of government.

We condemn particularly the refusal of the present Democratic administration to extend the bipartisan foreign policy to the Far East, with tragic results. We seek peace, not war. Toward that end we must strengthen, rather than weaken, our association with the forces of freedom; and we shall not sanction the appeasement of the Communist forces which seek to destroy freedom.

In the conduct of our national affairs, we stand for these basic principles:

1. Reduce the size of the National Government.

2. Reduce the cost of the National Government.

3. Restore to the individual States their proper sovereignty over taxes and territory.

4. Restore a sense of decency and integrity in Washington.

CONCLUSION

No citizen today can escape responsibility for government—be it at the National, State, county, or municipal level. Wise, honest, economical government is the concern of all. For the past 7 years New Jersey, under Republican administrations, has enjoyed that kind of government.

The Republican record is clear. On the basis of that record, and on the principles set forth in this platform, the Republican candidates for the legislature merit the confidence, support, and votes of the people of New Jersey.

Respectfully submitted.

The Stake in the Future of Israel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD. I include the following statement made by me Sunday, May 6, 1951, Ellenville, N. Y., under the auspices of the American Financial Development Corp. for Israel—State of Israel bonds:

THE STAKE IN THE FUTURE OF ISRAEL

I think that if all speeches I made on Israel were put end to end, we would have enough for a kite to fly all of us to Jerusalem.

Long before I visited Israel the principles of Zionism had caught my imagination. The dynamic force which was to lead the children of Zion home again was to me one of the most stirring dramas of our time.

When the State of Israel was proclaimed 3 years ago—less 1 week—it was as if the sparks of a star were shooting out in all directions to bring the news to the world. I was at the Israeli Embassy—then the Jewish Agency—in Washington when the news came that President Truman had recognized de facto the Government of Israel. I shall remember forever the cries of joy that spontaneously burst forth, the tears that spilled uninhibitedly from all who were there, and then the silence as eyes, eloquent with the vision of a promise fulfilled, watched the raising of the Israeli flag over the building on Massachusetts Avenue in our Nation's Capital.

Then I visited Israel in October 1948, during the time of the second truce. What I saw there fed the fuel of my excitement. What I saw there was not propaganda, was not the effusions of a public relations writer. This was it. This little country, no bigger than our own State of New Jersey, of some 600,000 population, was battling a coalition of seven Arab countries, was forming a government, filling posts from that of Prime Minister all the way down the line to that of customs official. They were building the Burma Road which saved the people of the new city of Jerusalem from destruction. Reception and rehabilitation centers for the immigrants arriving at the rate of 25,000 a month dotted the countryside. At the same time they were building houses, irrigating the soil, exploring the Negev, and with it all they were writing books, singing songs, performing opera, and making music. I had never experienced its like. Here were a people beset with every hardship you can name, and yet here were people fighting, working, singing, marching, building, creating, and telling jokes.

Amazing and incredulous. Had I not seen it, I would not believe it were possible. Hope, courage, ingenuity, and sacrifice resided in every person I talked with from the newly arrived Yemenite to the military commander. And enthusiasm. They had not yet themselves absorbed the fact that the State of Israel is a State in its own right, independent and free to work out its destiny. Greater than the enthusiasm of a bride in her new home, here was the joy of living I had never encountered before.

So I have talked and talked throughout this country, trying to tell what I saw. I talked to American officials again and again and again pointing to Israel as a triumph of American principles. Was it not wonderful for us that democracy facing the foes of totalitarianism should find its expression in a region of the world which had never even heard the word before, let alone understood what it meant?

I have talked at fund-raising campaigns for the Jewish national fund, for the United Jewish appeal, for Hadassah, for Youth Allyah, reciting the hardships in Israel, reciting the plight of the immigrants trying to reach the heart of American Jewry.

But today I speak on a different plane. Today I speak not of the infancy of the state, but of its maturity, its coming of age. Today I speak of Israel's first bond issue, its independence issue in the sum of $500,000,000. It is this issue which marks the dignity of Israel. It is this issue which will ultimately release Israel from the status of being looked upon as a philanthropic venture. The dollars with which you buy Israeli bonds will be your dollars, returned to you in dollars plus interest.

This will be the dollar of production. The bond issue has one purpose and one purpose only; that is, the economic consolidation of Israel. It will not be used for food, for clothing, and the like. It will be used for industry and power, for agriculture, for transportation, and it is this production which will bridge the gap between imports and exports. The dollar which brought the immigrants out of the DP camp and from the ghettos of North Africa is not what the bankers call the productive dollar. This is the dollar which has its return in human satisfactions, but what Israel needs now is the dollar to build up her production in terms of industry and agriculture so as to satisfy her domestic and her foreign markets.

For example, presently Israel pays vast sums of moneys for food which is the greatest single item of import to Israel. Through these borrowed dollars of the bond issue, Israel will create a state of agricultural self-sufficiency within a period of 3 years so that the tremendous sums paid for imported food can be subtracted from the debit side of her trade ledger.

Israel can and will do it. Mind you, 275 new agricultural settlements have been established in the last 13 months as against 225 which were established over the previous 60 years. This ability to achieve agricultural self-sufficiency was recently understood by the loan of $135,000,000 from our own Export-Import Bank to Israel.

In the industrial field Israel will expand her existing industries and create new ones. Already a network of commercial treaties, markets, and contacts exist with Turkey, with Greece, Italy, and Western Europe. It is an indisputable economic fact that Israel has no scarcity of markets. It is rather of problem in limitations of production.

Let it be remembered that Israel has one of the most favorable geographical positions in the world. Her ports and airfields are at a point where three continents meet. It is both a center of world commerce and an ideal warehouse and assembly plant for Asia. With the availability of technical skill which only Israel has in the Middle East, firms like Kaiser-Frazer, Philco, and others have invested heavily in establishment of factories in Israel. Today Israel is engaged in such industries as diamond cutting and polishing, the manufacture of precision instruments, machines, tools, munitions, agricultural machinery, and automotive parts, chemicals, and pharmaceutics, textiles, and clothing, printing, leather—to name a few.

In July of 1950, 65,024 were employed in industry, exclusive of handicrafts and the number of industrial enterprises reaching a peak of 300,355—an increase of 42 percent since May 14, 1948. The wool and leather industries particularly expanded into mass production operation.

Let us look at a few of its other developments. Since the establishment of the State of Israel, its merchant marine has grown from 6 ships to 30 ships; from 14,000 gross tonnage to 95,000 gross tonnage. Israel has its own airline—El-Al—which maintains regular flights between Israel and England, France, and other countries. Twelve international airlines use the Israeli airport's facilities.

Israel has a growing tourist industry. In 1949, 22,000 tourists visited Israel. This number increased by 50 percent in 1950.

Today Israel exports citrus fruits, and by-products, diamonds, woolen products, apparel, chocolates and sweets, cotton products, pharmaceutical products, wine and liquors, essential oil, and other industrial products.

Let me quote a few words from the Honorable John W. Snyder, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, who in referring to Israel's achievements in the economic field, said:

"This record of progress in agriculture and industry is particularly noteworthy in view of the complex and difficult problems which Israel has had to face during this period. The very fact that domestic output of needed commodities has been steadily increasing has had a stabilizing effect on the economy of the new nation. The citizens of Israel have confidence that their growing national production will effectively safeguard the economic integrity of their state. And we who have watched the achievements which have been made to date can share in that confidence."

Israel's development in 3 years has been an amazing and exciting record. If you go back far enough in the history of our own United States, you will find that people of Europe questioned whether finance should send money into the wilderness that was then the United States. Surely we can say safely that those who did had no regrets. If we look at other countries which are small in area, but which have utilized the skill and wit of their people together with their geographical situation, the size of the country, you will find, was no barrier to stability and security.

I cite the example of Switzerland, a country with few raw materials, Holland and the Scandinavian countries. Here small populations within small areas have secured for themselves economic strength which far, far larger countries have been unable to achieve.

Israel has absorbed over 500,000 people within 2½ years. If we use the same proportion with the United States in terms of population, it would be as if the United States had absorbed 120,000,000 destitute refugees in 2 years. In fact, the United States never in any single year increased its population by more than 3 percent. Yet Israel at the end of 1954 will have increased its population by 200 percent within a period of 5 years of unrestricted immigration. And Israel was able to do this with its political, economic, and social institutions still standing firm and expanding.

The source of Israel's pride in maintaining her open-door immigration policy is also the reason for the dollar gap which purchase of the moneys realized from the sale of bonds will bridge. This mass immigration to Israel is the most unique in history. World Jewry has sent tens of thousands of immigrants to Israel. I don't believe it is as well known a fact as it should be that out of the total sums which have been spent on the direct cost of the immigration of Jews from outside to Israel, the Israeli community itself has furnished two-thirds of the cost. Only one-third of the financial means for the transportation and absorption of immigration has been provided by the entire Jewish people of the world, including the Jewish community in the United States.

There have been those who questioned this open-door policy. Yet that is the central theme of Israel's national life, the object for which it was founded.

As Ambassador Eban so eloquently put it: "The doors must remain open. The people of Israel who once had to stand by, passive and inert, while millions of their kinsmen were consigned to the slaughter house and the crematorium, while they had no power to intervene or to rescue through lack of any prerogatives of statehood, will never allow that situation to recur, now that the capacity of liberation lies in their hands. Whatever the burden and whatever the cost, however cruel the encroachments upon existing standards of life—in all conditions and in all circumstances, the policy of unrestricted immigration must be maintained. Israel dares not accept the responsibility for whatever may befall Jews who seek immigration and are denied it."

International tensions increase. The iron-curtain countries play a cat-and-mouse game with Jewish inhabitants who seek to go to Israel. Now the passport is granted. Now it is withheld. Dangers increase daily for Jews residing in the Arab countries. If Israel's doors were to be shut against them, she will have failed in her pledge to the Jewish people the world over. From Yemen and Iraq, from North Africa and Iran, the Jews have come in wave upon wave, choosing freely the life in Israel which to them spells out an escape from the discrimination and the degradation in which they and their past generations have lived in Israel. They are irresistibly drawn to Israel as the homing pigeon to its final destination.

No other country in the world has ever undertaken a project of this magnitude, and Israel has carried on, as I said before, developing the country in all its aspects despite the staggering problems the immigrants have brought with them.

This should be the source of greatest pride to Jews—Israel is an ideal in action, combining vision and practicability. Israel has given the world a new definition in the meaning of absorptive capacity of the country and elasticity of its borders. Physically the boundary lines are set, but within these boundaries the expansion is limited only as the will of its people is limited—only as science and planning are limited.

If there are any of us skeptical of the final redemption of the bond issue, let me point out that Israel cannot afford not to pay its debts. Israel, by its bond issue, is on trial before the world, a world not entirely friendly to Israel. If she fails to repay her indebtedness, her standing as a nation among nations will be shattered. This Israel knows, but she also knows that all the factors are in her favor, not in her imagination alone but actually and factually.

Israel desperately needs these dollars, but Israel does not come abegging. She asks that you lend your dollar to be repaid to you with interest in 12 or 15 years, according to which type of bond you buy. Nor does she ask that you lend your dollar and deprive yourself of its earning power. Israel wants the dollar to go to work for her and for you.

There are two impelling reasons for those of us here tonight to invest in Israeli bonds. At no cost to ourselves and with profit, actual money profit, we serve ourselves as Americans and as Jews. As Americans we cannot for one single moment lose sight of the fact that a democracy wherever it exists sustains and strengthens democracy everywhere. A democracy in the Middle East—a democracy alive with skills, techniques, machinery—is a vital part in securing world peace. Only one such democracy exists in the Middle East, and that is Israel. If Israel fails, then the enemies of democracy will point to its failure as conclusive proof that the principle of democracy as expressed in a democratic form of government cannot bring security to itself and to its people. If Israel fails, it is that much more grist to the Communist propaganda mill.

Let us not underrate the significance of Israel in the clash of ideas. The failure of Israel will be one of the biggest blows against democracy.

As Jews, Israel's failure will endanger the stature of Jews wherever they may be. The accomplishments of Israel, socially, economically, and on the battlefield, have raised the stature of Jews everywhere. It has been put this way: The world will look at the Jewish people, and every single non-Jew will look at every single Jew, in accordance with the success or failure, the credit or the deficiency of the State of Israel, which is the only collective expression of the Jewish genius in modern times.

Whether we will it or not, whether it suits our individual preference or not—the fact still remains that the judgment of the world in favor or against the Jewish people will derive from the success or the failure of Israel.

The investment in Israel is an investment without risk. Your collateral is the existence of the state of Israel—her people, her resources, her ingenuity, her skills, and her unbelievable accomplishments in the three short years of her life as a nation. Your return counted out in interest-bearing dollars can be accurately measured, but your return in the expansion and security of democracy and in the security and the dignity of Jews all over the world cannot be measured. Your investment is your stake in the future for yourself, for your children, and your children's children, and for Israel, and her children, and her children's children.

Recent Soviet Pressures on Germany

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JACOB K. JAVITS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, appended is a background summary issued by the State Department on this subject. It shows the vital importance that the Kremlin attaches to Germany and explains why the Communist representative at the conference of the four-power deputies in Paris to prepare an agenda for a four-power conference is emphasizing so much the German issue.

At a time when our foreign policy is being reappraised it is also important to note what the Communists are after in Europe as a clue to their general designs on the free peoples.

The State Department summary follows:

RECENT SOVIET PRESSURES ON GERMANY

The people of the United States and of many other countries are awaiting the outcome of recent correspondence between the United States, the United Kingdom, and France, on one hand and the U. S. S. R. on the other. This correspondence, initiated by the Kremlin on November 3, 1950, is concerned with proposals for a four-power conference. The original Soviet proposal would have confined discussions to the question of German demilitarization, with the Prague declaration of October as basis for negotiations. The Allied Powers rejected the Prague declaration as a suitable basis for negotiations and have maintained throughout the exchange of notes that the issue is not Germany, but the underlying causes of international tensions throughout the world, and that to limit the discussions to German affairs would be inadequate and unrealistic. In its most recent note, of February 5, the Kremlin conceded that the Prague declaration did not necessarily have to be accepted as the basis of discussion but repeated its former statement that the first and foremost consideration of the conference should be the total demilitarization of Germany; it considers possible the discussion of other questions—on certain conditions—and has no objections to a preliminary meeting in Paris to arrange an agenda.

Without agreement on the agenda, there would be little point in having a conference. Even with agreement on the subjects to be discussed, it would be an extraordinary conference that could resolve such differences as have already produced a war in Asia. By their very nature, the Soviet notes have aroused serious doubts that the Kremlin actually wants a conference. Why, if the Kremlin sincerely wants to resolve differences and improve east-west relations, does it use the diplomatic note as a medium for recriminations and charges that have no factual basis? Past experience and current intelligence have made the United States skeptical of the Kremlin's good faith.

KOREA: A CASE IN POINT

Recent history offers Korea as a case in point. In June 1949, in accordance with a proposal from the Kremlin, the United States withdrew its occupation troops from the southern Republic of Korea; the United Nations checked on the fact of the withdrawal. In December the Kremlin announced that it had withdrawn Soviet troops from the northern People's Republic but refused to permit the United Nations to verify the statement. Six months later the Communist North Koreans invaded the Republic of Korea. From the sidelines, the U. S. S. R., officially a member of the United Nations, consistently supported the aggressors, and, by virtue of Soviet manipulation, the Communist North's invasion of South Korea became overnight United States-inspired aggression by South Korea against the Soviet-dominated People's Republic.

SOVIET TACTICS IN GERMANY

The German people were quick to perceive analogy between their position and that of the Koreans. In the event that they might overlook the resemblance, the U. S. S. R., from the very beginning of the Korean war, linked Germany with Korea. By June 27, 1950, 3 days after the invasion of South Korea, Soviet propaganda media were informing the German people that Korea was a test case for the planned American attack upon the German democratic republic. Within a few days, Soviet-controlled press and radio had built up the legend that the United States had planned a new world war and that American intervention in Korea was a part of a design to establish a ring of military bases around Asia as a preliminary to attacking Manchuria, China, and the U. S. S. R.

Since the early days of the occupation of Germany, the U. S. S. R. has sought to discredit the western powers—the United States in particular—with the German people. In July 1946, the U. S. S. R. charged the United States with having reduced German reparations with intent to rearm Western Germany. Since that time, Soviet propaganda has reiterated periodically and with ever-increasing volume the accusation that the United States is remilitarizing Germany. While hurling these charges at the United States, and occasionally at France and Britain, the U. S. S. R., under pretense of forming a "people's police," has been engaged in training substantial paramilitary forces in East Germany.

Last August, Moscow-trained Deputy Minister-President Walter Ulbricht, of the East German Government, speaking before an East Berlin convention of the SED (Socialist Unity Party, the Communist Party of East Germany), uttered a clear call to sabotage in Western Germany, exploiting the beating that U. N. forces were currently taking in Korea as prophetic of what would happen to them and their puppets in Western Germany in the near future. To be precise, he instructed West Germans to hinder militarization, boycott goods and food imported from the United States, defy all Bonn and Allied High Commission orders, find out where armament production was planned and then foment strikes among the workers, fight attempts to create a West German army, prevent showing of American films, and introduction of American dances, oppose all steps favoring the Schuman plan, the Marshall plan, the Council of Europe, or the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, support the East Zone German Democratic Republic, and be ready to take up arms for the Soviet Union.

Throughout the summer preceding the fixed October elections in the east zone, Soviet fear-propaganda burgeoned. An industrial police force attached to the United States Army in the American zone to perform service functions became "the core of a new and powerful West German army." From unkown sources came the figure of 287,000 for the existing man strength of such units and 30 for the number of divisions planned. For Communist propaganda purposes, a listing by the Federal German Republic of war materials subject to import control by the Military Security Board became a list of weapons that the Federal Republic had agreed to import at the expense of West German economy. West Germany, so the Soviet warning went, was clearly going to become a battleground for warmongering, imperialistic America and her satellites, the hour was later than the Western Germans thought, and the only hope of escaping such a fate lay in joining forces with the peace-loving U. S. S. R.

The September 19 communiqué of the Conference of Foreign Ministers of the United States, the United Kingdom, and France, calling an end to a state of war with Germany, removing a number of restrictions, and approving a mobile Federal police force of 30,000 for Western Germany, raised protests in the U. S. S. R. and a few questions in the minds of the German people. To some of the latter the authorization of a Federal police smacked of militarism. Some considered it a sensible precaution in view of the frequent forays by east zone rioters into the west; many feared that the formation of a Federal police would provoke attack from the east. Talk of remilitarization and participation in the West European army increased nervousness. Western guaranties of defense in the event of attack from the east had a somewhat hollow ring in view of the disparity between the 175 divisions that the U. S. S. R. was reported to have on tap behind the iron curtain and the scant half dozen divisions immediately available to the western nations if the U. S. S. R. should suddenly decide to move into the west.

Once the "Unity" SED ballot had been endorsed by all East Germans who wished to avoid the charge of being "uncooperative," the U. S. S. R. held an East bloc conference of foreign ministers in Prague under Molotov's chairmanship in October 21 and 22. Out of this conference came a four-point communiqué that blasted the rearmament of Western Germany as if it were an accomplished fact and called for an all-German "peace" industry, a peace treaty plus withdrawal of all occupation troops, and the formation of an all-German council to prepare a provisional government for a reunited Germany. Five months earlier, on May 26, the Allied High Commissioners had forwarded to General Chuikov, their counterpart in the Soviet Zone, proposals of the three foreign ministers for achieving German unity. The proposals were for free all-German elections for a national assembly empowered to frame an all-German constitution, the elections to be held under international supervision and on the basis of an electoral law embodying bona fide democratic principles. To date General Chuikov has made no reply, and the Prague conference ignored the fact that such proposals had been made. The program developed at Prague was just about what West Germany had been predicting as a follow-up of the fraudulent October elections. The pattern emerging bore an unpleasant resemblance to the Korean pattern: "unity list" elections under Soviet supervision; proposal for the withdrawal of occupation troops. Would Communist invasion of the non-Communist zone come next?

Moscow followed up the Prague ultimatum with rejection of the much earlier British, French, and United States protest against the formation of the East Zone paramilitary forces. It was at this point that the Kremlin asked for a four-power conference on the demilitarization of Germany, just in time, so the free German press suggested, to influence the American November elections.

While awaiting the response to the proposal for a conference "to bring peace to the world," Soviet propaganda played up the Prague program for all it was worth, painting in lurid colors the fate of Western Germany should it fail to support the program; West Germany would become a wasteland; brother would kill brother; taxes would soar; German families would be thrown into the streets to provide housing for McCloy's new divisions; American gangsters would loose upon Germany the same horrors that they were currently visiting upon Korea; peace-loving German men, women, and children would be shot, hanged, or crucified, and such German youth as escaped that fate would deteriorate rapidly under the influence of American jazz and Coca-Cola. The triumph of the SPD (Social Democratic Party) in the November elections in the Laender of Western Germany, even though the elections cost American-zone Communists their seats in Parliament, was hailed by the National Front (a Communist-cover organization developed in the east zone and designed to appeal to West Germans, to promote unification on Soviet terms) as proof that the West Germans were wholeheartedly behind the Prague program and unification according to Soviet ideas. The timing of the arrival of American troop reinforcements and some British tanks for the Allied sectors of Berlin inspired the Soviet slogan of "tank elections" for the free elections held in west Berlin on December 3.

In response to the edict of the Second World Peace Congress, held in Warsaw in November, the East German puppet government issued a so-called Law for the Protection of Peace providing penalties of 5 years to life imprisonment for any German—East or West—who spoke or wrote war propaganda, and the death penalty for any guilty person who worked for the benefit of other governments. It was a handy law under which any German—wherever he might live—who opposed the National Front could, if apprehended, be gotten out of the way. In some instances West Germans were kidnaped in broad daylight on the streets of the west sectors of Berlin and spirited away into the Soviet sector. Following closely upon the prohibition of freedom of speech and press were measures compelling East German families to send their children to the state schools and charging the Labor Ministry with supervision and control of all out-of-school activities of the young, thus making absolute the control of the Communist Party over East German youth.

After the Brussels meeting of the North Atlantic Council on December 18 and 19, the National Front did not fail to exploit the fact that the Chinese Communists had the UN forces on the run in Korea to prophesy that West Germans, should they accept the Brussels decisions, would be inviting the same fate as the Koreans were currently suffering—the fate that the Germans themselves had suffered in 1945 as a consequence of Hitler's leadership.

FACTORS TO BE REMEMBERED

The North Atlantic Council agreed at Brussels that there should be one German division for every five non-German divisions in the unified European defense force if the people of Western Germany were willing to participate. As yet the Western Germans have not indicated their willingness. Since the U. S. S. R. insists that the Western Powers are rearming Western Germany when they are not and that the Soviet Union is not arming Eastern Germany when it is, the idea of limiting a conference with the Western Powers to the subject of demilitarizing Germany—or even making this issue the principal subject—is absurd. For purposes of the conference, Russia prefers to ignore the fact that there is a war in Korea and another in Indochina and that those wars and the tensions created by them are related to Communist versus democratic differences.

Reliable reports indicate that Russia's satellites have increased their armed strength since the outbreak of war in Korea and that the U. S. S. R. has 35 fully armored or mechanized divisions in East Germany and Poland alone and virtually limitless manpower within its own borders. Reports reveal also that the Russians have now restored the rail lines which they had dug up and taken away from Eastern Germany shortly after the surrender. These railways, in the event of war with the Western Powers, would be the supply line from Russia proper through the Soviet zone of Germany.

On January 15 of this year, the SED in Eastern Germany launched a large-scale purge of its oversize membership. Party cards have been called in, and every holder is obliged to submit to a personal and comprehensive examination on the fine points of doctrine. In accordance with the promises of Deputy Minister-President Ulbricht, the weak links in the Soviet chain are being eliminated and the Communist-trained Free German Youth (FGY) will be used to replace questionable fellow travelers and opportunists.

Poland's Constitution Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, May 8, 1951

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, on May 3 I had hoped to be able to make a few remarks in honor of Poland's Constitution Day, but the hearings before the combined Committees on Foreign Relations and Armed Services prevented me from being on the floor to make this statement. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the statement which I planned to make on May 3 be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POLAND'S CONSTITUTION DAY

As we fittingly observe once again the anniversary of Poland's Constitution Day, we recall that the Polish people, first defenders of the Christian faith against the Mohammedan Turk and the first defenders of Christian freedom against the totalitarian Nazi, symbolize for freemen everywhere the spirit of noble resistance against the godless forces of evil.

We Americans revere and cherish our Constitution, but no less so do the Polish people, and it is therefore fitting that we ever keep sharply separate in our minds the very fundamental differences existing between the freedom-loving Polish people and the government that purports to represent them. During my service as a delegate to the General Assembly of the United Nations last autumn, I saw at first hand those who call themselves the representatives of the Polish people. I heard these so-called representatives of the people of Poland day after day heap insults on the forces of decency, sneer at democracy, and mouth their robotlike echoes of the Kremlin party line. Knowing the Polish people as I do, it came forcibly home to me how very important it is that we keep reminding ourselves how utterly unrepresentative are these cynical and insincere puppets of the true Poland and the principles of the true Polish Constitution, whose anniversary we observe here today.

"Polonia Restituta"—the inspiring words which adorn the medal with which the Polish people honor their friends—are words which recall to the masters of the Kremlin that although they may have temporary political dominance over Poland, they will never be the masters of the soul of Poland. The words "Polonia Restituta" are both a warning and a hope for the future.

Crime, Corruption, and the Community

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, May 8, 1951

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, last night, Monday, May 7, it was my pleasure to deliver an address at a banquet given by the Citizens' Union of New York. The theme of the dinner was Crime, Corruption, and the Community.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the address I delivered on that occasion be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE ROLE OF CIVIC ORGANIZATIONS IN COMBATING CRIME

(By Senator ALEXANDER WILEY)

Mark Twain used to say that everyone complains about the weather, but no one does anything about it. So, too, for a long time in this country, a lot of people have complained about crime, worried and moaned about crime. But, very few people have bothered to do anything constructive to eliminate it.

SALUTE TO CITIZENS' UNION

Among the exceptions have been outstanding civic organizations like your own Citizens' Union. I salute every individual who has been associated with this and similar civic organizations—for example, with voluntary citizen crime commissions from coast to coast. You can and should feel a deep sense of pride in the fine job which you have been performing.

TODAY'S CRIME IS BUSINESSLIKE

In Washington our Kefauver crime committee is now 1 year old.

What have we learned? A lot of things. One of them is that the gangster of 1951 uses the most up-to-the-minute, streamlined methods of 1951. The "tommy gun" of the 1920's and 1930's has largely been replaced by less deadly "typewriters" and by adding machines. Modern crime is a scientific, skilled business, operating with machine-like efficiency.

ANTICRIME GROUPS VITAL

Well, what are we going to do about it? I say: Organize further against it. In politics, there is an old saying that "it takes an organization to defeat an organization." It takes an organization devoted to crime prevention and crime curbing to smash organizations devoted to spreading crime. It takes an organization—consisting of men and women of the highest integrity, men and women who have no political axes to grind—to help smash crime.

GREAT CRUSADE NEEDED TO ROUT TERMITES

I have been with the crime committee across the length and breadth of this country, from Washington, D. C., to Kansas City, to Las Vegas to Los Angeles. The more I see of crime and corruption, the more I recognize that it has been so effective in undermining the very foundations of our society that it will take an overwhelming drive to rout out these termites.

THE FORCES WE OPPOSE

When you and I fight organized gangsterdom today, we are not simply fighting ruthless, power-seeking criminals—some of whom possess very keen intellects. We are fighting their high-powered lawyers and shrewd certified public accountants as well. We are fighting their "public relations" experts who have spread about the criminals an aura of respectability and even a romantic charm.

In addition, we are fighting other forces that are even stronger, the force of public apathy, of indifference and cynicism. Let me amplify that point.

CYNICISM—A DANGEROUS TRAIT

Sometimes the man in the street reads newspaper stories on the existence of crime, and he says to himself: "Oh, well, all those politicians are crooked. There is nothing that can be done about it. The criminals control everything. What's the use of voting?"

Well, I say that if the average man in the streets has that unsound approach it is the worst possible thing that can happen. Cynicism never got any man anywhere.

There is an old Chinese proverb that says "It is better to light a single candle than it is to curse the darkness." You people of the citizens union have been lighting candles, shedding light on crime and corruption. Elsewhere in America other civic organizations have been doing likewise.

TYPES OF CRIME STUDIED

Now, in spite of all of the instances of evil which I have found, I am certainly not discouraged. But make no mistake, I have seen plenty of instances. I have seen the story of mobsters infiltrating into legitimate business—auto companies, laundries, vending-machine businesses, hotels.

I have seen the sickening narcotics situation—particularly as it affects teen-age youth—one of the most dastardly conditions conceivable.

I have seen evidences of the dreaded Mafia, the sinister organization whose terror binds together the eastern and western crime syndicates. I have seen evidences of the infiltration of criminals into basketball and boxing.

HOODLUMS WITH FINANCIAL INTEREST IN PRIZE RING

I might, incidentally, say that we have only touched the surface dirt, insofar as the infiltration of hoodlums into prize-fight management and promotion are concerned. There simply are too many criminals owning this or that percentage of too many boxers—some of whom are presumably the ablest fighters in their weight division. The situation is enough to give a very bad aroma to professional prize fighting, even though only a very small number of criminal individuals is involved.

I say it is a shame that sports or any other legitimate field should have become poisoned to such a tremendous extent with the criminal influence. I am indeed hoping that the various types of business and sports activity which have been infiltrated by the mobsters, if only in part, will do their best to help clean up their own shop.

Yes; I have seen these and other evidences of organized crime. I have seen public officials whose salaries were $5,000 or $7,500 a year, but who suddenly blossomed out with net worths of $100,000 and more. I have seen, as you have, evidences of pay-offs being reported everywhere from the cops on the beat to city hall.

I HAVE FAITH IN MEN

And yet, as I have said, in the face of all this, I am not discouraged, and not disheartened. I am not one of those who believe that man is fundamentally evil. I am not one of those who think that sin must go on and on. I believe that man spiritually is a child of God and was meant for joy, abundance, for beauty, for cleanliness, and not for their opposites.

NEW YORK HAS TREMENDOUS CHALLENGE

To be sure, the great city of New York, the great jewel in the Empire State has a tremendous problem. We of the Crime Committee have only shown in the limited time available a tiny percentage of the crime and corruption here, that could have been exposed, based upon the extensive leads in our files.

It is a fact of course that our Crime Committee could not continue investigating indefinitely either in New York or in any other single community. Our aim has been to show the pattern of crime, on the basis of which we would recommend constructive legislation. We are a legislative committee, and legislation, rather than criminal chasing, as such, is our job.

FAIR NAME OF NEW YORK MUST NOT BE SMEARED

I am firmly convinced that just as New York has bred a good many criminals, so New York will develop in turn, and has already developed outstanding leaders of law enforcement who will curb the criminal element. The distinguished folks who are on the platform with me tonight are men of that caliber. As a matter of fact, it was a New Yorker, Mr. Rudolph Halley, who performed so brilliantly as our chief counsel for so long.

Yes, from out of the loins of the great city of New York will come the solution of New York's problems.

Great jurists of the caliber of Sam Liebowitz on the Kings County Court or Harold Medina and Irving Kaufman on the Federal district bench—great judges like these—will do their part.

And so I say to you, there is absolutly no justification for anyone's smearing or vilification of the fair name of the great city of New York.

DON'T PASS THE BUCK

Friends, we of the Federal Government are eager to help you meet your own problem. But remember, you yourselves have the basic job to do. Don't pass the whole buck to Uncle Sam in Washington.

The real answer to crime is not in the next fellow or in the next level of government. The attitude of "Let George do it" is not the answer to crime. The real answer is in your action and mine, as citizens in our communities; in your heart and mine.

OUR JUDAIC-CHRISTIAN TRADITION

Yes; the basic answer to crime is a spiritual rededication on the part of all men, a reawakening to the basic principles that made this Nation great—to the principles of honesty and integrity and fair dealing.

It is up to you and to me to help cleanse the great temple of America. The entire tradition of our country beckons us to the task. After all, practically all of us are heirs to the Judaic-Christian religion which teaches that man is sacred, that all men are brothers and God is their Father.

CRUSADE MUST NOT TARRY

I repeat, as I began, the subject of crime should not be like the subject of the weather. We can and must do something about crime. And what we do must be on a local and on a continuing basis.

I emphasize "continuing."

I urge you not to become smug and complacent when you read that this hoodlum or that one has been deposed and has been thrown in jail, or that an income tax lien has been slapped on him.

Don't become smug or complacent when you read that such and such a number of arrests have occurred, or that such and such a number of indictments have been handed down. These statistics may not tell the whole story.

They may be very encouraging, as I believe they truly are in New York. But in many areas such news is not only inconclusive, but sometimes is even misleading.

There can be arrests without convictions or substantial counts. Criminals guilty of the worst offenses often get away with an equivalent of a $5 parking ticket.

There can be indictments, but they may not necessarily end in the people's triumph in the highest courts.

The point I am making is that it is a long, long battle—this war against crime. Let's not quit in the second or third inning. Let's not allow apparent victories in early skirmishes to puff us up with complacency.

GANGSTERS EXPERT AT LYING LOW

Remember that the gangsters of this country have learned to weather many previous "reform storms." Let's prove to them that we are not going to allow this great reform wave, this moral crusade to die down. It is your continuing job and mine, because it is your country and mine.

CONCLUSION

As I conclude, there comes to mind the words of a poet who prayed "God give us men." And, so I say to you "God give us men with the fire of patriotism in their souls; men eager to burn out the dross and leave the gold.

"God give us men, eager to serve their fellow men, eager to cleanse the body politic and economic of our society—to cleanse away those who have defiled it. God give us men."

Thank you.

Employ the Physically Handicapped—Essay Contest Won by Miss Mary Ann Owen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT C. HENDRICKSON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 8, 1951

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, Miss Mary Ann Owen, high-school student of Bridgeton, N. J., has been selected the top winner in the national Employ the Physically Handicapped essay contest sponsored by the President's Committee on Employment of the Physically Handicapped.

Miss Owen, whose entry was adjudged best among those submitted by high-school students from 34 States, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands, will receive a $1,000 cash award and a trip to Washington, D. C.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point in my remarks, a copy of Miss Owen's superb article entitled "Equal Opportunity in Employment for the Physically Handicapped."

There being no objection, the essay was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EQUAL OPPORTUNITY IN EMPLOYMENT FOR THE PHYSICALLY HANDICAPPED

2315 MAIN STREET,
Randolph, N. J., January 13, 1951.

Mr. JAMES A. WILSON,
843 Tenth Street, Randolph, N. J.

DEAR MR. WILSON: I understand that there is a vacancy in your establishment for a linotypist. If you have not employed anyone, I should like to be considered for the position.

In 1948 I was graduated at the age of 17 from the Kenmore High School, where I was trained for working in the printing shop. Immediately after graduation I was employed by the Daily Times as a linotypist, working there for 13 months. Then seeking adventure and wanting to serve my country, I enlisted in the Navy. In July 1950 an experience I like not to think about caused the amputation of both my legs. While recuperating in the hospital I took bedside lessons in English. I concentrated in punctuation, spelling, and word breakage, all of which would be beneficial to me in my work. Having mastered the use of my artificial limbs and knowing your establishment has the new mixer-type machine, I feel I am capable of filling your vacancy. If no galley boy were available to change magazines, I would be willing to do straight body type work.

If you would be so kind as to grant me an interview, you can reach me at my parents' home, 2315 Main Street, Phone RIt. 6-3843.

Very truly yours,

THOMAS R. MOSS.

Mr. Wilson placed the letter on a pile with others to be filed away. No handicapped in his business. Oddly enough, he found that the next letter contained literature from the United States Department of Labor concerning the physically handicapped. A quick glance and that too was put aside. A caption on one of the pamphlets caught his eye, "Consider their abilities, not their disabilities."

That evening when Mr. Wilson arrived home for dinner he found an unexpected guest. It was a lifelong friend of the family whom he had never considered handicapped though she had had to use crutches since she was 11 years old. She shared with her host and hostess the good news that she had been asked to head the mathematics department in her school. Here was a woman who reached her goal through perseverance. Her 100-percent attendance record for a period of 20 years was enviable. She had earned respect and admiration from all who knew her and had become a light to others because of her continuous ccurage and self-reliance. Mr. Wilson realized this visit was certainly a coincidence, having received that application just that day. Those words, "Consider their abilities, not their disabilities." "No, no," he thought, "I can't have a handicapped man in my business."

After their friend had gone, Mr. Wilson picked up the evening newspaper and read of a dinner that had been given for a man who was retiring after 40 years of faithful service at the Fisher Dye Co. During his youth an illness had caused the loss of his right arm. He had adapted himself quickly to the situation and went on working with all the vim and vigor of an unimpaired. He had been the best dyer and never had had an accident in all the years on the job. "Handicapped workers are more careful; therefore safer workers," he read.

Mr. Wilson put down the paper. "Consider their abilities, not their disabilities." Sweat began to form on his brow. No, no, he never could employ a handicapped in his business. Greatly puzzled and disturbed, he went to bed.

Restless and bothered, he thought of his friend Sam, who, in spite of having injured his back, was not discouraged. His business flourished, and it became one of the most prosperous establishments in town. Why? Because he had been eager to prove that his impairment was not a handicap.

"Consider their abilities, not their disabilities." Then through his mind like a parade came all of the people he had ever known who were handicapped, nagging, gnawing at him. All the qualities which the unimpaired worker presented flashed across his mind. "Consider their abilities, not their disabilities—consider their abilities—." Only from exhaustion he dropped off to sleep.

Waking early in the morning, Mr. Wilson left for the office. He immediately had to find that literature he had received yesterday. Surely facts would back him up why he should not employ the physically handicapped.

Workmen's compensation insurance rates? No; an impaired worker did not raise the rates. Facts proved that these handicapped persons were more productive, careful, adaptable, regular, steady, and capable if placed in their proper classification. The Selective Placement Bureau properly placed handicaps. No, handicaps couldn't be placed haphazardly, but with thought and understanding they could be and should be placed where they were fitted. Why, it even costs less to rehabilitate an injured worker than it does to support him; thus, taxes would be less.

"Consider their abilities, not their disabilities." Suddenly Mr. Wilson saw the light. As though a great weight were lifted from his mind, he called Miss Cole, his secretary, "Please get Mr. Thomas Moss on the phone for me. His number is RIt. 6-3843."

What Should Be Our International Economic Policy in a Period of Rearmament?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following text of a speech by George A. Sloan, chairman of the United States Council of the International Chamber of Commerce, before the Economic Club of Detroit, Mich., March 26, 1951:

It is indeed an honor to appear before this distinguished group and to explore with you some of today's economic problems with particular reference to international trade and policy in a period of rearmament.

* * * * *

The free world is faced with a grave crisis and perhaps its greatest challenge to survival. We must develop—and we have made a good beginning—the strength of the free nations to counteract the aggressive moves of communism.

A foreign economic policy, by definition, should be the true reflector of the world we live in. Let us for a moment, therefore, examine the world at midcentury.

The paramount objective of our foreign policy should be the establishment and maintenance of a just and lasting peace. It should include friendly cultural intercourse among nations as well as mutually advantageous trade among nations.

* * * * *

Today, more than ever before, we Americans are called upon for an expression of national unity, for a sense of purpose and for a decisive spirit. Unity must start at home in our foreign dealings, especially our international economic relations.

Nearly 6 years ago the United States was at its prime of strength as a world power. No one doubted this strength. Today there are doubts about our leadership and policy in many capitals of the free world, in London, in Paris, in Rome. Actually, the power of the United States has not diminished to warrant such doubts.

The Soviets have made two major gains. They have swung China into their orbit and they are said to have the atom bomb. On the other hand, the United States has made tremendous gains. Since Korea there is more of a spirit of unity. Production, economic growth have been our determining factors. Korea has awakened many of those who did not previously visualize the antagonism in the Soviet system.

The Western World, especially Western Europe, is better off today than in any period since the end of World War II. Western Europe has turned from an area disorganized by the effects of war into a smoother-flowing economic and political community. While not completely recovered from devastations and dislocations, the most difficult part of the Western European reconstruction task has been achieved.

* * * * *

The world continues to consist of the "haves" and the "have nots." You may ask, "have or have not what?" And my answer is have or have not freedom of access to the world's raw materials (as promised in the Atlantic Charter to victor and vanquished alike)—have or have not the freedom to own, to use, and to risk the mechanical means of production—have or have not the right to the just rewards of their honest labor—have or have not the right to determine and to control their own destiny as free men—because they are denied their rightful opportunity to utilize nature's endless bounty for their own well-being and individual happiness.

Human misery in the Western World is certainly much smaller now than it was in the nineteenth century. That this was possible in spite of two World Wars is sufficient answer to those who claim western civilization is in decay. Notwithstanding the postwar poverty of Europe and the rest of the world, the West as a whole is richer in kind and in spirit than ever. But the situation in many friendly countries still presents a challenge to the United States if the spread of communism is to be held in check.

* * * * *

A transformation so swift as that of the last 10 years cannot be experienced by a relatively young nation without mistakes in action and without moments of doubt. It should be most reassuring to all of us who believe in the freedom of the individual that our system of democracy always induces self-doubt. The current congressional debate on foreign policy is a true indicator of this.

Surely, America's future depends on how widely and how wisely it carries out the responsibilities of leadership. The central point must be the unification of the free world in the face of aggression and threats of aggression. Each member of the free world acting alone is too weak to counteract these threats or to resist attack. Not even the United States standing alone can be powerful enough for self-defense. Acting together, the free nations by moral standards and productive achievements will bring about the currently lacking balance of power. In all these endeavors our basic aim must always remain the same: The maintenance of peace but without sacrifice of freedom.

The fear of what the next moves of the Soviets and their satellites will be is inherent in the policies and the thinking of free peoples everywhere. Hearings before congressional committees, debates before the House of Commons, discussions in the French Parliament—all are influenced by the foremost consideration of what the next moves of the Soviets may be.

With the free world in a twilight of war (which we hope will brighten rather than darken in due course by our own actions) the challenge is even greater. We have to superimpose a military economy on a civilian economy in the hope that the least amount of belt-tightening will be necessary. This situation brings with it an inflationary tendency.

Actually, the foremost enemy of the Western World, at the present, is inflation. We must stop putting fuel on the flame, while, at the same time, feebly trying to put out inflation's flame with a sprinkling can. Either we all—and I mean all—make the necessary sacrifices now to stop inflation or we will be faced later with the reality of making much bigger, if not total, sacrifices.

* * * * *

Inflation is Stalin's best ally. Next to Soviet imperialism this is the most difficult problem facing America and our friends abroad.

This then is a bird's-eye view of the world we live in. It is the setting on which we must apply our foreign economic policy.

The first question that now arises is: What should be our short-range, our immediate, international economic policy?

Development of strength at a rapid pace to offset the military power of the nations in the Soviet orbit is, I should think, objective No. 1. The plans are becoming better defined. They are being carried out by the Office of Defense Mobilization in Washington on the American level and the Defense Production Board under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). Businessmen are and should be the prime policy movers of these efforts. And, industrial operations, as can be witnessed so well in Detroit, are carrying the production effort.

I am confident that rapid rearmament of the non-Soviet world will—within a short period—create superiority of political, economic, and military strength on our part. Such a state of conditions would make the Kremlin stop, look, and listen before embarking on other diversionary invasion movements. The Western World must concentrate its efforts for the next 2 or 3 years on harnessing its resources for defense.

In the process of rearmament, some distortions in production, prices, and trade already have become apparent. Resources that would otherwise be available to civil consumption and investment in the promotion of freer trade and raising standards of living have been transferred to military needs.

* * * * *

The free world cannot go on focusing exclusively on being strong enough to wipe out aggression before it actually occurs. At some point, whenever the Kremlin will decide, there has to come a break in the international tension. At some point the success of the free world will be measured not by self-preservation efforts, but by our ability to expand economic capacity to such an extent that we can offer to both our own people and the people in the underdeveloped areas increased standards, both material and moral, that dictatorships of any kind are in no position to provide.

In the knowledge of this important factor, it stands to reason that the free world must move forward to expand its productive facilities, its economic strength, its scientific knowledge. So we therefore come to objective No. 2:

We cannot withdraw behind a protective curtain of isolation because for many vital commodities the United States is dependent on external resources. Of the 15 basic minerals, the United States is relatively self-sufficient in only 6: coal, petroleum, iron, sulfur, phosphate, and potash. In the case of iron, various ferro-alloys must be imported before steel can be made. The automobile industry in Detroit is well aware of the fact that 100 percent of tin, chrome, and cordage fibers are imported. Ninety-two percent of our manganese and cobalt, 73 percent of tungsten, and 34 percent of our yearly requirements for lead are mined outside of the United States. Our foreign economic policy must be based on a full realization of these facts. In order to make their economies most productive, the countries of the Western World need an adequate and equitable supply of required raw materials together with a flow of essential consumer goods.

To assure an adequate supply of strategic raw materials for all countries in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), the Organization for European Economic Cooperation (OEEC), and the other non-Soviet nations it is necessary to have in permanent operation joint allocation boards, eliminating thereby the inflationary effects of free market competition for scarce material. The price effects of such an uncontrolled rush for materials is imposing severe strains on the economy of some countries, including our own.

It is gratifying to know that a start in the direction of international allocation and procurement of materials is now being made.

The current sessions of the raw material commodity groups in Washington are one way of controlling this weakness. It is essential, however, that private channels be assigned, wherever possible, the responsibility to carry out this raw material goal. Also, an international arrangement like this should be maintained only for the period of the emergency. Then it is imperative that free market competition must be reinstituted.

* * * * *

The United States Government should immediately clarify the raw-material situation so that there will be an end to the kind of vacuum that seems to persist in Washington. Instead of the many overlapping agencies in the field now, there should be one Government agency—possibly ECA—in sole charge of the temporary allocation and procurement of raw materials.

* * * * *

Three notable and informed sources lately have proposed that the proper exercise of our foreign economic policy demands the consolidation of all the scattered efforts within a single governmental agency. Headed by a man of outstanding ability with public acceptance, this agency should have the equivalent of Cabinet status.

First, there was the Gordon Gray report, rather outdated at this time because it was originally conceived before Korea. Then, the speeches and writings of our own United States Council Executive Committee member Paul Hoffman (who certainly knows this problem first-hand and can speak with feeling about administrative foul-ups in the Government). And finally, we are confronted with the recent report of Nelson Rockefeller's International Development Advisory Board. (This report, though its other recommendations require careful study before we can determine whether businessmen should endorse them is unqualifiedly correct on the demand for a single agency.)

The Hoover Commission in many other fields has pointed out the waste and inefficiency and stupid duplication of much of our administrative structure in Washington and abroad. Here, in the field of foreign economic policy, is a situation ripe for a Hoover Commission approach.

These then are some factors that make up our short-range foreign economic policy.

* * * * *

If the free nations of the world do not succeed in avoiding economic maladjustments—if they fail to establish an environment in which communities can advance materially and spiritually—there is always the danger that the people will be driven into communism. Only by our performance can we hope to contain the advances of communism. Take the example of the Chinese. The Chinese farmer who has accepted or even welcomed communism as relief from the misery, oppression, and corruption of his lot will learn in time that the promises of the Communists are hollow. Collectivism will soon take back the land made available to him. The cancellation of debts, which was made possible through liquidation of the money lender, will be replaced by oppressive taxes. Communism will soon become a yoke.

But, communism has never yet been eliminated in any country where a Communist regime obtained power. We must act, therefore, before the cancerous growth of communism can spread.

An economic strategy for peace should certainly include a drive to reform traditional modes of production and distribution and increase sharply the productivity of men and machines. This is one way to meet threats of foreign aggression and international collapse. One of the major steps in that direction is to demonstrate the adaptability and flexibility of the American productive system to our European friends. Fortune magazine, in its February 1951 issue, made quite an essential point in this respect: "United States business is the best-qualified group in all the world for getting the American idea across to European top management. It is hardly necessary," said Fortune, "to suggest the means: there could be seminars and international conventions—organizations such as the International Chamber of Commerce are ready-made for this—trips and private exchanges of all sorts."

* * * * *

In the United States the living standards and working conditions of the average citizen have shown constant and remarkable improvement. In Europe this has not been true. There are many reasons for this, including the trend to socialism and the emphasis which European capitalism places on an out-moded cartel system. Many European businessmen dislike competition. I think there is great danger in this state of mind. We must distinguish between capitalism which works for the few and capitalism which works for the many. The trend of European capitalism has been away from a sense of responsibility to the community. I am sure the morale of people of Europe would rise if they could identify European capitalism with a positive rather than a negative policy.

Today many ardent anti-Communists abroad are suspicious of the motives of American capitalism. By explaining the true contribution of American capitalism to the world in terms of the gains of the individual working men and women I am sure we as businessmen will develop our most successful weapon against Soviet propaganda. This should be a major component of our foreign economic policy.

We must win people as well as diplomatic and military battles if we hope to stop communism. Communism has been making progress in other countries under oppression and poverty. Our long-range international economic policy must keep in mind that a removal of these conditions is an obligation. The Communists have imagination, boldness, and courage—all couched in a fanatical devotion to a cause. We can reply with far more effective boldness and courage.

It is significant that I am speaking to you on the same day that in Washington the foreign ministers of the 21 American Republics are opening their deliberations on, among other things, how the raw material and productive resources of the Western Hemisphere can be stepped up.

Point 3 on the agenda of the sessions is the following:

"Emergency economic cooperation: (a) Production and distribution for defense purposes; and (b) production and distribution of products in short supply and utilization of necessary services to meet requirements of the American Republics and measures to facilitate insofar as possible the carrying out of programs of economic development."

As we understand it, the Latin American countries are asking such questions as: Can a reasonable market be guaranteed after the emergency for expanded Latin American production? Will we (Latin Americanos) be able to obtain sufficient technological know-how from the United States to expand production and increase standards of living? The question of additional American capital investment will also be on the minds of our friends from below our southern borders.

We are asking the Latin Americans to expand raw material production for the current defense program. And the Latin Americans are determined, as we understand it, to bargain for a position where the gains made during the emergency would be of benefit after the emergency is over.

As part of our long-range foreign economic policy, there should be an expansion in the investment of private companies abroad. Many American companies that have invested in subsidiaries and affiliates abroad have had satisfactory experience with the exception of transferring earnings to the United States. Naturally, we must do all in our power to convince the Government that the obstacles to foreign investments, such as double taxation, lack of convertibility and other similar controls, be corrected so that American business will have incentives to take its dollars abroad.

Private investment going abroad is a desirable way to fortify the economies and raise the standards of living of foreign countries. It is a most effective countermove to the conditions that breed poverty and oppression. Private foreign investment would also relieve the taxpayer of the burden of providing through his Government direct assistance and grants to other nations. When private capital goes abroad it brings with it American know-how and managerial skill and thus directly contributes to the welfare of the recipient nations.

But we must be realistic: Congress should provide much of the necessary encouragement by passing legislation deferring taxation of earnings on foreign activities of American companies until they are brought home. At the same time bilateral treaties must be concluded to assure the transfer of earnings to corporations in capital exporting countries and to eliminate double taxation.

* * * * *

In summary, our foreign economic policy, both short-range and long-range, should embrace the following:

1. Establishment and maintenance of just and lasting peace as our paramount objective.

2. All-out drive to stop inflation in every part of the free world.

3. Increase of efforts to develop, procure, and allocate raw materials internationally—to be maintained for period of emergency only.

4. Development of non-Soviet world's strength at rapid rate.

5. Administration of all United States aid efforts under a single agency.

6. Enlightened and active United States world economic leadership.

7. Planning by business today beyond emergency period.

8. Fulfillment of business' role with enlightened cooperation by governments in making possible an extensive flow of foreign investment abroad.

These ideas reflect the discussions at the International Chamber of Commerce and the United States Council; they also reflect discussions with government leaders in many parts of the world.

In the past the United States has followed a short-sighted course in our foreign economic relations. We sought and rejoiced in the expansion of our foreign trade. But we were reluctant to accept the fact that it lacked a healthy balance and that it was being sustained by loans and grants that in the end would be too great a burden on foreign debtors, not to mention our own taxpayers.

We claimed repayment of war debts which prejudiced prospects of solvency of private industrial development which we ourselves were encouraging.

It is a challenge to the American business community to learn from our mistakes and to act accordingly.

We would be right in risking much on the faith that economic improvement and development, widely shared and achieved by cooperative efforts, will make it more likely that the free nations will stand together. The ultimate result would be that at some day in the future, the Soviets will realize the futility of their efforts in undermining the free nations and suspend their struggle for world domination. We must be ready to work in this direction and to rise above the problems of the day and plan as business statesmen.

The Marine Corps

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MIKE MANSFIELD
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the testimony given by the Honorable Sidney McMath, Governor of Arkansas, before the Senate Armed Services Committee on Saturday, April 21. Governor McMath's testimony is so illuminating that I am taking this means of calling it to the attention of the House of Representatives for study and consideration. Governor McMath's record both as a Marine veteran and as the head of his State administration is ample proof of his integrity and his devotion to his State, his country, and the Marine Corps. I also would like to say that I have requested Chairman VINSON to call for a hearing on the bill introduced by some 70 Members to raise the strength of Marine Corps to not to exceed 400,000 and to place the Commandant on the Joint Chiefs of Staff. It is my hope that Governor McMath will again testify at that time.

The testimony follows:

STATEMENT OF HON. SIDNEY MCMATH, GOVERNOR OF ARKANSAS, BEFORE SENATE ARMED SERVICES SUBCOMMITTEE, SATURDAY, APRIL 21

I appreciate the courtesy of this committee in permitting me to appear and express my opinion in favor of Senate bill 677 which would increase the strength of the Marine Corps to four combat divisions and four combat wings and give this branch of the service representation on the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

You can imagine how humble I feel testifying here following the testimony of military experts and taking issue with them on a matter involving military policy. It is comforting to know that in this country a citizen can entertain a difference of opinion with that of our generals on military policy. (I understand that there is sometimes a division among the generals themselves on policies affecting the safety of our country and the conduct of the war.)

I hasten to state, however, that I do not appear here purporting to be in any sense an authority on military affairs. I am here as a private citizen who has a natural interest in any measure that bears upon the security of this country and affects our ability to meet our commitments and responsibilities as a member of the United Nations.

Naturally, having had the privilege of serving as a marine, I have a strong attachment to the Marine Corps and share that sense of loyalty to the organization that is characteristic of all marines.

It is not necessary for me to review the glories and triumphs and traditions of the Marine Corps. Their battle performance is known and respected by every citizen. The accomplishments of the Marine Corps (on the battlefield) in no way detracts from the heroic deeds of the other services.

Historically the Marine Corps has had a mission in protecting the interests and defending the security of the United States. It has never failed in its assigned task. Frequently, however, its job has been made more difficult—unnecessarily difficult by restrictive policies limiting the size and strength and organization of its combative force.

The Marine Corps continuously, so it seems, has had to fight for the privilege of fighting. One would expect that some day it would be recognized (by those who formulate military policy) that the Marine Corps has a definite role in our military operations and that it would be strengthened accordingly. But this is not the case.

During the early 1930's, an effort was made to abolish the Marine Corps. This effort failed and the Marine Corps was able to continue its existence and by 1939 reached a strength of 17,000 officers and men. These officers and men were skilled, experienced, professional soldiers. It was from these officers and men that cadres were formed and the Marine Corps expanded to six hard-hitting and extremely effective divisions that performed so valiantly and skillfully and with such devastating results to the enemy during the Second World War.

I for one was confident that it had been established beyond any doubt that the Marines had a military function and purpose that justified a strength of at least four permanent divisions. The shooting had hardly stopped, however, until the old movement to abolish the Corps was revived with renewed determination and vigor. The advocates of this policy denied that they wanted to destroy the Marine Corps, but had their decisions been carried to their natural conclusions, this would have been the result. To reduce the Marine Corps to a few battalions organized into landing teams would be to destroy the combative force of this branch of our fighting service. The natural and ultimate result of this action would be to reduce the Marine Corps to ship's detachments and shore patrols.

Those of our leaders who have advanced this policy are imminently qualified and honorable men. Some of them rank among the greatest military men of our history. In fact, history will rank some of them with such illustrious names as Stonewall Jackson and Robert E. Lee. But because of their training and background and experience, they have the traditional Army view of the Marine Corps. They say, in so many words, that we do not need a second Army, and that is very true. But what we do need (and it seems to me that this has been so clearly established that I hesitate to mention it)—what we do need is a combative force organized, trained, equipped, indoctrinated, and steeled for amphibious operations, and for crushing comparatively small, aggressive forces, that if left undefeated would grow and expand their conquest.

The Marine Corps has traditionally been organized, trained, and indoctrinated for the difficult and specialized task of executing amphibious operations. The history of the Pacific operations in the Second World War relates how, in a number of instances, the Marines attained killing efficiency in this field. The Navy-Marine amphibious team has been used effectively in the Korean campaign. I would suggest to this honorable committee that the views of Gen. Douglas MacArthur be obtained on this question. General MacArthur (more than any other Army officer) during the Second World War and in Korea, has had opportunities to use Marines on the ground and in the air in landing operations. I dare say that General MacArthur would have welcomed even two Marine divisions supported by a corresponding number of air wings during the initial phases of the Korean conflict.

If the Marines had consisted of a ship's detachment and a corporal's guard, there would have been no Guadalcanal, Bougainville, Okinawa, or a Peleliu, nor a number of other battles that brought our air arm within effective striking distance of Japan and provided advanced bases for the fleet.

On the other hand, if the Marine Corps had consisted in the beginning of the Second World War of four combat divisions supported by four air wings, the decision at Guadalcanal would never have been in doubt. The movement up the Solomons and through the Gilberts and other Pacific islands would have been greatly accelerated.

If at the outbreak of the Korean conflict the Marine Corps had been a combat force of four divisions (with four air wings in support), the tactical situation would have no doubt been different from the beginning. The Army would not have been placed in a position of having to send most of its trained personnel to fight a comparatively small war at the expense of its build-up for a possible major conflict. I dare say that today the trained officers and men in the Army now committed in Korea are still badly needed as cadres for expanding our Army ground forces to the size and strength required to meet the principal threat to our security which lies in the European theater.

Amphibious operations, limited landing operations, acting as a police force for the U. N., these should be the primary missions of the Marine Corps. Present world conditions, our operations and commitments to check aggression and preserve the peace compel us to prepare for the day when there may be other Guadalcanals, Bougainvilles, Pelelius, Okinawas, and Koreas. In such an event it would be most comforting if we had in the field ready for immediate action four Marine divisions supported by four air wings. This would be a combative force more equal to the mission that belongs to the Marines. At the same time, the Army ground force could for the most part, at least, husband its strength in the build-up for the main event.

To insure that the Marine Corps is organized and strengthened and trained for its specialized task, it is necessary to have the Commandant of the Marines, who is in direct command of the Marine Corps, as a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

I have heard it said that no one favors Senate bill 677 except Congress and the people. Certainly the people with whom I have discussed the question are heartily in favor of a strong Marine Corps which asks only the right to fight and the right to help plan the campaigns to which they will be committed.

I am confident that Congress will reflect the will of the majority of the people by taking favorable action upon this bill.

War Not Inevitable

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, that war is not inevitable, that we should not always live in an atmosphere of fear, created to make successful some political maneuver, is emphasized by an editorial in last night's Washington Evening Star which reads as follows:

MACARTHUR ON WAR AND PEACE

However debatable may be the stern military course advocated by General MacArthur to drive the Chinese Communists from Korea, his views on war itself are plainly the views of a man of peace. More than that, as set forth in his congressional testimony, they constitute an eloquent appeal to the reason and sanity of governments everywhere—an appeal that ought certainly to be pondered long and hard by the responsible authorities in all the capitals of the world, particularly in Moscow.

To begin with, General MacArthur has emphatically dissociated himself from that bleak and potentially dangerous school of thought—it exists in many lands—that is resigned to the inevitability of a titanic, world-engulfing armed struggle revolving around Russia and the United States as the prime antagonists. He rejects such a notion as defeatism of the worst kind—a despairing acceptance of the pernicious fallacy that peoples and governments are helpless before the so-called wave of the future, instead of being themselves endowed with the means and power to make and shape history according to their own free will. In his judgment, another global war is very definitely not inevitable. Indeed, he seems almost optimistic in suggesting that the realities of our age promise to compel mankind to move—no matter how haltingly or argumentatively—toward the establishment of a permanent peace.

General MacArthur's optimism—if it may be called that—is based chiefly on the sound belief that the great masses of the world, including the Russian masses, are invincibly against war. They are against it because, as he says, it has been developed to a point where it places every man, woman, and child in the front line of battle, exposing them to horrors beyond the limits of human endurance. Science has revolutionized the meaning of space and time. It has wiped out the former protective value of land distances and ocean barriers. It has compressed the whole earth into a relatively small neighborhood, and the various peoples living in that neighborhood, being well aware of the change, are as one in their desire for peace. In that respect, according to General MacArthur, they are far ahead of their leaders, and their massed opposition to war offers the greatest possible hope that there shall be no war.

Moreover, wholly apart from the way the masses feel in all countries, General MacArthur has drawn some encouragement from this fact: That every government—even the Soviet dictatorship—must be profoundly sobered by the realization that atomic weapons and similar scientific developments are so appalling in their potentialities that there is good reason to believe that war "is inherently a failure now" as an instrument for the settlement of international disputes. It ought therefore to be done away with entirely. No power really can profit from it. On the contrary, another global conflict (which would be much worse than the last one) would very probably result in catastrophe for victors and vanquished alike—the "suicide of modern civilization." In sum, as General MacArthur has put it, there would be such an abomination of destruction and annihilation, such a desolate aftermath of woe and upheaval, such sorrow and revulsion everywhere, that the only happy people would be the dead people.

Accordingly, assuming that the men of the Kremlin are sane, assuming that the leaders of other nations are sane, and assuming also that no government anywhere can ignore a mass public opinion that is fervently anxious for peace, General MacArthur has taken the affirmative view that it is still possible, and perhaps even probable, that the world can "establish the mechanics to carry out the will of the common people that war shall be nonexistent" from here on out, permanently.

So speaks the soldier and great commander who has been maligned on both sides of the iron curtain as a "warmonger." His chief message to the Nation and the world is that peace, not war, should be inevitable. Moscow papers please copy. General MacArthur's views on this point reflect the most urgent hopes of all humanity—a humanity that realizes, along with him, that time is running out on civilization's last chance to avert a cataclysm that only mad men can welcome.

Hail the President on His Birthday

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 7, 1951

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to offer respectfully my congratulations to President Truman on the occasion of his sixty-seventh birthday which was celebrated yesterday.

The crises which have followed so rapidly in the past years up to this very day would have been sufficient to shatter a man of lesser breed. His are not the weak knees which buckle under the storm of oppression. His is the conviction that ultimately the right will prevail. And so it has been with each occasion which has tested the mettle of our President.

Let it not be denied that he is a man of intense courage; and, as has been so well said, "a man with courage is a majority." With resiliency of well-tempered steel, he springs back into act each time he is put to test. Because of his humanity, because of his very humaness, because of his courage, long after others have "faded away" our President, President Truman, will have taken his place in American and world history as a man in the service of his country who withstood the tempest of the times with integrity, unyielding determination, and courage. He is not the man to be turned around with each new wind. As Jefferson, as Jackson, and as Lincoln, Presidents who had to stand firmly before the unwarranted blasts of criticism living in an era of great emotion tension, so history will deliver the final judgment in his favor.

We offer our congratulations to the President and wish him well, indeed.

Seven Decisions by the Truman Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT S. KERR
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Seven Great Decisions," by Ralph McGill, which appeared in the Atlanta Constitution on May 6 last.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEVEN GREAT DECISIONS
(By Ralph McGill)

These be times when the national voice is all but drowned out by the Tower of Babel at Washington. It is a time when some even seem to think its subversive to support the Government of the United States, surely a strange and dangerous doctrine.

In the vacuum of leadership there is, unforunately for the sake of balance, only the voice of Gen. Douglas MacArthur. And the more he talks the more it becomes clear that, while he is without doubt a great military man, there is grave doubt that he knows how wisely to use that greatness.

Yet, the whole panorama of the great debate serves to point up one of the most ironic features of it—namely, that the chief failure of the Truman administration is not failure of its foreign policies of the present or the past, but a painful and embarrassing inability to state the amazing success of those policies in terms the people will understand.

Let us begin by recalling the patriot Arthur Vandenberg, who grew out of isolationism to statesmanship and whose life is best illustrated by some of his last words. "I want very much to live," he said, shortly before his death, "so that I may come back to the Congress and try to do something for the next generation, not the next election." He made possible a bipartisan foreign policy. It has been this policy, agreed to by a majority of the House and Senate, a fact the people and even the Congress forget, which has been, and is, the Truman or administration policy.

SEVEN DECISIONS

The Truman administration, carrying out a bipartisan foreign policy, has made seven great decisions. They have changed the course of history. They have thus far avoided war. They have kept communism outside the great industrial regions of Europe and of Asia.

Let us take them one by one and ask of ourselves what would be the state of the world if a single one of them had not been initiated and pursued.

1. Russia was strongly opposed in 1946 when she had troops in the northern area of Iran, and proclaimed the Republic of Azerbaijan, forcing her to withdraw from the drive on middle-eastern oil fields—a drive which was tied in with the political surge into Italy and France.

2. We saved Greece and thereby Turkey when the Truman doctrine was proclaimed for Greece and when General Van Fleet, now commanding in Korea, put down the Communist armies there in a long and bloody campaign which was for years a stalemate without any seeming end. Imagine if the Communists now held Greece and Turkey.

3. The Marshall plan, without any doubt, stabilized the economy of Western Europe and prevented Communist political victories.

4. The Atlantic Pact added to this strength.

5. We did not evacuate Berlin, but endured strong pressure and by Gen. Lucius Clay's drama of the airlift, forced the Russians to abandon a blockade they never meant to lift.

6. We intervened in South Korea—an intervention even General MacArthur called sound.

7. We made good our promises on the Atlantic Pact by providing General Eisenhower's leadership to organize.

RESULTS

Each of these decisions was of vital importance, and they have produced tangible results which have been of enormous benefit. But, since the Truman administration is unable to state its case, and because it has allowed the shoddiness and petty cheapness, best illustrated by Gen. Harry Vaughan, to tar and discredit it, all this really magnificent accomplishment is ignored.

Its success is hidden by that query: "How will we end the costly stalemate in Korea and save the lives of our men?"

The Korean war is but another attempt by the Soviets to test us, to find the weakness in our armor. It follows the test in Greece, in Italy, France, in Yugoslavia, and Berlin. The war in Korea is not like any other we have fought. The end there is not necessarily military victory, but to show the Soviets we will fight and oppose them, if fighting is required. In other tests they have retreated when they were sure of that.

We must not allow the MacArthur issue to disunite us from that purpose. He may be right. He may be wrong. But, the fact is we have nothing for which to apologize in our bipartisan policy.

Tribute to the United States Marines

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Tribute to the Marines," which appeared in the New York Times of May 6, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRIBUTE TO THE MARINES

There was not a dissenting vote cast on Friday when the Senate authorized an increase in the Marine Corps to 400,000 men. This singular unanimity makes it plain that the vote was more a tribute to the corps than a precise estimate of needed combat strength. The level set in the measure is permissive, not mandatory, and the actual size of the corps will be determined later on when the required appropriations are made.

There have been some strong technical objections to a large increase in the Marine Corps numbers. It is an elite body of troops, kept so by its selectivity and its unusually rigorous training. It ought not to be just another army. In this connection, the Senate has acted wisely in taking out the original proposal to place a Marine Corps representative on the Joint Chiefs of Staff and putting Joint Chiefs representation on a purely consultative basis.

Support for the measure, with the exception of this Joint Chiefs matter, indicates the feeling that these technical objections are not overriding if the corps is raised merely to the level of four full divisions and four air wings. In addition, there was the obvious desire to give the Marine Corps a sense of security as against possible future whittling down at the behest of other services or of a civilian agencies not entirely in sympathy with some of its activities. Such a sense of security within the branch of service is valuable to morale.

Beyond these factors, however, is the simple fact that the Marine Corps has given a magnificent account of itself on occasions whose number is beyond memory. If it has been boastful at times, it has had a fixed habit of making its boast good. The very toughness of its training has played a part in keeping up a great tradition of intrepidity. There is no denial that its esprit de corps is unrivaled. The Senators found an agreeable way to recognize that fact when they cast their ballots.

There is a further consideration. The nature of possible warfare, with its global emphasis, has changed. There will be, in the event of general hostilities, large assignments that the Marine Corps is uniquely trained to fulfill. The demands upon it will necessarily be heavy and we have been taught by experience to believe that it will not fail them. It has seemed prudent, therefore, to make provision for an expansion that can be vitally valuable.

No Entangling Alliances

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, last night's Washington Evening Star points out editorially that when General MacArthur testified before the joint Senate committees he had no entangling alliances with any politician or statesman; praised him for his patriotic, independent stand.

The editorial reads as follows:

NO ENTANGLING ALLIANCES

As General MacArthur leaves the witness stand, it is perfectly clear that he is not serving as a front man for anyone. Whether one agrees with him or disagrees, the General has called the shots as he saw them.

When he conferred privately with Senator TAFT and Herbert Hoover in his hotel quarters there was the usual flurry of excitement in the more excitable circles in Washington. The suggestion was put forth that General MacArthur was conniving with these Republican opponents of administration policy that he could be expected to carry the ball for them when he appeared before the Senate committee.

But General MacArthur has done nothing of the sort. He described the continental defense theory of Mr. Hoover as the gravest possible mistake. And he said that any legislative limitation on the size of forces to be used overseas, for which Senator TAFT fought hard during the troops-for-Europe debate, as "silly."

General MacArthur did not dispute the power of Congress to prescribe any policy it wishes. But he spoke out strongly against the wisdom of attempting to substitute a legislative or political judgment for military judgment in military matters. "I should say," he told the committee, "that the advice of professional experts should be weighed carefully indeed, and, unless there are specific reasons to the contrary that can be elucidated with reason, that their advice should be accepted."

This, as applied to military questions, is sound counsel. It will be a good thing for the country if General MacArthur's Republican admirers take it to heart.

Mr. Speaker, would it not be well for the Nation to follow in his footsteps and avoid involvement in the affairs of other nations, followed the course chartered by our Constitution?

Threat of a War With Russia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STYLES BRIDGES
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Truman Warning Taken Lightly," by Constantine Brown, published in the Washington Evening Star of May 9, 1951.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRUMAN WARNING TAKEN LIGHTLY—PRESIDENT HAS ERRED BEFORE IN MANY STATEMENTS DUE TO LAPSE OF MEMORY OR POOR BRIEFING

(By Constantine Brown)

President Truman, referring in his speech last Monday to the possibility of an all-out war with Russia, pronounced the ominous words "even if we win."

This doubt of victory would strike the Nation hard if it were not for the fact that in the past the Chief Executive has made other questionable statements, due probably to poor briefing.

Thus, on December 18, 1946, when asked at a press conference if he were urging the Chinese Nationalist Government to accept Communists in the cabinet, he replied that this had been our policy all along.

On March 11, 1948, at a similar conference Mr. Truman was asked whether it was still the policy of this Government to include the Communists in the Chinese Government. This time he replied that he did not know that that was ever the policy of the Government and added that if it was it was news to him.

These conflicting answers unquestionably were due to a lapse of memory or to poor briefing. Similarly, on June 1, 1950, the Chief Executive, who has at his disposal the most complete intelligence reports, said that the world was closer to peace than at any time in the last 5 years.

This statement was made only 3 weeks before the North Koreans began their aggression. Warnings about their impending action were reaching Washington from all quarters. And it appears certain that the Central Intelligence Agency, which submits to the Commander in Chief daily top-secret reports about world developments, had fully reported the ominous situation in Korea.

Last July Rear Adm. Roscoe Hillenkoetter, then Director of that Agency, testified before the Senate Appropriations Committee that his organization had kept pace with the growing danger of the Communist attack in Korea since the previous fall and had been so informing the responsible top officials of the Government. There is no doubt that the President was among the first to receive that substantiated information.

These errors would give us cause to wonder whether the Chief Executive was correct last Monday night when he defended the administration's refusal to accept General MacArthur's solution of ending the war in Korea with every military means at our disposal.

There seems to be no doubt that the U. S. S. R. could bomb American cities. But the question raised by the ousted Supreme Allied Commander in the Pacific was whether Moscow is determined to start a world war now or in the more distant future.

If the Russian leaders have decided to strike now—and only the 14 men in the Kremlin know what they intend to do—it is immaterial, according to General MacArthur, whether we make a full offensive in Korea or whether we continue the present strategy of containment and attrition.

They will choose their own theater of operations wherever they believe the most effective success can be attained. If in the evaluation of America's strength they consider that a sneak air attack would prove advantageous, they will carry it out, regardless of whether we give them an excuse.

If the Red general staff feels that our retaliatory powers would make victory doubtful, they will adopt toward China the same policy which they adopted toward the Greek guerrillas after Mr. Truman ordered full support of the legitimate Greek Government.

Treaties and pledges are meaningless to the Kremlin unless they can be turned to the advantage of the Soviet Union.

Mr. Truman, who appears to have decided to take over even more active command of the Armed Forces than President Roosevelt did, must have overlooked the one and only strategic axiom of war; victory cannot be won on the defensive.

Military strategy has changed frequently through the ages. New weapons and new methods of war, involving not professional soldiers but all the inhabitants of belligerent countries, have necessitated these changes. But the age-old axiom, that you cannot win on the defensive never has changed.

Shoe Worker Protests Government Grab of His Savings

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

BINGHAMTON, N. Y., May 6, 1951.

Hon. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL,

Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Please read this clipping, and what do you think of this smart trick? Most of us shoe workers don't make enough money to live on the way work is now.

We try to buy bonds, but if anything like this happens we won't be able to buy bonds. If some of those "big brains" down there get more money than they need, let them save it. Well, there are a lot of us that can't just make it go any more.

Let them think up an idea to force rent and coal prices down. They are the highest in history and still going up.

When one has to pay $60 a month for an attic room and heat them yourself, you can't save on the salary we get.

Let Mr. DiSalle try to do something about that instead of some of his other jokes.

Respectfully,

A. B. J.

Shall We Have Allies or Face Reds Alone?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Shall We Have Allies or Face Reds Alone?" written by Carroll Binder, which appeared in the May 6, 1951, issue of the Minneapolis Sunday Tribune.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SHALL WE HAVE ALLIES OR FACE REDS ALONE?

(By Carroll Binder)

There are just two ways in which the United States can face its Communist foes during the critical years ahead. It can line up a maximum number of allies or it can stand alone.

If the United States is prepared to fight Russia, China, and their satellites without the help of other nations or the use of overseas air and sea bases, which alone would enable it to strike effectively at the principal sources of Soviet power, it does not need to take account of the views of other nations.

If the United States expects to have access to bases and strategic materials controlled by Britain, France, and other free countries and if it expects their armed forces to fight alongside its armed forces in case of war with the Communists, it must take account of their views in the conduct of its foreign relations and its military policy.

President Truman, the State and Defense Departments and a majority in Congress have been following a policy of cooperation with other free nations to safeguard our peace and security. In conformity to that policy the United States threw in its lot with the United Nations, financed the Marshall plan, promoted the North Atlantic defense pact, and the hemispheric defense pact.

That is still United States policy. Since General Douglas MacArthur indicated last week that he "very definitely expects to come out in the open" to win public support for a fundamentally different policy it is imperative that the American people understand the true import of the opposing policies.

A brief article can touch upon only a few aspects of the complex issues involved in the MacArthur proposals. This article will deal with aspects which until last Thursday had been played down in MacArthur's presentations but which should figure largely in attempts to calculate what would be in the true national interest. That is the attitudes of other free nations toward the MacArthur concept and proposals.

No government except the Chiang Kai-shek regime on Formosa and perhaps the Philippines credits MacArthur with the political and military wisdom with which he is credited by a considerable section of the United States Congress and people. Virtually no other government except Chiang's is prepared to risk its peace and security on the gamble MacArthur urges the American people to take in the hope of achieving a quick and relatively inexpensive victory over the Communists.

Some of these governments respect MacArthur's military brilliance. Many pay tribute to his contributions to allied victory. But they do not trust MacArthur's guesses about what would ensue from adoption of his policies for extending the war in Korea with a view to thereby ending it more quickly. Moreover, some of these governments show disquieting signs of beginning to lose trust in the Government and people of the United States as they see how much support MacArthur's proposals are apparently gaining here.

These foreign reactions may be repugnant to a great many Americans. It is more important to note that they exist than to register resentment at the rest of the free world's unwillingness to share American hero worship or blindly entrust its peace and security to us.

Most of the countries we would like to have stand with us have had their own political generals. They have been rocked by enthusiasms and antagonisms such as now rock the United States. The countries we care most about do not now believe that national policies should be shaped by political generals, least of all by a general who is as bent on going his own independent way as MacArthur appears to them to be.

MacArthur's stock in these countries declined sharply when he failed to take any notice of their contributions to the war in Korea in either his address to Congress or his Chicago address. The former United Nations commander used to speak glowingly of the U. N. but he made no reference to it in his first major pronouncements on his return to the United States. In his testimony before congressional committees on May 3 MacArthur said, in answer to a question, that the U. N. and various nations which contributed their troops to Korea, were splendid in every respect, but that tribute came late and was lost sight of in the 55,000 words of questions and answers.

MacArthur had previously offended many U. N. members by his visit to Chiang Kai-shek, his remarks on Formosa to the Veterans of Foreign Wars, his disregard of British and Indian information and advice about the intentions of the Chinese Reds and his persistent campaign to obtain a free hand to enlarge operations against the Communists. Earlier MacArthur had annoyed some of those countries by the arbitrary manner in which he conducted the occupation of Japan. They felt they had a right to be consulted about basic policies because of their contributions to the defeat of Japan and their interests in that part of the world.

MacArthur's great contributions to the defeat and rehabilitation of Japan and to the conduct of operations against the Communists in Korea may entitle him, in the opinion of many Americans, to greater acceptance than he enjoys among our allies. The limited contributions of other countries to the operations in Korea may dispose many Americans to believe that American views, particularly MacArthur's views, should be accepted by other countries.

The fact remains that other countries do not accept MacArthur's views about how best to resist communism and are beginning to fear that the United States may accept MacArthur's views.

The corollary of this fact is that the United States cannot count upon any government except the Chiang Kai-shek regime to help it cope with what may ensue from abandoning the policy of dealing with the Korean and other crises in cooperation with the U. N. Perhaps the Philippines and a few other small countries would go wherever MacArthur policies may take the United States if those policies should be adopted.

But a large part of the free world would consider any enlargement of the war which might ensue from adoption of MacArthur's policies solely an American responsibility. The same countries which told us an approach to the Yalu River by MacArthur's forces would bring Red China into the war tell us extension of the war as MacArthur proposes would bring Russia into the war.

Any free countries which would try to remain neutral while the United States and Russia and Red China fought such a war would risk subsequent domination by Russia. Some countries seem disposed to consider that risk less than the risk of becoming involved in hostilities which might arise out of adoption of the MacArthur plans.

It would be a tremendous gain for the Communists if the free world should ever be brought to the verge of having a make such a terrible choice. It would be a tremendous gain for the Communists if the United States becomes sharply divided over whether to follow the MacArthur policies or continue working through the U. N. for ending the hostilities in Korea and achieving collective security.

Yet this is what the issues raised by MacArthur seem to be heading us toward. It is possible, of course, that things would work out as MacArthur believes they would if his policies are substituted for the present policies. If Red China caved in under American attacks and if Russia defaulted on its treaty obligation to go to the aid of Red China, the United States perhaps could get along without help from allies. It could afford to be isolated as MacArthur said Thursday he is prepared to see it isolated in pursuit of his aims.

But that is a far bigger gamble, in my opinion, than is involved in the present policy of trying to achieve peace without appeasement in Korea and in seeking security in collaboration with other freedom-loving nations. If a general war breaks out despite our efforts to avoid it, we will have the help of potent allies in fighting it. We will be able to bomb vital centers in Russia from bases in Europe and Africa which would permit maximum use of our strategic air power. For these and other reasons I hope the United States will reject the MacArthur proposals and continue to seek peace and security in collaboration with like-minded countries.

U. N.'s Lack of Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 17, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following article from the Boston Traveler, Tuesday, May 8, 1951:

POLICY VERSUS NO POLICY

One thing has become crystal clear even at this early stage in the MacArthur hearings—the United Nations did not provide that degree of support for the Korean war which was morally and practically required by its own undertaking.

From first to last since November 9, 1950, when the Red Chinese invaded, the U. N. has been in moral rout. Infected with the suicidal impulse that killed the old League of Nations, it has shrunk back from its own assertion of legal and moral principle.

Before aggression, the U. N. has withdrawn further and further into its own framework of timidity. It wasn't until February 1 that the General Assembly voted to name Red China an aggressor.

Having uttered the word, the U. N. has failed even to embargo the shipment of strategic war materials to the Red Chinese. Here is an action that could have been taken with no risk of extending the war. It is an action that each U. N. member of the free world should have taken on its own authority. Britain just yesterday acted to cut off this trade.

Yet it was the clear duty of the U. N. to enforce such an embargo upon its members. The United States has submitted such a proposal to the U. N.'s "Additional Measures Committee." And there it lies, unacted upon.

General MacArthur cited figures from the United States Consul General in Hong Kong showing that in three short weeks war materials to the value of $40,000,000 cleared that port for Red China.

The U. N. has seemed to be stampeding for a Dunkirk of its own at such a craven pace that its forces were forgotten in the field. It is precisely in such a vacuum that bold proposals like those of General MacArthur are conceived and find acceptance. It is in such a vacuum that death becomes bitter, disgust rises, and we find converts to such an extreme view as that of MacArthur when he urged that if necessary we go it without allies.

If the American people were following MacArthur toward what many believe to be a dangerous abyss, it was because other leadership was silent. We have rejected an able general, and one of the paramount reasons was to retain our allies. MacArthur's policies were too risky for them and, perhaps, for us. But it should now be made emphatic that we do not intend to turn from one of our own leaders who was ready to assume maximum risks to tolerate allied policies that will not even halt trade that is killing our soldiers.

One thing upon which MacArthur and administration spokesmen now agree is that we are in mortal danger too pervasive for trade-as-usual, business-as-usual, or politics-as-usual.

The U. N., as a major contributor to American confusion, had now better clamber back out of its storm cellar and demonstrate that it can rekindle the flame of effective collective action. We can't reject MacArthur's policy for the U. N.'s lack of policy.

What U. N. Policies, Mr. President?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by David Lawrence, from the United States News and World Report for May 4, 1951:

WHAT U. N. POLICIES, MR. PRESIDENT?

(By David Lawrence)

President Truman gave as his public reason for dismissing General MacArthur an alleged failure on the part of the general to give wholehearted support to the policies of the United States Government and of the United Nations in matters pertaining to his official duties.

What policies? What official duties?

The Nation today is in an inquiring mood. So is Congress. The President, in the interest of truth, should make available every piece of information on the subject and should himself break precedent and go before committees of Congress and testify.

For only by interrogating the Commander in Chief and the head of our civilian authority can we get at the truth authoritatively. He alone is responsible. Embarrassed or incompetent subordinates cannot answer. This is not the time to hide behind the precedents of a horse-and-buggy age which say that a President never goes before a committee of Congress.

If, however, Mr. Truman declines to testify in person before a committee, he has no valid reason for withholding from the American people answers to the questions Congress may ask in writing in order to get the facts about his policies and U. N. policies.

Let us have all the truth about the Attlee-Truman conference.

Why did our President agree to allow Great Britain to continue to give aid and comfort to Red China?

What kind of an alliance have we with Great Britain which permits her to ship war supplies to Red China while American boys are being killed with those munitions of war by the Red Chinese?

What kind of support has India or the Arab countries given to the recent U. N. resolution that brands Red China as an aggressor?

What has British diplomacy been doing to frustrate United States policies in the Far East?

Is the dismissal of MacArthur at the behest of foreign governments an evidence that membership in the U. N. means submission by the United States to the dictation of other governments without so much as a formal vote in the U. N. to put each nation on record?

What U. N. policies, Mr. President, did General MacArthur fail to support? When and where were those policies adopted? Can we find anywhere in the public record a statement of those policies of the U. N.? And, if done in secret, by what authority has the President of the United States made such agreements with foreign governments without submitting them to Congress?

Why has the U. N. become a hotbed of collective treason to its own resolutions? Great Britain, by continuing her recognition of the Government of Red China, has made a scrap of paper of the resolution of the U. N. which branded Red China as an aggressor. Why does Great Britain continually propose that the aggressor be rewarded with a seat in the U. N.?

Why did the United Nations call upon its members to supply troops to aid in Korea and yet refuse to accept the troops of the Nationalist Government of China which has a seat in the U. N. and is a lawful member of that organization? Is that a U. N. policy?

Why do Great Britain, India, and other U. N. members disassociate themselves from our President's order of last June to the United States Navy to defend Formosa?

Why, when our Government now sends a military mission to Formosa to train troops of the Nationalist Government for defense of the island, is there no U. N. support for that move or any proposal from America that our U. N. allies join in that mission? What kind of a U. N. policy is this?

Mr. Truman cannot have it both ways—he cannot claim that the civilian authority was disregarded by General MacArthur and at the same time fail to define for the other branch of the civilian authority—the Congress—what are the policies that have supposedly been ignored.

Let us be done with the smokescreens raised by politicians in Congress who have come to the superficial conclusion that the MacArthur episode is just a case of military insubordination. That's an explanation which will not satisfy the mothers and fathers and other relatives of the 60,000 American boys who have been killed or wounded in Korea, and of the many more yet to be added to the casualty list.

There must be an American concept in the Democratic Party. It cannot condone the perfidy of our allies and yet make it a crime for the military commander of the U. N. to plead for orders to permit him to strike back with maximum force at the enemy in the field.

If the Democratic Party in Congress cannot forget its partisanship while American blood is being spilled in Korea, if its leaders and spokesmen insist on ignoring the blunders of an administration which has played politics with the rules of war governing the pursuit of an enemy, then the Democratic Party is doomed to extinction. It will then become known in history as the "peace at any price" party—the party that ordered American youth into Korea and then forsook them.

Happenings in Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. EDWARD MARTIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a broadcast by me entitled "Happenings in Washington—Program No. 40." This broadcast was made on Monday of this week.

There being no objection the broadcast was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HAPPENINGS IN WASHINGTON

(Program No. 40)

TEXT OF BROADCAST BY UNITED STATES SENATOR EDWARD MARTIN, OF PENNSYLVANIA

This is ED MARTIN, speaking to you from the Nation's Capital and bringing you another discussion of Happenings in Washington.

One of the best things that has happened in our country in a long time is new, active, and vigorous awakening of interest in public affairs.

In many ways the people have been brought closer to their Government. It has been proven beyond any doubt that when the people are informed they will swing into action. They will demand good, honest, decent government. They will fight to preserve the ideals which are the foundation of the American way of life.

In recent broadcasts I have discussed the Kefauver committee investigation into organized crime, racketeering, and the corruption of law-enforcement officials. I have discussed the Fulbright committee hearings into favoritism and political influence in RFC loans, leading right into the White House.

I have told you about the overwhelming wave of public indignation over the dismissal of General MacArthur and the widespread condemnation of the Acheson appeasement policy in the Far East.

Today I want to talk to you about another investigation that is going on. It has been pushed into the background by the MacArthur controversy and the other Senate hearings.

But it deals with the most evil and most dangerous thing in the world today—communism.

As you know I have fought communism hard whenever and wherever I found it. I was in this fight back in those complacent years when it was exceedingly unpopular. We who warned against the dangers of communism in those days were ridiculed and smeared as crackpots, alarmists, and Red-baiters.

Today the American people are better informed. They recognize communism as a godless conspiracy to destroy freedom in the whole world—including the United States.

There is need for still more information. Some startling facts have been coming out here in Washington. But they have not received the attention they deserve.

You know, of course, that the House Committee on Un-American activities has resumed its probe of communism in Hollywood. I want to help get these hearings into the limelight of public attention where they belong.

Some big names in motion pictures have appeared as witnesses.

Some have given remarkable testimony. Others have defied the committee. They have refused to answer its questions on the ground that to do so would be self-incriminating. They have claimed the protection of the fifth amendment of our Constitution against self-incrimination.

Well, I trust to the good sense of the American people. They know how to evaluate a man who refuses on ground of self-incrimination to say whether he was ever a Communist. They know how to evaluate witnesses who refuse to say whether they would bear arms for this country in case of war with Russia.

I want to call your attention now to some of the witnesses who did cooperate.

I refer to the screen stars, Larry Parks and Sterling Hayden; the director, Edward Dmytryk; and the screen writer, Richard Collins. Others, of course, will come forward at future hearings.

Each of the four I have mentioned admitted he was formerly a Communist in Hollywood. Each of them told how they came to their senses. They awakened to the menace of communism and quit the party. Each came before the committee and made a clean breast of it. They gave all the information they could to arouse the American public. And they named other leading writers, actors, and directors in Hollywood as Communists or former Communists.

Some people in Pennsylvania may ask: "Well, what about it? What harm can a few Communists do out there in Hollywood?"

That is what I want to explain to you.

But, first, I want to make one thing very clear. Although the Communist high command made a definite drive to control the movies for its own wicked purposes, that drive failed. The vast majority of our motion-picture workers in Hollywood have always been decent, patriotic, anti-Communist Americans.

Unfortunately, not all of them understood the real nature of communism. Without realizing what they were doing some followed the lead of Communists in certain activities.

Some joined Communist-front organizations, without realizing they were becoming cat's-paws for Moscow. Some in Hollywood joined the party itself. They were tricked by that false label called liberalism.

About 30 years ago, Lenin—then the Russian dictator and the head of the world Communist movement—laid down an interesting policy statement. He said that the movies were perhaps the most important of all mediums for propaganda. He pointed out that millions of people in every country go to the movies regularly and could be influenced by what they saw on the screen.

So he set up the principle that the Communists must control what appeared on the motion-picture screen.

In this country a drive got under way. In the late 1920's and the early 1930's, Communist organizers moved into Hollywood and started the first party cells there. They recruited both creative workers and skilled labor in the studios.

They were out to get control of American movies so that they could sneak Communist propaganda into pictures and keep anti-Communist material out of pictures. The basic and ultimate purpose was to poison the minds of 150,000,000 Americans who buy 90,000,000 movie tickets every week.

There was a second purpose. Many people in Hollywood earn very large salaries. They could be good sources of funds for the party.

A third purpose was to gain prestige for their various organizations, drives and causes, by using the names of popular film stars.

For a considerable period, the Communists made progress on all three fronts. And all this time the American public was completely unaware of what was going on. Commissars ran the party in Hollywood. They got their orders from the national headquarters in New York which, in turn, took its orders from Moscow.

Mind you, my fellow Pennsylvanians, this is information that now comes from former active members of the party in Hollywood.

For 15 years the Communists dominated the Screen Writers Guild. This is the closed shop union to which every man and woman who writes movie scripts must belong.

One of these writers admitted before the committee that he paid Communist Party assessments of about $160 a month for several years. That's just one individual. Multiply that many times and you get some idea of the financial support that came out of Hollywood for communism all over the United States.

Witnesses disclosed that the grip of communism on this union was not broken until it was exposed by the House Un-American Activities Committee in October 1947.

You may remember how that committee was smeared and attacked at the time. Many honest, self-styled liberals joined in those attacks. Yet, witnesses today admit the attacks were all secretly directed by Communists. And they admit that if it hadn't been for that investigation, the Reds might still control this important union.

The truth is coming out now. It is important to know the real facts.

You may not recall it, but in 1945 and 1946, Hollywood was torn by a terrible series of strikes in the studios. It appeared to be a jurisdictional row between two groups of unions. Now former Communists, appearing before the committee, have admitted that those strikes were Communist-dominated and conceived. This, it turns out, was the secret drive of the Communists to get control of the studio labor unions.

The attempt failed—but it was a close call.

In order to smuggle Communist messages into pictures, the party needed a solid chain of control of the unions—the skilled labor, the writers, and the artists. It never got that control. But you can see how important it was and the effort that was made.

Today the danger has been removed. The motion-picture industry is on its guard to prevent any Communist taint.

The attempt to influence American thinking by motion-picture propaganda was only one step in the Communist program. The same objective was behind their infiltration into labor unions, schools and colleges, professional organizations, minority groups, youth movements, and even the churches.

You know how deeply they penetrated into the organized labor movement, gaining complete control of some unions. Fortunately, under the leadership of such men as William Green and Philip Murray, the patriotic spirit of the American workingman was aroused. The danger was recognized, and, with some exceptions, Communists no longer hold important positions in organized labor.

Communist agitators have been active on every college campus, spreading their poisonous lies among our young people. They have misled some teachers and writers of textbooks into accepting the Red party line.

There are Communist groups among lawyers, doctors, and the clergy.

The Communist philosophy has attracted many who regard themselves as intellectuals. It has gained support among some people who have inherited wealth and lead an easy way of life.

Worst of all has been the infiltration of Reds, pinks, and fellow travelers into places of trust and importance in the Government.

Some of you listening to me may have knowledge of communism in your own community. Some of you may be former members who quit when you realized that it was a vicious conspiracy to overthrow our country and make the United States a vassal state of the Soviet Union.

You can prove your patriotism and good Americanism if you will go to the nearest FBI office and supply all the information you have. Our Government needs every bit of information that will help protect the safety and security of the United States.

You may know something that the FBI is not yet aware of. If so, you should come forward. The Red conspiracy against our land goes on night and day.

Remember it goes on not only in Hollywood. In our Government it caused men like Alger Hiss to turn over secret documents to the Russians. It transformed scientists into traitors and caused them to betray atom bomb secrets to the Reds.

Americans cannot sit back and relax. We must be constantly vigilant against the Red menace in our own midst.

We must sell Americanism.

An understanding American soldier sold it to the people of the Philippines and when America was in serious trouble the Philippines stood loyally by us.

Five and a half years ago he went into Japan as a conqueror. Immediately he started to preach American ideals.

In this discussion we should remember that Japan is an old and proud country. They worshiped their Emperor as a God. In the very short period of 5½ years they were accepting the ideals of our country.

When that great American left that country a few weeks ago, 2,000,000 people turned out to pay him tribute.

If General MacArthur could do such a marvelous job, we Americans here at home should do even a better job.

We can sell America. Let us all get busy and do it.

This is Ed Martin, speaking to you from the Nation's capitol. I will be with you again in 2 weeks. Thank you for your attention.

The Opportunity for Christian Leadership in the World Today

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH E. FLANDERS
OF VERMONT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the address delivered by the Ambassador from Australia, Mr. Norman J. O. Makin, at the international Christian leadership luncheon held in the Vandenberg room, Senate restaurant, on the 29th of March last. The subject of the address was The Opportunity for Christian Leadership in the World Today.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senator FLANDERS and Christian friends, it is fitting that we should meet in the room named after a man who has shown such great leadership and fine qualities of statesmanship. At this time he is to be especially remembered with earnest sympathy and appreciation. Our prayers would be that he should be afforded progressive renewal to good health.

The subject which I have been asked to introduce to your notice is The Opportunity for Christian Leadership in the World Today. The opportunities are so obvious that really no persuasive powers of mine need to be employed in establishing the truth as it stands.

I suppose every age and period has its moments of accounting and of feeling that the present is not as good a time as those that have passed, and that there is a certain moral deterioration and lack of what is nothing more than downright common honesty. Yes; that is true of the world today, but I think that the present period is no worse than any former time. The reason why at times possibly we think it is is because we are nearer to current happenings and are consequently more susceptible to their effect, whereas when we read of similar incidents as a part of history we do not give them the same attention.

I should like to emphasize that until the end of time we shall always be confronted with the great problem of good and evil—of choosing the good and fighting against the evil. There were some truly terrifying conditions that men of Christian faith had to meet in past times—persecutions, inhumanities, conditions of slavery, the evils and terrors of misjudgments and their penalties. One could continue on with an indefinite list which, when compared with conditions of the present day, would show that we must not be in despair.

Nevertheless, I recognize there are situations at the present time which present a grave challenge to those of us who cherish the faith and living ideals of Christianity. There is a feeling of bewilderment at the tide of events. This is where we must—as did the Apostle Paul—challenge the evils of the day. We must convince men—no matter of what degree or state—that there is but one answer to the world's problems—and that is Christ.

God's salvation, which was made possible to men through those solemn incidents which we have but recently commemorated over this Eastertime, is such that the world must learn that it is through Christ alone that the right way is found. All our problems become clear, all our bewilderments and fears melt away, in the light of the divine message.

The Apostle John reveals a remarkable phenomenon about light. It is not comprehended by the darkness. He said, "The light shineth in the darkness, and the darkness comprehendeth it not." There is a loneliness about darkness. How tragic that men should prefer to walk in darkness when they could have the light. I have been greatly attracted by the words of a citizen of Virginia, Mr. J. J. Rives, who has said: "I will not stagger in darkness when it is my privilege to walk in the light of God."

So that the Apostle John could say: "In Him was life; and the life was the light of men." There is a light in the darkness, and the opportunity is there for us of Christian faith to lead men to that light. This is true leadership, but I warn you, it is not popular.

My own observations after a lifetime of experience and association with the highest offices of the world constrain me to say that Christ is the way, the truth, and the life, but men generally do not recognize this. Whatever light we may have is desperately needed.

As we look around we are amazed at how few there are who can take up the responsibilities of leadership. Responsibility and onerous duties are shunned today. I was reading only a few days ago of a prime minister on the other side of the Atlantic who was having the greatest difficulty in finding men with the essential qualities for the responsibilities of administration. It is all too rare a gift in the make-up of man. We are so apt to evade responsibilities and to steer clear of making vital decisions. What we need is some of the impelling, dynamic, evangelistic force of Christianity, which will convert an unholy world to a righteous cause.

All too long have men of evil been allowed to exercise their powers and assume authorities of which they are undeserving—and quite unfitted to take up. They seem to hold millions of people in a servile subjection of one form or another.

Let those of us of Christian faith leave a mark of equal intensity upon this period of our own time. Let future generations observe that in the midst of sorely distressing conditions there sprang up a revival of Christian leadership to a purer and better way of life. That, gentlemen, is the central theme of our mission here today. To give Christian leadership will not be easy; it has never been easy; it has never appeared successful. You may recall that contemporary historians barely mention the name of Christ, our leader, but His power has been felt by millions, and it is available for us today. There is no lack of opportunity. The opportunity is there. Where are the men to take it up?

I would just briefly refer to an incident of the last war, when Mr. Churchill, who personified the great leadership of a great people, could calmly paint a picture of light without shade. What a wonderful example of faith and courage in adversity.

Let us remember the period when the people of Israel lost their leader, Moses. A young man named Joshua rose to the leadership. One of his first statements was: "Be strong and of a good courage; be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed; for the Lord thy God is with thee whithersoever thou goest."

The Wedemeyer Report

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. WILLIAMS
OF DELAWARE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an editorial entitled "A Ghastly Mistake," published in the Journal-Every Evening of Wilmington, Del., on May 2, 1951. It has reference to the delay in publication of the report by Lieutenant General Wedemeyer.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A GHASTLY MISTAKE

There is no longer need for anybody to wonder why President Truman and the State Department fought so hard to prevent the publication of the report which Lt. Gen. Wedemeyer made in 1947 on conditions in Korea. The theory that the document was top secret and should therefore be kept from the people now turns out to have been all bosh. The real reason for the official attitude is to be found in the fact that once again the administration is revealed as having ignored the opinion of experts and as having listened instead to the voices of those who for their own purposes wanted the country to play ball with the Communists.

As the contents of the report are now made public it is shown that General Wedemeyer 4 years ago predicted with uncanny accuracy what was going to happen in Korea. He warned the Government that the Soviet Union was training the Communist North Koreans and that it would send those forces against the South just as soon as the United States could be induced to withdraw its own troops. He also urged this country to create an American-led and American-equipped army of South Koreans that would be strong enough to cope with the potential invaders.

Inasmuch as General Wedemeyer made this report after his return from a special mission under the President's direction it passes all understanding that it was promptly and permanently pigeonholed. The only logical explanation is that the friends of the Soviet were on the march in the State Department at the time and prevailed upon Mr. Truman to forget the whole thing. Those were the days, you know, when Stalin was "good old Joe."

That the administration's refusal to follow the advice it received in 1947 was a ghastly mistake is all too evident. It is a failure that has cost thousands of American lives and embroiled us in a situation out of which there is no foreseeable road.

Northwest Opinions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MIKE MANSFIELD
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting in the RECORD a very interesting letter from Mr. Ed Craney, of the Pacific Northwest Broadcasters, and also the expressed opinions of Members of Congress and the public from the States of Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and Montana. I am sure that the House will find this material of great interest.

The letter follows:

PACIFIC NORTHWEST BROADCASTERS,
Spokane, Wash., April 27, 1951.

The Honorable MIKE MANSFIELD,
United States Representative From Montana, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE MANSFIELD: During February, Mr. Clay Osborne secured from you on our behalf a personal, tape-recorded interview expressing your conclusions about six of the basic international and domestic questions of this year.

Additional interviews exploring the identical questions were secured from 17 other cooperative Senators and Representatives from Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and Montana.

At the same time staff interviewers in our station-cities of Portland, Spokane, Missoula, Butte, Bozeman, Great Falls, and Helena obtained recorded sidewalk interviews from average Americans expressing their opinions about these same questions.

The answers from Washington and from the Pacific Northwest Main Streets were then incorporated in a series of 6-day-per-week quarter-hour public-service programs generally titled "Do You Agree?" This continued throughout 6 weeks, the entire 6 days of each week being devoted to a single one of the six questions asked.

The schedules of release by stations and times were as follows: KXL, Portland (10 kilowatts), beginning March 26, 5:45–6 p. m., Pacific standard time; KXLY, Spokane (5 kilowatts), beginning March 19, 11–11:15 p. m., Pacific standard time; Z Bar Network, Montana (five stations), beginning March 19, 10:45–11 p. m., Mountain standard time.

Additionally, we offered the complete series of the programs to Stations KIDO, Boise; and KRNR, Roseburg, Oreg., for release to the areas of their coverage at their discretion.

The standard opening and closing used for each of the Do You Agree? programs is enclosed for your information.

It was your willing assistance and fine cooperation that was most responsible for the excellence of the programs, and you have the gratitude of the Pacific Northwest Broadcasters for enabling us to provide a service both unique and informative.

And you and your cooperating colleagues have my personal thanks as well.

Sincerely,

ED CRANEY.

DO YOU AGREE?

Standard opening: "Do you agree?"

Do you agree with your elected Representatives in Congress on the vital issues confronting the Nation and the world?

The Pacific Northwest Broadcasters' stations believe that you, the general public, would like to know the answers. To do this, the Pacific Northwest Broadcasters have interviewed people in all walks of life in the cities represented by the "XL" stations: Portland, Oreg.; Spokane, Wash.; and in Montana: Missoula, Helena, Great Falls, Butte, and Bozeman.

In Washington, D. C., the "XL" reporter asked the Representatives and Senators of the four Pacific Northwest States—Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and Montana—the same set of questions as those answered by the public.

The first voice you hear will be that of our reporter speaking to you transcribed from the Nation's Capitol in Washington, D. C.

Standard closing: "Do you agree?"

Do you agree with your Senators and Representatives in Congress on the vital issues and questions of today?

This program is designed to find the answer. To do that, the Pacific Northwest Broadcasters have interviewed people in all walks of life in the cities represented by the "XL" stations, and have also asked identical questions of the Senators and Representatives from the four Pacific Northwest States: Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and Montana.

The question asked on today's program was Heard transcribed from Washington were Senators ——— ——— and Representatives ——— ———.

Listen tomorrow at this same time for the next in the Pacific Northwest Broadcasters' special public service series:

Do you agree?

Walter Winchell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ISIDORE DOLLINGER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. DOLLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I should like to call to the attention of the Members of this House a new book entitled "The Communist Trail in America," by Jacob Spolansky.

In the book, the author points out that the Communists in the United States conducted an organized campaign against newspapermen and commentators and that Mr. Walter Winchell was the only one against whom the Communists carried out a systematic attack for a period of years. The excerpts from the book, which I am inserting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, are a fine tribute to Mr. Winchell and show that the Communists consider him a formidable enemy.

It is gratifying to learn that Walter Winchell's ceaseless efforts in the battle against communism are recognized. During the past months, some of my colleagues and I have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a number of articles written by Mr. Winchell. However, very little has been said about him up to this time. I am pleased to have this opportunity to describe him to you as an eminent writer, columnist, and champion of human rights. Yesterday, he was named as winner of one of the "Michael" awards of the Academy of Radio and Television Arts and Sciences, as "best consistent radio news commentator." Also, we must not overlook his sincere and unselfish endeavors in the interest of the public good. The May 22, 1951, issue of Look, which reached the public stands on May 8, 1951, carried a story about Walter Winchell and his interest in the Damon Runyon Cancer Fund Crusade, and I am also inserting that story in the RECORD.

Because he is so widely read and heard, Walter Winchell's thoughts, words, ideals, and campaigns for the right, are brought to the attention of millions. In these dark days when we face the reality that our enemies would destroy us from without and within our Nation, Walter Winchell stands out as the No. 1 enemy of communism. His fearlessness, his attacks upon those who would undermine our democracy, arouse our admiration. I consider him a great fighter for liberty, freedom, and Americanism.

Walter Winchell, patriot, is performing a splendid service for our Nation, and I am happy publicly to acknowledge that service.

From pages 81–83 of the Communist Trail in America:

In his Sunday night broadcasts, Walter Winchell told of the secret Communist gatherings at which strike strategy was laid out. Because he had excellent sources of information, he was able to startle the Communists by quoting, nearly verbatim, just what was transpiring at these secret sessions. Winchell described the minute doings of the conspirators and even reported the way in which they boasted of their success in particular plants then gripped by strikes.

Writers and commentators who exposed them were given the slander treatment. Literary gentry, friendly to the Communist cause would be enlisted in the all-out effort to blacken and defame him. To squelch Walter Winchell, however, colossal preparations were needed—Winchell was a formidable enemy. Not only had he mercilessly pummeled them through the years, but he was rubbing salt into their wounds by reporting every word and gesture at their clandestine sessions. The time had come for vengeance.

To erase Walter Winchell and his diatribes, a special conference was called in an obscure Chicago meeting room on April 8, 1941.

Extra precautions were taken to insure that absolutely no one except the trusted hierarchy was admitted to that room. Credentials were checked and double-checked to prevent any intruder from slipping in. Yet an undercover operator did manage to sneak in. The Communists, we learned from him, were furious over Walter Winchell's success in pointing his accusing finger at them and were determined to punish him.

The meeting, called at the insistence of Robert Minor, national secretary of the Communist Party, was presided over by Pat Toohey, then State organizer for Illinois. Toohey got to the point immediately. "We've got instructions," he said, "to start a campaign to take Winchell off the air. Nobody needs to be reminded how important that job is." This was the plan: Hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions of letters were to deluge the radio network and Winchell's sponsor, all protesting his attacks upon an innocent political party. Organizations, thousands of them, some real but most of them fictitious, were to join to fight Walter Winchell's persecution.

"Above all," Toohey warned, "the name of the Communist Party must be kept out.

"The protests should seem spontaneous and real."

The scheme elaborately drawn up, was doomed to failure because Winchell exposed it before it got under way. His information about the Communists was accurate to the last detail—powerful ammunition.

Following is the article which appeared in Look magazine:

WALTER WINCHELL FOR THE DAMON RUNYON CANCER FUND CRUSADE—HE'S USING HIS UNIQUE INFLUENCE OVER A VAST AUDIENCE AS OFTEN FOR PUBLIC GOOD AS FOR PUBLIC ENTERTAINMENT

Twenty-seven years ago, a brash young ex-vaudeville actor named Walter Winchell began to write a daily newspaper column in New York. He delved into fascinating but oft-neglected corners of the big city, mined its night clubs, theaters, and Broadway hangouts. He had a flair for colorful language, unique skill at coining catchy phrases, and an unerring eye for the interesting and unusual. His paragraphs, an instant hit in New York, were syndicated across the Nation.

In 1932, Winchell started an uninterruped series of Sunday-night news broadcasts with the same fresh, breathless approach which marked his column. Skillful use of the techniques of reporting and showmanship has won for him an audience now estimated at 25,000,000 readers and 35,000,000 listeners.

Through the years Winchell never has forgotten that his public wants to hear about the basic things of life—call it gossip if you insist. Births and marriages, for example, and divorces and romance brawls, hi-jinks in society, the red feather in a lady's hat, wisecracks in Lindy's. He has given the American language such words and phrases as "communazi," "infanticipating," "everynitem," "Reno-vated," "scrumunist," and "New Yorchids"—and his fascinated readers love it.

While covering his Broadway beat, he has invaded a wider field with notable success. Six months before Munich, he reported that Hitler would get away with his bloodless coup. Fifteen months before the announcement, he predicted F. D. R., long a Winchell hero, would seek a third term as President. He wrote in 1941 that Russia would fight Hitler to a standstill; in 1944 that a second front would come that year; in 1945 (at the San Francisco Conference which set up the U. N.) that a vast and perhaps unabridgable chasm had developed between the United States and Russia. Eighteen months before Washington announced the Russians had an atom bomb, he said they would develop it—and when.

Winchell did not stop at reporting but came up with vigorous policy opinions. He lashed out at the Nazis long before World War II and was scolded in Washington for realistic opinions about the Russians as that war came to a close. Two years ago, he shouted that 70 air groups were necessary for the safety of the Nation, even while administration spokesmen said we needed only 42.

On December 10, 1946, Winchell found a new cause, one which has absorbed much of his interest and boundless enthusiasm. On that day his friend, Damon Runyon, died of cancer. The following Sunday, Walter went on the radio and asked for "a few bucks to help fight cancer." The result was startling. Money began to pour in and Winchell was forced to set up the Damon Runyon Cancer Fund, which has, to date, received $4,700,000 in contributions and disbursed $3,748,170 in grants to hospitals and institutions for cancer research. The Runyon Fund is unique in that not one dollar goes for expenses of any kind. Winchell, the fund treasurer, and columnist Dan Parker and Leonard Lyons, president and vice president, pay all their own expenses. Office space and help are donated.

Walter Winchell says now of the Runyon Fund, "It's the only real thing."

Peace Bid MacArthur Upset Held Foredoomed Anyway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. OSTERTAG
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. OSTERTAG. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article by James Reston, appearing in the New York Times of May 9, 1951, which points up the injustice done to General MacArthur in holding him responsible for the failure of the efforts, undertaken in March by the administration and the United Nations, to negotiate a settlement of the Korean conflict. In fairness to General MacArthur, as the article well points out, it should be said that his offer to negotiate with the enemy directly in the field "did not really lose a very hopeful chance of negotiating peace."

The article follows:

WASHINGTON, May 8.—The testimony of Secretary of Defense Marshall has created one impression that is regarded here by persons familiar with the circumstances as unfair to General of the Army Douglas MacArthur.

This impression, induced in large measure by the headlines in this morning's papers, was that General MacArthur last March had spoiled a good chance to make peace with the Chinese Communists.

The facts of General Marshall's statement were as follows. He testified that President Truman had planned last March to make a public appeal to the Chinese Reds for peace in Korea. He said that the terms of this appeal were being negotiated with the other nations having troops in Korea, and that, on March 20, General MacArthur had been advised of these facts.

General Marshall then recalled that, after General MacArthur received the notification from the Joint Chiefs of Staff of the forthcoming peace appeal by the President, he (MacArthur) had issued a much tougher peace appeal of his own, minimizing the power of Red China and implying that if Peiping did not make peace the United Nations could bring about Red China's military collapse.

ABANDONMENT OF EFFORT CITED

"At the time the foregoing statement [MacArthur's] was issued," General Marshall said yesterday, "the clearance of the proposed Presidential declaration with the other 13 nations having forces in Korea had very nearly been completed. In view of the serious impact of General MacArthur's statement on the negotiations with these nations, it became necessary to abandon the effort, thus losing whatever chance there may have been at that time to negotiate a settlement of the Korean conflict."

This last paragraph was the source of almost all the news leads in this morning's papers. Thus the New York Times headline this morning was: "Marshall says MacArthur upset peace move." The Herald Tribune's: "Marshall says MacArthur upset peace plan." The Washington Post's: "MacArthur's bid to Reds hurt peace chances, Marshall says."

As a matter of fact, however, there was very little confidence in this Government or among the representatives of the other nations who were discussing the President's peace appeal that it would do any good. The negotiations on the peace appeal went on here. They were based on a draft paper presented to the 13 other nations fighting in Korea by Assistant Secretary of State Dean Rusk, and the general attitude among the negotiators was that the peace appeal probably ought to be made but probably wouldn't impress Peiping.

GENERAL CRITICIZED FOR ACTION

General MacArthur's own peace appeal, coming in the middle of the negotiations for the Presidential appeal, was a great embarrassment to the United States Government, no doubt. The negotiators of the other governments concerned did not understand how it could happen that the State Department would enter into protracted negotiations with them on the precise words to be used in the Presidential appeal and then find its own military commander beating the gun with a totally different proclamation without even asking his own Government, let alone the United Nations.

Moreover, there was some feeling within the 14-nation committee here that, in his peace appeal, General MacArthur had scoffed at the Chinese Reds, demanded their unconditional surrender and thus placed the Peiping regime in an unreceptive mood to negotiate.

The point is, however, that, while he embarrassed his Government and angered his allies, General MacArthur did not precisely ruin a good chance to make peace because nobody here really believed there was a good chance to make peace. He "upset a peace move," all right, as the headlines this morning properly said, but it wasn't much of a move, and the negotiators knew it at the time.

There were two reasons why the negotiators were not inclined to believe that the President's appeal would get anywhere: first, the Chinese Communist offensive was pretty well organized by that time, and second, the draft of the President's statement actually offered the Chinese Communists less than the terms that Peiping had rejected in January.

For example, the five principles contained in the January peace appeal of the United Nations, which were supported by the United States, specifically mentioned a willingness on the part of the United Nations and the United States to discuss the question of the future of Formosa and the question of the representation of China in the United Nations.

NOT IN RUSK MEMORANDUM

The Rusk memorandum, which was to be the basis of the President's peace appeal, did not, however, mention these two points. It was a most general statement of war aims, ending with a vague statement that an end of the war in Korea would lessen the tension in the Far East and facilitate discussion of other far eastern questions.

Indeed, in their observations on the Rusk memorandum, some representatives of the 13 nations concerned noted the absence of the references to the future of Formosa and China's representation in the United Nations and observed that the proposed Presidential statement seemed to be something of a retreat from the January peace offer, and therefore less likely to be acceptable to Peiping.

In fairness to General Marshall, he merely said that the MacArthur peace appeal had lost "whatever chance there may have been at that time to negotiate a settlement of the Korean conflict."

But in fairness to General MacArthur, it ought also to be said that, while his appeal of March 24 was generally regarded as perhaps his most flagrant assumption of civilian authority, it did not really lose a very hopeful chance of negotiating peace.

The St. Lawrence Seaway Will Waste Manpower

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, should the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project be authorized 23,600 men will be needed for the construction of the proposed navigation and power works in the International Rapids section of the proposed St. Lawrence waterway project alone.

The figure of 23,600 men does not include the number required for work on the connecting channels of the Great Lakes, the deepening of the harbors, or the Thousand Islands section or the all-Canadian part of the St. Lawrence River.

In addition a much larger number of men would be involved in the transportation of material and equipment for the project.

Converting the 23,600 men into work days we find that to construct the International Rapids section alone it would require 111,355 man-years of work.

To support these estimates the following information was submitted to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations on June 13, 1947, by Lt. Gen. R. A. Wheeler, Chief of Engineers, United States Army:

EMPLOYMENT

It is estimated by the Labor Department that the International Rapids section project would create the following man-hours of employment:

At site:
Skilled	36,207,000
Semiskilled	13,774,000
Unskilled	32,495,000
Total	82,476,000
Off site:
Skilled	46,415,000
Semiskilled	60,717,000
Unskilled	33,093,000
Total	140,235,000

If completed in 4 years the Labor Department estimates the average number of employees at the site as 11,150, carrying from 5,400 a month in the winter season to 23,600 a month in the summer season.

If completed in 6 years the Labor Department estimates the average number of employees at the site as 7,440, varying from 3,000 to 16,900 a month.

It should be noted that these figures apply only to the International Rapids section of the project. They do not touch the big all-Canadian job between the International Rapids and Montreal. They do not touch any of the work in the Great Lakes region.

Presumably, the figures labeled "off site" include the production of construction materials and equipment and their shipment to the site.

If figured at 2,000 working hours per year per man, the above figures are equivalent to the following:

	Man-years
At site	41,238
Off site	70,117
Total	111,355

And this is only a piece of the job, not the whole "seaway."

(NOTE.—From p. 395, record of hearings, Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, Subcommittee on the St. Lawrence Seaway Project, 80th Cong., 1st sess., S. J. Res. 111.)

Artificial Limbs

OF
HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I rise to explain a little to the House the Advisory Committee on Artificial Limbs, which will take charge of the demonstration in the caucus room of the old House Office Building at 10 o'clock, Thursday, May 10. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] and I have spoken of it several times. The group has coordinated the efforts at research work on artificial limbs performed at the laboratories of the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force, and the contractors of the Veterans' Administration. I might add the list of some of the laboratories currently participating in the program, because some of the Members have little laboratories in their districts. Again, I want to remind the House that civilians who need prosthetic appliances will benefit by this research work as well as the veterans—and there are thousands of them in the United States also.

In April 1945 the National Research Council established the Committee on Prosthetic Devices for the purpose of administering a research and development program in the field of artificial limbs.

This committee conducted a very extensive program until June 1947 when it felt that sufficient work had been accomplished to permit the workers to concentrate on certain avenues of approach. At its own recommendation, the Committee on Prosthetic Devices was dissolved and the Advisory Committee on Artificial Limbs was formed to continue the work.

Accordingly, the Advisory Committee on Artificial Limbs was formed and since

July 1, 1947, this group has coordinated the efforts of the research work on artificial limbs performed at the laboratories of the Army, Navy, Air Force, and contractors of the Veterans' Administration.

The laboratories currently participating in the program are located at Army Prosthetics Research Laboratory, Walter Reed General Hospital, Washington, D. C.; Oakland Naval Hospital Limb Shop, Oakland, Calif.; Army Air Forces Aero-Medical Laboratory, Wright Field, Dayton, Ohio; University of California, Berkeley, Calif.; University of California at Los Angeles, Los Angeles, Calif.; New York University, New York City; International Business Machines Corp., New York City; Vickers, Inc., Detroit, Mich.; Prosthetics Testing and Development Laboratory, Veterans' Administration, New York City; Sierra Engineering Co., Sierra Madre, Calif.

Many other firms such as Northrop Aircraft, Inc., and the Goodyear Rubber Co. have contributed much to the program.

The Advisory Committee on Artificial Limbs also acts as a review committee which indicates to the Veterans' Administration when, in its opinion, a new device or technique has been sufficiently developed for distribution to veteran beneficiaries.

In addition, it serves as a consulting body to the VA in reviewing proposed contracts, projects, and budgets, concerning artificial limbs and related subjects.

The one individual who deserves more credit than anyone else for the progress made to date is Gen. F. S. Strong, Jr., who has acted as the Executive Director of the Advisory Committee on Artificial Limbs since July 1947.

General Strong, upon returning from World War II where he served in the Alaskan, European, and China-Burma-India theaters, had intended to take a well-deserved rest, but instead has devoted his energies to directing this program to its present point of success.

Col. Robert L. Allen, Gen. Edward Greenbaum, Judge Robert Patterson, Mr. Tracy Voorhees, Dr. Paul B. Magnuson, Dr. Paul Klopsteg, Dr. Robert R. McMath, Dr. Roy McClure—who passed away several weeks ago—and Dr. Philip Wilson, have all given a great deal of assistance to the program.

World Assembly for the Moral Rearmament of the Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, an unusually significant conference of world proportions is to be held in our country next month. I refer to the World Assembly for the Moral Rearmament of the Nations which will take place at the Grand Hotel, Mackinac Island, Mich., June 1 to 12, 1951.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Information of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, I believe that the Mackinac conference will play an important role in helping us to clarify the global objectives of democracy and in finding effective means for telling democracy's story compellingly and winning the hearts and minds of the peoples of the world.

Under unanimous consent, I include in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD three documents in connection with this Mackinac conference. They are a statement by the chairman and ranking members of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations and the House Committee on Foreign Affairs sent to leaders prominent in public life abroad; a statement of welcome issued by all the members of the Michigan delegation in Congress; and a message from William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, to labor leaders abroad.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 1, 1951.

As members of the Foreign Relations and Foreign Affairs Committees of the United States Senate and House of Representatives, we wish to add our support to the invitation extended you to attend the World Assembly for the Moral Rearmament of the Nations at Mackinac Island, Mich., June 1 to 12, and to the welcome already issued by our Michigan colleagues in Congress.

Your presence in the United States, together with other distinguished leaders from Europe and Asia, can do much to focus the attention of the American people at this time on the positive steps that can be taken everywhere to answer the ideological threat of world communism. We need such a demonstration of united strength in the field of inspired moral leadership, without which our common military, political, and economic efforts to save the free world will certainly be less effective.

We are impressed with the practical evidence of what such active moral leadership has accomplished to establish democracy as a working force in danger areas that affect the future of your country and ours. We recognize the opportunity this assembly offers to proclaim to the world an inspired experience of democracy based on moral standards and the guidance of God which is the greatest bulwark of freedom.

We look forward to welcoming you on the occasion of your visit.

Senator TOM CONNALLY,
Chairman, Senate Foreign Relations Committee.
Senator ALEXANDER WILEY.
Representative JOHN KEE,
Chairman, House Foreign Affairs Committee.
Representative JAMES P. RICHARDS.
Representative CHARLES A. EATON.

WELCOME BY MICHIGAN CONGRESSIONAL DELEGATION

Michigan Members of Congress have joined in welcoming top-ranking political, military, industrial, and labor leaders from five continents to a world assembly for the moral rearmament of the nations to be held at the Grand Hotel at Mackinac Island, Mich., from June 1 to 12. Representatives from Western Europe and the Far East will join with delegates from South Africa, South America, Australia, Canada, and the United States to consider the steps necessary to give democracy the strength to win in both the east and the west at the same time.

"The event looms as one of major significance," said Senator HOMER FERGUSON, of Michigan, and other members of Michigan's congressional delegation in a joint statement issued from the Senator's office in Washington today welcoming the assembly to their State. "Michigan is honored to be linked with a global struggle to reassert the effective strength of moral standards and the worth of every man under God's guidance. Our spiritual strength as well as our material strength must be mobilized to meet the universal threat of godless Communist materialism."

Headed by Representative ROY WOODRUFF, of Bay City; dean of the Michigan delegation in the House, congressional signatories to the statement include: JESSE P. WOLCOTT, Port Huron; GEORGE A. DONDERO, Royal Oak; JOHN D. DINGELL, Detroit; FRED L. CRAWFORD, Saginaw; CHARLES E. POTTER, Cheboygan; CLARE E. HOFFMAN, Allegan; PAUL W. SHAFER, Battle Creek; WILLIAM W. BLACKNEY, Flint; JOHN B. BENNETT, Ontonagon; GERALD R. FORD, JR., Grand Rapids; GEORGE D. O'BRIEN, Detroit; LOUIS C. RABAUT, Grosse Pointe Park; JOHN LESINSKI, JR., Dearborn; THADDEUS M. MACHROWICZ, Hamtramck; GEORGE MEADER, Ann Arbor; RUTH THOMPSON, Whitehall and Muskegon.

Following his appointment to succeed Senator Vandenberg, Senator BLAIR MOODY stated on the Senate floor, "I am delighted to make it unanimous by adding my own warm support to this welcome."

A number of Cabinet Ministers from Europe are expected at the Mackinac assembly. Both Chancelor Konrad Adenauer, of Germany, and Foreign Minister Robert Schuman, of France, have credited moral rearmament with a major contribution to Franco-German unity. The Danish Foreign Minister, Ole Bjorn Kraft, said at a recent meeting in Copenhagen, "This is a world movement with a world answer which will play its part in shaping the future." Consultations with these men and other Cabinet Members in Italy, Belgium, and the Scandinavian countries have pointed to the value of a gathering in America at which evidence can be massed and developed of how MRA is "turning the tide of communism."

Delegations from the Far East, including a delegation of 65 Japanese leaders and others from Nationalist China, Burma, and India are preparing to come. The head of the All-India Posts and Telegraphs is already on his way. Gen. Ho Ying-chin, from Formosa, and Mr. Sisato Ichimada, the governor of the Bank of Japan, have expressed the desire to attend.

The intensive work of moral rearmament following the assembly at the Shoreham Hotel in Washington in January has led to important developments which make this world assembly of special timeliness. British leaders have noted the successful averting of Communist efforts to tie up London and Scottish docks in a general strike last month. The Red strategy was frustrated, according to the Communists themselves, by MRA-trained dock workers from London and Glasgow, who took part in the Washington conference.

French workers from the Red Belt factory area of Paris who were present in Washington, played a similar role in preventing a general strike in Paris at the time of General Eisenhower's visit this winter.

Large-scale national campaigns have been held after conferences with government leaders in France, Germany, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, Italy, Holland, and Belgium in connection with the launching of the book The World Rebuilt, by Peter Howard. This book reporting "the true story of Frank Buchman and the men and women of moral rearmament" has already sold 200,000 copies and a further 150,000 are in printing.

June 4 is Dr. Buchman's seventy-third birthday, and in this year of his nomination for the Nobel prize will be a special focus for world-wide interest in moral rearmament.

In addition to the delegations from overseas, there will be strong American representations, especially from those industries in which, as in National Airlines, MRA has been the means of bringing a new era of understanding and of saving millions of dollars.

The full text of the statement by Senator FERGUSON and the Michigan delegation in the House of Representatives follows:

"We of the Michigan congressional delegation take great pleasure in directing the attention of our fellow citizens to the World Assembly for Moral Rearmament, which is to be held in Michigan, at the Grand Hotel, Mackinac Island, June 1–12, 1951.

"Moral rearmament has been described as 'a world force having as its principal objective adequate preparedness of free nations for the ideological conflicts in which the world is now engaged.'

"That is an objective which challenges the interest and imagination of all of us who believe in the strength and guidance of God. We believe that material forces alone cannot assure permanent peace, security, and tranquillity among nations and among people. We who believe in God see that our spiritual strength, as well as our material strength, must be mobilized to meet the universal threat of godless Communist materialism.

"Every nation of the world is being invited to send representatives to the Mackinac conference. The event looms as one of major significance, and Michigan is honored to be its host, as the name of our State is thereby to be linked in the eyes and minds of leaders in many lands with a global struggle to reassert the effective strength of moral standards and the worth of every man under God's guidance."

LETTER FROM WILLIAM GREEN TO LABOR LEADERS IN EUROPE AND ASIA

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 4, 1951.

The American labor movement warmly supports this welcome and expresses the hope that you and others of our trade-union brothers from Europe, Asia, Africa, Australasia, and the Americas will attend this gathering and so contribute to the new world of liberty and justice we all desire.

The Great Debate

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by the Home Town Reporter in Washington, Walter Shead, WNU correspondent, which was taken from the May 4, 1951, issue of the Thayer News, Thayer, Mo.:

THE HOME TOWN REPORTER IN WASHINGTON

(By Walter Shead)

GREAT DEBATE NOT OVER

It seems that the great debate in Congress over foreign policy is not over; it is just getting started.

But what is hard to understand is this: During more than 3 months of debate, the Republican leadership in Congress opposed sending troops to Europe on the theory that to do so would arouse the Russian bear to the point of war, that it was a calculated risk that should not be taken and that our main line of defense should be the Western Hemisphere.

And almost overnight this same band of leadership has switched from a Western Hemisphere defense to demands for an aggressive war on Red China which would take a million American boys and all the planes and ships and guns we could muster to send across the Pacific.

The rhyme or reason in this thinking is certainly not clear, and the only interpretation which can be placed on such a metamorphosis is politics, pure and simple. The Democratic administration was for sending an army to serve under General Eisenhower in continental Europe to implement the Atlantic Pact, so politically the Republican leadership must oppose, and they did, but lost. The Democratic administration was opposed to making any aggressive war on Red China, seeking to confine the fighting in Korea, so the political thing for Republican leadership to do was to oppose it, so they are opposing, some going even as far as asking for an immediate declaration of war.

What has happened to the proposal of ex-President Hoover, to withdraw behind our two oceans? What General MacArthur thinks about this is not even important insofar as this Congress is concerned, for the simple reason that what he says before a joint session or before any congressional committee will not change a vote one way or another. Minds already are made up beforehand. Does any one believe for a minute that anything General MacArthur might say would change the minds of such Senators as TAFT, WHERRY, JENNER, CAIN, and KEM? Nor do you think they will heed for one instant whatever General Collins, or Admiral Sherman, or General Bradley, or General Marshall will say, or what General Vandenberg or Admiral Nimitz or even General Eisenhower might say on the subject in these committees?

What has happened is unfortunate, particularly for General MacArthur, and it is unfortunate for the country, for it is having the effect of driving deeper and deeper the wedge of disunity into the marrow of the Nation, and it is permitting politicians to make a scapegoat of MacArthur, when the general's return should mean only a tribute to his military feats of valor.

MacArthur deserved honors

General MacArthur, setting foot on United States soil for the first time in 14 years deserved all the adulation and honors heaped upon him by the American people. A lot of it was overdone, but that is the characteristic American way—do it up brown if you do it at all.

But after all the shouting dies down and the emotional hysteria has worn off, remember the man who withstood most, and who exhibited the most personal courage and just plain guts in this whole affair, was the present occupant of the White House, Harry S. Truman, President of the United States.

Truman clears the way

And it was the President who cleared the way for MacArthur's formal congressional appearance, and it was the President who canceled his own public appearances so there would be no counterattraction to MacArthur's day in court in Washington, and permitted Government offices, the schools, the whole town to turn out to greet the general on his return after 14 years abroad in the service of his country.

President Truman is now at his lowest ebb of popularity. If you are interested, however, watch his popularity barometer start climbing. His two most recent talks to the American people were more forceful and contained more plain common American horse sense than any in many months.

Shades of Nuremberg—How Blindly Must Generals Follow the Leader?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, Felix Morley in Barrons for May 7 indicates that our military leaders are concerned about the effect of the Nuremberg trials and the principles enunciated there in the event we are engaged in another full-time all-out war. On several occasions I have taken the floor to condemn the Nuremberg trials and as time marches on, these views are corroborated by events. I commend this article to all Members of this body:

A NICE POINT—HOW BLINDLY MUST GENERALS FOLLOW THE LEADER?

(By Felix Morley)

(The Sphere of Obedience: "With the doctrine of immunity of a head of state usually is coupled another, that orders from an official superior protect one who obeys them. It will be noticed that the combination of these two doctrines means that nobody is responsible. Society as modernly organized cannot tolerate so broad an area of official irresponsibility. There is doubtless a sphere in which the defense of obedience to superior orders should prevail. If a conscripted or enlisted soldier is put on a firing squad, he should not be held responsible for the validity of the sentence he carries out. But the case may be greatly altered where one has discretion because of rank or the latitude of his orders." Statement of Mr. Justice Jackson, approved by President Truman, June 7, 1945.)

Although nobody likes to emphasize the subject, it is apparent that the shadow of the Nuremberg trials overhangs and darkens the momentous inquiry into the Korean war which opened in Washington last Thursday.

The Nuremberg trials, it will be recalled, were prosecuted under the terms of an agreement signed in London on August 8, 1945, by representatives of the United States, France, Great Britain, and Soviet Russia. This charter established an international military tribunal empowered to try enemy officials and officers defined as war criminals. It was on the basis of this and subsequent four-power agreements that many German and Japanese military men were later executed, or given drastic prison sentences.

Article 8 of this London charter established a wholly new principle in international law. It said: "The fact that the defendant acted pursuant to order of his government or of a superior shall not free him from responsibility."

Supreme Court Justice Robert H. Jackson was the chief American architect of this charter. In his first report to President Truman, before affixing his signature in London, Mr. Jackson sharply criticized the obsolete doctrine that orders from an official superior protect one who obeys them. He said that officers of the German general staff could claim no immunity on the grounds of having obeyed governmental orders.

Since then, many jurists have called that conclusion fallacious both in law and logic. Lord Hankey, the distinguished British Privy Councillor, has perhaps been especially critical of the Nuremberg theory that military officers are legally responsible for wrongful acts by their civilian superiors.

Speaking in the House of Lords, on May 5, 1949, Lord Hankey said that Mr. Jackson's argument confronts the individual with an impossible dilemma between duty and conscience.

Lord Hankey added that the precedent established at Nuremberg troubles the (British) fighting services considerably. One has only to talk confidentially with high ranking American officers now in Washington to realize that it is troubling them today, perhaps far more than their British colleagues.

Placed in an impossible dilemma between duty and conscience, General MacArthur chose the path of the latter. It can be effectively argued, as administration spokesmen are asserting, that it was not the general's privilege to reason why. It was his duty to fight the undeclared war in Korea in whatever manner the President of the United States, acting in concert with the United Nations, might decree.

But this same President had earlier endorsed and proclaimed as national policy the theory of Justice Jackson that a military officer should be brought to trial if he obeys civilian orders which can later be characterized as criminal. In his opening statement as chief of counsel for the United States, at the Nuremberg trials, Mr. Jackson said:

"None of these men before you acted in minor parts. Each of them was entrusted with broad discretion and exercised great power. Their responsibility is correspondingly great and may not be shifted to that fictional being, 'the state,' which cannot be produced for trial, cannot testify, and cannot be sentenced."

During the course of the Nuremberg trials, Mr. Jackson went a good deal further than this generality.

In cross-examination of Marshal Goering, former Commander in Chief of the German Air Force, Mr. Jackson obtained the admission that the German people were not consulted when Hitler decided to make war on Soviet Russia. This was to emphasize the criminal irresponsibility of the Nazi leadership, and the consequent culpability of individual German generals in following that leadership.

In his book on The Nuremberg Case, Mr. Jackson quotes and emphasizes the key admission made by Goering under cross-examination: "The German people were not asked. They were notified of the fact and of the reasons for that fact" (war against Russia).

Republican Senators have been digging into this testimony recently, because of a certain analogy with our undeclared war on Korea, in which the American people also were notified of the fact and of the reasons for that fact after and not before hostilities.

There is a growing disposition to summon Justice Jackson to testify at the Senate inquiry, to determine whether his theory of individual responsibility for questioning dubious executive orders would not wholly justify every pronouncement and action by General MacArthur. It may be added that nobody is more anxious to have this point clarified than the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The sentences passed on German and Japanese generals, for blindly obeying orders from their governments, are not being recalled to justify these cruel and ruthless men, nor out of any desire to take a partisan advantage in the present congressional inquiry.

Some of our most important military leaders believe that this issue of the limits to military loyalty underlies the whole rumpus that has followed General MacArthur's dismissal. It is argued that whatever else the investigation may accomplish it must definitely determine whether the traditional loyalty of the military to civilian leadership is still binding. At Nuremberg the Truman administration, through the agency of Justice Jackson, went far to argue the contrary.

There is no question that the Republicans have a very important point here, and not less important because in the planning of the hearings it has so far been held in reserve. But where there seems to be a disposition to overplay the cards is in the Republican anxiety to have these hearings public.

The demand that the testimony be on the record is understandable, in view of the great public interest, the pervading anxiety as to our foreign policy, and the vital importance of the investigation. But this last factor also provides the conclusive argument for the approved procedure of taking the testimony in executive session, then releasing everything not held back by a competent security check.

For the security of the Nation is literally at stake, not only in respect to confidential military information, but even more as to such vital questions as the responsibility of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to the President, of the President and Secretary of State to the Congress, and of individual generals and their subordinates to the Chiefs of Staff. These are not issues that can properly or profitably be discussed in open forum, under the strain of television and partial quotation.

Except for the secrecy of its deliberations the Constitutional Convention of 1787 would certainly have broken down. Today, it is a question of saving the Constitution then so carefully and skillfully designed. The complete frankness incompatible with klieglight publicity is no less necessary now.

United States Policy in the Korean War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Korean Policy Doesn't Add Up to Appeasement," which appeared in the Minneapolis Tribune of Sunday, May 6, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KOREAN POLICY DOESN'T ADD UP TO APPEASEMENT

To persuade Congress and the American people to adopt his far eastern policies Gen. Douglas MacArthur is seeking to create the impression that the United States and the United Nations have no policies.

MacArthur further endeavors to create prejudice against present United States and U. N. policies by characterizing them as "appeasement"—a word which has evil connotations when correctly used. The deposed far eastern commander tells the bereaved and those who fear their loved ones may become casualties that lives are being squandered by present attempts to limit and end hostilities. He implies that if he has his way lives will be saved and victory will be assured.

MacArthur utters his criticisms and offers his solutions with such an air of absolute authority that many are disposed to accept them as gospel truths.

Whatever a man of MacArthur's brilliance and long experience says is worth considering carefully. He is, however, a human being and all humans, MacArthur and the Tribune's editors not excepted, are subject to error. His views and ours need to be checked against other views just like everyone else's.

The risks are too great to warrant taking chances by hasty adoption of any policies, however categorically and persuasively propounded.

Now United States and U. N. policies may be less wise than they should be. But they are carefully considered policies even though MacArthur says he does not know what they are and that they do not exist.

The United States and the U. N. do not accept the proposition that all-out war with Russia is inevitable or that if such a war comes it would necessarily result in a quick and total victory for the United States and its allies.

MacArthur may be of a different opinion but he cannot rightly argue that this does not constitute a basis for a policy.

The United States and the U. N. believe that more lives would have to be expended and free institutions will be more jeopardized by deliberately enlarging hostilities in the Far East than by trying to bring existing hostilities to an early honorable conclusion. We know that limited hostilities are costly. MacArthur contends that his "positive plan" would be less costly but he cannot prove that contention. Others equally well situated to make such calculations believe the contrary.

It is an abuse of the word "appeasement" to apply it to an unwillingness to bomb troop concentration points in Manchuria so long as the Communists do not use their air or submarine power against U. N. forces in Korea. Who can say how many lives have been saved by such limitation of hostilities? Who can say how many would be expended by our deliberate enlargement of hostilities? Who can say whether prospects for a negotiated peace are enhanced or diminished by such a policy?

Is it "appeasement" if we do not immediately set up a blockade of Chinese ports? Is it "appeasement" if we do not facilitate an invasion of continental China from Formosa which many experts at least as well acquainted with China as MacArthur believe could not succeed without large-scale American participation?

The real test, as the New York Times points out, is the effectiveness of given measures. "Will they, if taken, actually shorten the war in Korea? Or will they broaden and prolong the war by bringing Russia openly into the fighting? Will they alienate us from our allies in other parts of the world? And, if so, will they cost us more than they will profit us? These questions involve deep political and military judgments. It is not 'appeasement' to choose the area in which we wish, if necessary, to employ our maximum military effort."

Under questioning by Senators last week MacArthur indicated that he had not taken very much account of the global aspects of the problem of surviving in freedom in advancing his proposals for victory in the Far East. The President, the State and the Defense Departments have given careful consideration to global aspects in deciding what should and should not be attempted in Korea so long as the enemy does not enlarge the hostilities.

Before abandoning those carefully formulated policies for MacArthur's policies the Nation should at least weigh carefully what others think it stands to lose as well as what MacArthur thinks it stands to gain.

And, as is pointed out elsewhere on this page, we had better be prepared to go it alone if we abandon the collective approach to security and elect to seek security by MacArthur's methods.

An Awakening America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STYLES BRIDGES
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter which I received on April 27 from Mr. Lloyd Osborn Coulter, of Fitzwilliam Depot, N. H. It is an unusually penetrating analysis of the situation which confronts America. He has given me permission to make his views available to my colleagues.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FITZWILLIAM DEPOT, N. H., April 25, 1951.
Senator STYLES BRIDGES,
United States Senate,
Committee on Armed Services,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: There comes a time in the life of every citizen when he is impelled to write pro bono publico to his Senator. In my case it is a sort of emotional prophylaxis which may well prevent apoplexy or assault with intent to inflict bodily harm on the nearest Democrat.

Since opinions are likely to be mere intellectual accidents if reached outside of experience, I will explain my right to mine in a sentence or two at the end of this letter. But first, the proposition I wish to put to you.

The American people have one right which transcends all others—to achieve their own destiny. The great debate is really whether that right should be thwarted, perverted, and abandoned.

The stiff breeze stirred up by the Kefauver hearings and the hurricane sowed by the MacArthur firing are clearly and simply protests by an awakened electorate against the cynical, wasteful, and morally atrophied domestic administration, on the one hand, and its stubborn "Wrong Way Corrigan" foreign flight, on the other.

Since we have survived, and will survive, worse corruption than the posthumous Pendergast rash of deep-freezes, mink coats, RFC loans, and municipal party roots fertilized by the Mafia, we can leave this domestic problem to be dealt with by the evolution of public conscience. Our foreign orientation is the graver problem; immediate and critical.

The governments of Europe—and I am not speaking of the refugees from its political, economic, and social system who pioneered and developed this country—have looked upon this country as a milch cow from 1492 to 1951. The earliest came for gold and silver and the later for colonial trade. All ruthlessly exploited the natives, Indians or colonists, and quarreled with each other over the spoils until the founding fathers, led by Washington, Bolivar, and the resolute rest threw them out.

Until the discovery of America, Europe faced east whence a trickle of wealth seeped into the coffers of its feudal bandit-rulers and a small class of city bankers and merchants, without touching the calloused palms of the peasants. England was a negligible island of six or eight million sheepherders whose royal treasurer sat on a sack of wool. After Columbus, when the galleons, heavy with American plunder, rolled to Iberia, Drake and his successors changed all that. From that time forward American wealth, directly or indirectly, voluntarily or reluctantly, underwrote the development of European nationalism, mercantilism, and imperialism and financed all of its major wars from that of the Spanish Succession to World War II.

Our founders recognized the venality and chronic quarrelsomeness of Europe and counseled against all entangling alliances with it. Monroe and others, down to Wilson, held the course. The American people, trustees of a great new concept of freedom and justice and humanity, faced westward and carried the banner of western civilization to the Pacific and beyond assimilating Louisiana, California, Alaska, Hawaii, and the Philippines by purchase or easy conquest from their European masters in the process. Nowhere have we been guilty of predatory colonialism. After removing the senile clutch of Spain from Cuba and the Philippines we contributed heavily to their sanitation, education, and economy and voluntarily withdrew. After the Boxer Rebellion we alone, of the nations involved, exacted no extraterritorial grants or concessions. We canceled most of the reparations debt after World War I, and plowed back into Germany and Austria in the way of public and private loans more than the undefaulted tithe we collected. Through the Red Cross and the Hoover Commission we fed and clothed them and, unlike our allies, divided no territorial spoils.

After the last war in which victory was purchased with American blood and American resources, we undertook to rehabilitate our late enemies and support our late allies through a thousand private and public methods ranging from United Polish Relief to CARE and the European recovery program. All this while we were being hypnotized into underwriting a new imperialism and a new war in the making at Yalta, Tehran, and Potsdam.

Never in history have any people contributed so much of their substance to avert famine, disease, and disaster everywhere in the world as the Americans. Never has a people dealt so fairly with their neighbors or so generously and constructively with their foes. Yet we have won no solid friendship, no deep respect in Europe. That is, of course, except as a source of profit to her traders and a prop to her wobbly governments, always threatened with some new conqueror. Nine out of ten Europeans, including the British, secretly resent and despise us as a nation, though they may like some of us well enough as individuals. They suspect our motives and impugn our methods except where these parallel their own immediate and selfish interests. They will even use our tax dollars and the products of our industry to trade with, and appease, the common foe, as the British are doing with the Chinese Communists in Hong Kong and Singapore and with steel shipments to Russia, while they demand that our first line of defense shall be their bankrupt homelands, not the area where we are already engaged in a life-and-death shooting war with communism.

You would think that after Churchill (as his memoirs all but brag) and Stalin had conned us into practically turning our back on the Pacific enemy who had attacked us in 1941 and, for the next 2 years throwing most of our weight against the European enemy who had attacked them, we would be more than a little critical of their blandishments. But Truman and Acheson seem to be even more easily hypnotized than Roosevelt and Hull.

One man—MacArthur—has had the courage to try and restore the American people to their destiny; to turn their backs on Europe and to continue to march toward the Orient where now the crucial battle against the Communist despotism is being waged and where a great and new civilization is stirring and with our help and friendship will arise. Lattimore, Hiss, the Amerasia cabal, the eastern bankers, and the Groton tradition abetted by the lobbying of Washington's European embassies have hog-tied Acheson and the big-city foreign language vote has subverted Truman and a lot of the northern Democrats. But there are encouraging signs that the American people may, through the great debate, once more become the arbiters of their own destiny rather than go broke trying to revive Europe's.

I hope and believe that you will support our Government's return to sanity with all means at your disposal. You could render our country no greater service.

Yours sincerely,

L. O. COULTER.

P. S.—Oh yes; about my bona fides: I fought with the French, British, and Americans in World War I, spent 13 years in France, Germany, north Africa, and England between 1921 and 1935. Though not a Son of the American Revolution my grandpappy was one of Sherman's Bummers.

Twentieth Annual Americanization Day Celebration in Jersey City

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD J. HART
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, 20 years ago Capt. Clinton E. Fisk Post, No. 132, VFW, initiated Americanization Day in Jersey City, N. J. Ever since 1931 it has continued to sponsor and support the Americanization Day celebration in that city. From small beginnings, the celebration has grown to be one of the largest and most inspiring of its kind in the United States.

On Sunday, April 29, under sunny skies, 30,000 people, most of them veterans of wars of the United States, members of various veterans' organizations and their ladies' auxiliaries, marched before tens of thousands of others who gathered along the route for the purpose of witnessing the stirring parade.

The reviewing stand was, as usual, located in Pershing Field, where the parade terminated.

Prior to the arrival of the marchers at Pershing Field, a speaking program was carried on and concluded. The speakers, who addressed the thousands assembled before the stand in Pershing Field, included Hon. John V. Kenny, mayor of Jersey City; Hon. William Flanagan, deputy mayor of Jersey City;

Hon. Alexander F. Ormsby, former common pleas judge and past national commandant Marine Corps League; Commander Raymond Clyons, Hudson County American Legion, Department of New Jersey; Rev. Phillip E. Dobson, S. J., director, St. Peter's College of Industrial Relations; "Smokey" Graves, supreme commander, Military Order of Cooties; Mrs. Florence Stark, past national president of VFW Auxiliary; Mrs. Carrie Brady, president, VFW Auxiliary, Department of New Jersey, and myself. The principal speech of the day was delivered by the honored guest, Charles C. Ralls, national commander in chief of VFW of the United States.

Guests included Admiral Leland P. Lovett, USN, retired; Maj. Gen. I. V. White, chief of staff of First Army; Capt. T. S. Dunston Conde, USNR; and Hon. Alfred D. Sieminski, Representative of the Thirteenth District of New Jersey.

The general chairman of the great celebration who has served in the same capacity for many years was Mr. George A. Thornton, Sr., of the Clinton E. Fisk Post. The grand marshal was Commander August Hanniball, Jr., Department of New Jersey, VFW of the United States. Among the aides of the grand marshal were Capt. Francis X. Burke; Lt. Stephen R. Gregg; Sgt. John W. Meagher and Sgt. Nicholas Oresko, all wearers of the Congressional Medal of Honor. The parade chairman was Donald D. Kemp, Sr.; Angelo "Pat" Menendez, past commander of Fisk Post and public relations director for the parade, was master of ceremonies at the reviewing stand announcing the arrival of and identifying each unit of the parade as it passed the stand.

The audience was held in rapt attention during the splendid address of Commander in Chief Charles C. Ralls, which is appended herewith:

ADDRESS BY COMMANDER IN CHIEF CHARLES C. RALLS, JERSEY CITY, N. J., SUNDAY, APRIL 29, 1951

This afternoon is the VFW's finest hour. The mammoth parade today, under the sponsorship of Captain Clinton E. Fisk Post, No. 132, of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, is the culmination of a patriotic ideal—the perfect expression of true loyalty to our Nation and our flag. It is the twentieth annual Americanization Day celebration in Jersey City.

The members of Captain Clinton E. Fisk Post and all VFW members in this outstanding city can be justly proud of their patriotic contribution to this historic observance. As commander in chief of the VFW, I can assure them that their comrades throughout the country recognize and appreciate the importance of Americanization Day. As a privileged spectator at this year's observance in Jersey City, I can testify to the esteem and admiration which they have earned for the Veterans of Foreign Wars among their fellow citizens.

The Americanism program established 20 years ago by the VFW in Jersey City as a simple, practical demonstration of loyalty to the ideals which are the foundation and strength of our country has developed into a national loyalty-day celebration. Proof of the inspiring character of this program—if such be needed—is recorded for history in the appearance yesterday of General of the Army Douglas MacArthur on the reviewing stand for the loyalty parade in New York City. This was a tremendous tribute to the farsighted, unselfish determination of VFW members in Jersey City during the past 20 years to acclaim publicly their proud heritage as Americans.

It is encouraging and gratifying that this demonstration of sincere devotion to our Nation and the freedoms it offers which began as a local ceremony here has now been accepted by all of our citizens. At the same time, the need for such a public rededication of faith in our Nation, our form of government, and our fellow citizens has never been greater.

In this period of national crisis, loyalty should above all else mean unity. The Veterans of Foreign Wars established Loyalty Day as a visible means of opposing Communist May Day demonstrations. We wanted to show that a free people are just as willing to stand up and be counted as the subversive force of communism and its fellow traveler elements. We wanted to prove that Americanism and loyalty to our Nation and our flag are more than an ideal. They are a living reality that gives strength to our Nation and courage to our people.

This year, however, moral strength and physical courage to meet and repulse the naked assault of Communist military aggression are not enough. For the war in Korea has produced a byproduct of dissension that threatens the security of our Nation. The singleness of purpose and determination that characterized our national defense program after the outbreak of hostilities in Korea has been shattered by the dismissal of General MacArthur. America has been split into two foreign-policy camps. The division of our people is one of the most serious in the history of our country because it transcends the normal, necessary two-party political system. It has solidified the seemingly all-out convictions of patriotic Americans who sincerely believe that their conflicting courses of action are each best designed to protect the security of our Nation.

Loyalty does not mean the blind, unquestioned acceptance of a political philosophy. It does demand that we stop acting as martinets controlled by irrational, unintelligent emotionalism. Loyalty this year must imply hard-headed intelligence and patience.

Americans pride themselves on being the world's foremost realists in the field of business. We're giants of industry and infants in international relations. Whether we like it or not, the United States is the leader of the freedom-loving people and democratic nations of the world. We must point the way toward freedom, prosperity, and peace. But we can't do the job alone.

I don't think there is any question of the loyalty of Americans in our life and death struggle against the godless forces of barbaric communism. All of us recognize the threat to our own democratic way of life which this tyrannical force poses. All of us are determined to defend our freedoms against aggression. But the fight can be lost while we battle among ourselves as to the best means of guaranteeing the security of our Nation.

The Veterans of Foreign Wars does not expect that the serious military and international policy differences represented by President Truman and General MacArthur will be immediately reconciled. We do not ask that the basic conflicts be forgotten. But we do demand that the American people, through their elected representatives in Congress, stop viewing these differences in terms of political expediency, and evaluate the conflicting policies with only one common thought in mind; the security of our beloved country.

At this very moment your comrades and mine are fighting and dying in Korea in an heroic defense against the most savage Communist onslaught of the entire war. Their actions will be recorded in history as the most inspiring expression of loyalty, the most perfect example of Americanism. To them, however, this afternoon's parade and other loyalty demonstrations throughout the country this week end will seem a hollow mockery unless they can help bring from division and chaos the unity and direction which our Nation so desperately needs.

For 20 years the members of Capt. Clinton E. Fisk Post and other Veterans of Foreign Wars posts in Jersey City have led the way in proving to their fellow citizens and to the rest of the world that Americanism is an unselfish, intensely practical way of life. They have demonstrated by actions that regardless of race, color, creed, or political beliefs Americans are united in their love of our country, loyalty to our Government, and gratitude for the blessings of freedom we all enjoy.

It is appropriate, therefore, that the 1,200,000 members of the Veterans of Foreign Wars look to their comrades in Jersey City for inspiration and guidance in this hour of national crisis. We have always been strengthened and inspired by the resurgence of patriotism that follows your Americanization Day celebration. Today we seek from this observance a rebirth of faith in the inherent intelligence, courage, and determination of our people—a return of confidence in the willingness of our elected Government leaders to put aside personal, political differences, and to work for the common objective of adequate national security.

This essential objective cannot be achieved within the Federal Government if the American people continue to isolate themselves in a vacuum of personal opinion and refuse to study and understand sincere conflicting views of their fellow citizens. A bipartisan foreign policy is the byproduct of legislative give and take. But it is directly dependent on the unselfish, objective actions and expressions of each American. A truly effective national defense program is predicated on the willingness of our citizens to suffer the inconveniences and sacrifices which will be demanded for the welfare of all our people.

Loyalty to your Nation is like loyalty to your closest friend. It does not shrink or falter in adversity. It is unyielding and unquestioning. This analogy is entirely proper today, I think, in view of the fair-weather attitude of many Americans concerning our military, economic, and political international operations.

Last June congressional leaders, veteran and civic organization officials—indeed, virtually all responsible individuals in America—hailed the action of President Truman in sending United States forces to the defense of Korea. Today many of these same forgetful individuals are charging that the President had no constitutional authority to effect this action and are even urging that American forces pull out of Korea. Confusion and conflict, if permitted to continue, may also jeopardize the North Atlantic Pact, our economic-assistance program, and other aspects of our total military, political, and economic fight against Communist aggression.

I am not for a minute arguing that any or all of these programs are infallible, that they constitute an absolute guaranty of the security of our Nation, or the preservation of peace. However, I would point out that the North Atlantic Pact, the military assistance program, and ECA were approved by a majority of our elected representatives, that they constitute the official policy of our Government, that they need and deserve our loyal support.

The Veterans of Foreign Wars is humbly proud of the opportunity it has had to sponsor such inspiring loyalty programs as the twentieth annual Americanization Day celebration here in Jersey City. We are sincerely grateful to the thousands of patriotic Americans who unselfishly participated in this program. This example of complete, unhesitating cooperation for a common ideal can be prophetic. It proves that Americans are united in their love of our country.

I pray that this bond of unity can be forged throughout the length and breadth of our land as a lifeline to which each of us can turn when the emotional, political storm of confusion and conflict, of indecision and hostility threatens to engulf us.

Americanization Day 1951 can be a turning point in our Nation's history. At the very least it can remind us that we are first and always Americans—and incidentally Democrats or Republicans, internationalists, or isolationists. If the Veterans of Foreign Wars can accomplish this essential objective, then our highest purpose will have been achieved. For we desire only to instill in the hearts of all Americans a deep, abiding devotion to their Nation, respect for their Government, and faith in their fellow man.

We are confident that if these ideals prevail, the future of America as a free Nation under God will be secure.

What's An Appeaser?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. KELLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Boston Post of May 5, 1951:

WHAT'S AN APPEASER?

Heard all too frequently in these troubled times is the epithet "appeaser" hurled bitterly in the heat of the great debate, and in its very bitterness giving a new and scornful meaning to the word.

The scornful meaning stems from the pathetic efforts made by British and French statesmen to gain time in which to rearm their countries to meet the belligerent threats of a dictatorship. The word was then twisted to mean indulgence in abject conciliation which proved ineffective and only served to sacrifice and betray the interests of other and weaker nations.

It may be found profitable if unpleasant for every good and patriotic American, regardless of their convictions or snap judgments, to practice complete self-appraisal and make an honest confession of principles and viewpoints. Most important is the primary concern of approaching the MacArthur controversy with an open mind.

These are the questions: Are the American people prepared to carry through the extraordinary sacrifices in men and money they know we must make if we become involved now in an all-out war? If they are so prepared to jump into an all-out war in Asia do they feel that their efforts should be redoubled if the Soviet attack is launched against Europe as well as Asia?

Do they believe that the United States should "go it alone" in Asia if the other members of United Nations decline to share in a tougher American policy? Do they believe that Red China is acting on its own initiative or that the Soviet Union is directing the campaign in the Far East?

Alternatively, do they believe that aerial reconnaissance of Manchuria and China, economic blockade of Red China, assistance to enable Chiang Kai-shek to invade the Chinese mainland, and an ultimatum to the Chinese Reds will not involve us in an all-out war in Asia, or that, if these measures do bring on an all-out war we can still emerge victorious?

On the other hand, do they believe that while the ebb and flow of battle near the thirty-eighth parallel gains time for the nation to rearm and for Europe to rearm, that national policy should be bent to delay involvement in a total war effort?

Remember that all these considerations have been propounded and positive opinions given by men who are taking unyielding stands on both sides of the controversy. Remember that the individual citizen will be committed to either moral bankruptcy or to a supreme war effort on a scale undreamed of if the wrong answers are given. Remember that all the men of high rank involved in this controversy are patriotic Americans whose convictions have the motivation of doing what they believe best for our country, and that if extreme peril faced the Nation they would discard their private ambitions to serve their country as best they can.

And now—finally—the definition of appeaser will take on yet another meaning, that of one too cowardly to undertake to do the right thing for this Nation because it involves sacrifices of one kind or another. It is the individual citizen who must decide what is an appeaser.

A Letter From Your Congressman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM J. GREEN, JR.
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following newspaper column written by me:

[From the Ford Gazette and Frankford Dispatch of May 4, 1951]

A LETTER FROM YOUR CONGRESSMAN, WILLIAM J. GREEN, JR.

No mere Congressman, serving by your say-so and returnable at your will every 2 years, can assume a superior air even if he could. But all the MacArthur to-do shows a large segment of your America and mine on an emotional binge that had better burn out or else. Or else we can scrap the military judgments of men like Generals Marshall, Bradley, and Eisenhower, whose decisions really did far more to achieve victory in World War II than did those of the military figure who has recently been taking the bows. Meantime we hear there will be a searching through into Yalta and past. Again FDR is being disinterred. In the mad thirst for power, it is forgotten that Mussolini and Hitler ever strode the peacock path of history's stage.

It does not matter that MacArthur alone of the top brass has always had an eye on political possibilities. At this crossroads of civilization it is not of great concern which political party and certainly not which candidate wins what election. In this field day of politics we can jolly well debate ourselves out of existence. MacArthur is not worth that. Let us parade him and forget him as the man who made the problems of good people like Generals Marshall, Eisenhower, and Bradley infinitely more difficult as he concluded his military career. If you do not believe there is a lot of screwball thinking in this emotional binge, get a load of the opinions of some people that the speech MacArthur made before Congress was "epoch making, finest in our time," etc. No political figure could get away with the blatant baloney which concluded his speech. It was about his West Point days and the then current barrack-room ballad, An Old Soldier Never Dies; He Just Fades Away—"so I will just fade away," said the general, as though he were the soul of humility. He just fades away to the accompaniment of the joint meeting of Congress and endless luncheons in his honor, together with parades and miles of ticker tape. This gave the emotional drunk just the comedy relief it required for many of us.

Now, let us get a lot of first things first, including the American tradition that we do not want any general pushing around our civil authorities. Meantime we must face the fact that the war potential of Europe and its steel plants are more important than Asia; also, that the aging general has been cooped up on an island to a degree where he did not even get around Japan and left headquarters only for a few visits to the Korean sector. Whatever his worth in World War I, we have a brand-new military crisis coming up and a lot of responsible people do not believe the MacArthur policy should direct our operations in it. Now, let us rid ourselves of this hang-over and get back to work. Until we face the problem of our survival realistically, we are not entitled to the foolishness which recently took place.

Cordially, your Congressman,

WILLIAM J. GREEN, JR.

MacArthur's Opinions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. KELLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Boston Post of May 7, 1951:

MACARTHUR'S OPINIONS

Although the evidence is incomplete in the case presented by General of the Armies Douglas MacArthur, his main theme is developed and is subject to valid criticism. The thoughtful citizen is left with a distinct sense of unease and a feeling that the distinguished general has not produced the facts to back up what he believes to be best in our present situation and strength for the Nation.

His seven main contentions, although affirmed with sincerity and obvious ability, are in conflict and assailable as opinions or theories not supported by solid and irrefutable facts. He has repeatedly said that he was a theater commander, concerned with direction of operations in this theater and not well enough informed on global and international affairs to give an opinion.

He finds the stalemate in Korea intolerable and advocates steps to hurl the Red Chinese forces out of Korea, but he argues that such steps would not impel the Soviet Union to take an active part in the struggle and precipitate world war III. In his view the enemy is not the Soviet Union, but communism all over the world.

Even over our allies' objections the United States should go ahead with his proposed plan for dealing with Red China, the general says, and, in his own defense says that the Joint Chiefs of Staff considered an identical plan early this year. Finally, he says he has the right to go over the heads of his superiors and take his case directly to the American people.

To these conclusions and opinions he has every right—but the troubled citizenry, looking for absolute and convincing facts do not find in his brilliant arguments, his masterful duelling with words in the Senate hearings or his conclusions, the conviction they must have if the MacArthur views are to prevail.

While disavowing expertness in global strategy he has undertaken to give global advice. He has offered no convincing proof that the Soviet Union would not attack and launch us into world war III. Indeed, his opinion does not seem to justify even the taking of even a calculated risk. Many wonder, as well, at his statement that the Soviet Union is not the enemy, but that world communism is the foe. The two seem to be synonymous to the average citizen.

Going it alone and ignoring the views of our allies may very well achieve what the Soviet Union has been striving for all along—splitting the United States away from its Western European allies. Obviously the Joint Chiefs of Staff, weighing all the possibilities on a global scale, have considered a variety of plans in the past, but it is also obvious that the kind of improvised military planning which our unpreparedness has made necessary cannot be welded to any particular plan until we are strong enough to plan for victory.

As to going over the heads of his superiors even the doughty general has admitted that President Truman had the right to relieve him of his duties. Moreover, he is too much the professional soldier to come our flatly in opposition to the chains of command without which there can be no discipline. General MacArthur seems to have accepted in his own mind that in taking his case to the people he had destroyed his usefulness to the Nation as a military commander, and now undertakes to persuade the Nation out of patriotism that we are embarked on the wrong course.

The tragic consequences of this rift in public opinion and solidarity of effort is yet to be reckoned.

Lying Again

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the following came to my desk just as I was coming over to the House. Drew Pearson seems to be running true to form, still venting his spite.

The release follows:

[Special bulletin, southern California Republican women, Los Angeles, Calif.]

LET'S KEEP THE RECORD STRAIGHT

"Herbert Hoover supports Earl Warren," says Drew Pearson, but what does Herbert Hoover say to southern California Republican women?

Drew Pearson, long noted for his peculiar interest in California politics and political figures, particularly in Republicans, has done it again.

In his column, published locally on April 30, Drew Pearson first devotes a couple of paragraphs to describing his version of Republican leaders playing hide-and-seek with Gen. Douglas MacArthur through the corridors and telephone booths of the Waldorf-Astoria. But, according to Pearson, the only Republican who "caught up" with the general was Herbert Hoover.

And, says Pearson, this is what Herbert Hoover seriously whispered into the ear of MacArthur: "Are you interested in politics, General?" And MacArthur, says Pearson, told our ex-President: "No."

Now, quoting directly from the Pearson column:

"Hoover then gave MacArthur his own ideas about the Republican candidate for the Presidency in 1952 and went all out for Gov. Earl Warren, of California. Hoover unhesitatingly described Warren as the best qualified man on the entire GOP horizon. Not given much to enthusiasm, Hoover almost waxed enthusiastic about Governor Warren."

Pearson then adds a postscript to this astonishing new twist to the old "smoke-filled hotel room" type of Presidential nomination by pointing out the fact that the California Governor will be remembered by the voters as having "run" on the Dewey ticket back in 1948, and "that he (Earl Warren) has been almost as popular with the Democrats as with the Republicans in California."

Then came the parting-and-typical "Pearson" touch. He said: "and unlike TAFT, he (meaning Earl Warren) would probably get some labor backing in a national election." Well.

We southern California Republican women don't believe all we read, or in these days, even see or hear, and especially not Drew Pearson's reporting, so we did the logical thing and sent a wire to the office of Herbert Hoover. The reply speaks for itself.

"MAY 2, 1951.

"SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA REPUBLICAN WOMEN:

"I have your inquiry as to some statement of Drew Pearson that Mr. Hoover is supporting a particular man for President. Mr. Hoover has taken no part in such politics for some years and obviously any statement of this kind is untrue. Mr. Hoover does not believe this source should be credited by anybody.

"BERNICE MILLER,
"Secretary to Mr. Hoover."

Here you see a dramatic and very personal example of the vicious tactics of a certain school of reporters and radio commentators who thus diabolically contrive to confuse and mislead the unaware and uninformed Republicans among us by sly innuendoes, half truths, and implied guilt by association.

Here you see in vivid action this technique which has been, is, and will continue to be used in attacks upon the honorable men—the real American statesmen of our Nation. The one who has been with us, patient, wise, giving his beloved Nation and his party well-considered advice when called upon to counsel or to serve, and the one who also has been with us, fighting in the United States Senate—sometimes almost alone—for the preservation of each and every truly American and Republican Party principle and ideal, and the other who has just come back home to us after years spent in honorable and gallant service in the military force of America and in the administrative office which he handled and conducted so well that he left a once-enemy nation in tears at his departure.

General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM J. GREEN, JR.
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Mayfair Times of April 26, 1951:

[From the Mayfair Times of April 26, 1951]

A LETTER FROM YOUR CONGRESSMAN, WILLIAM J. GREEN, JR.

Most of the professional soldiers I know do not vote and neither do their families, if they live with the officer. In this way they hold to the tradition that we do not want a political Army or Navy. With the former co-Emperor of Japan it is different. Douglas MacArthur has always cherished the idea of being president. That's what makes his return to this country exceedingly amusing when we watch the behavior of those coy potential candidates among the Republicans. Stassen, the great educator, has been ever voluble on all possible occasions and concerning everything. But he maintains a silence about MacArthur on television and just smiles a rather sickly smile through his well-known teeth. Dewey suddenly needs a rest in Bermuda and TAFT, whose getaway is not so easily accomplished, is a match for the FBI in his elusiveness. Only JOE MARTIN, who has no Presidential ambitions, is left to stage-manage the appearance.

Somewhere along the line I hope to ask questions in the Armed Services Committee of the House, of which I am a member. Among these queries would be the following: Why was it so easy to follow a directive to gas-bomb veterans, their wives and children at Anacostia Flats upon order of President Herbert Hoover or Secretary of War Patrick Hurley, and yet so difficult to follow Pentagon orders? What would you have done to a subordinate when you were Chief of Staff if he violated or ignored the spirit of one of your orders?

When you were flown out of the Philippines and you said "I will be back." Your walking through the surf at Leyte was front page in every newspaper in the world. Is it not true that you had practically nothing to do about paving the way for your return? I would like you to say it because a lot of Americans do not properly realize Admirals Nimitz and Halsey, the Marine Corps in its capturing of key islands, and Hap Arnold's Air Force accomplished the job for which you took the bows. Admit it openly so that brave and competent leaders, living and dead, can at long last receive a credit they deserved and which you do not. Is it not also true that the only reason you received the Japanese surrender was that you were senior officer in the theater? Are you aware that here, too, some quick thinkers among Americans might get the notion that you brought about that surrender aboard the mighty Mo, whereas, you contributed practically nothing to it?

What means did you take to keep informed on a possible Korean situation before it broke and do you think that you handled it well? What caused you to issue the boys "home by Christmas" statement, and do you realize it has been the most seriously damaging event to the morale of the free world? Do you realize that if the military situation had not been corrected by General Ridgway that history could well have recorded you as one of the colossal military false alarms of all times? As former superintendent of the Military Academy at West Point, you were once a specialist in training young men. Why were those poor kids in Japan left so untrained that they threw down their arms and ran? Was there n.t as much room for training in Japan as in the Academy on the Hudson? Finally, what makes you think you were as qualified to judge the relative importance of the European and Asiatic theaters to American defense and that of the free world as the White House and the Pentagon which are constantly getting up-to-the-minute news reports and spot news?

These are asked as I doff my hat to a great division commander of World War I. If we could only judge some men by one inning instead of the whole game.

Cordially, your Congressman,

WILLIAM J. GREEN, Jr.

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—Congressman GREEN expresses his own views, which are not necessarily those of this paper.)

Trading With Aggressor Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, 72 Republican Congressmen joined in a letter to W. Averell Harriman, special assistant to the President on foreign affairs. The letter sought answers to questions in connection with the United States and members of the United Nations continuing to trade and do business with aggressor nations and their supporters. The Congressmen also inquired if economic sanctions were being considered.

The text of the letter follows:

JULY 31, 1950.

Mr. W. AVERELL HARRIMAN,
Special Assistant to the President,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HARRIMAN: We, the undersigned Members of Congress, all are deeply conscious of the critical situation that currently confronts our country. We are well aware of the realities that compelled the administration to draw a line and demand that the series of aggressive acts that threaten the world peace be met with force.

The United States, and most of the member states in the United Nations, are today committed to repelling an act of aggression that seriously threatens the world peace, not merely in Korea, but in other sections of the world. We have considered, and support in principle, the steps recommended for mobilizing our country against these contingencies.

We have noted with a great deal of concern that while we have acted to resist the aggression in the case of North Korea, and are preparing to resist similiar acts of aggression and threats to the world peace in other quarters of the world, we still continue to trade and do business with the "seconds" or supporters of these same aggressors or potential aggressors. Why?

Cannot this trading with these countries be stopped under existing legislation and authority granted to the President?

Has the question of economic sanctions been considered?

It is our feeling that it is not enough to merely offer armed resistance to the aggression of North Korea and her supporters. We suggest that there exists no justification for continued trade on a business-as-usual basis with governments supporting the North Koreans.

Does the President at the moment have the authority to apply economic sanctions against these countries?

Will a request for legislation to provide the necessary authority be made?

Has the administration considered submission to the United Nations of a request for economic sanctions against the aggressor, future aggressors, and their supporters? The United Nations Charter, article 41, specifically authorizes complete or partial interruption of economic relations.

We would greatly appreciate your acknowledgement and reply to this letter and the questions contained therein.

Cross Road in Eternity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, the Reverend Robert L. Lang, Jr., pastor of Trinity Lutheran Church, Altoona, Pa., in his sermon of April 29, 1951, provides much food for thought in our quest for a solution to the problems confronting this Nation.

Reverend Lang's sermon follows:

CROSS ROAD IN ETERNITY

It is time for Americans to come down from their comfortable but unreal dream world, and to face reality. The text is written in the first chapter of James, the twenty-second and the twenty-fifth verses: "But be ye doers of the Word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves. Whosoever looketh into the perfect law of liberty and continueth therein, he being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, this man shall be blessed in his deed."

Several years ago Dr. Charles A. Beard coined a number of laws of history. Perhaps the truest of them all was this: "Whom the gods would destroy, they first make mad with power." There have been numerous examples of the truth of this law in modern times. Napoleon, Hitler, Mussolini, Tojo, all were destroyed because of their intoxication with power. But Beard's great law of history applies not only to individuals. It applies to nations, too. I am going to tell you about Rome.

When the city of Rome expanded her power, 2400 years ago, to include the whole Italian peninsula, her people believed in and practiced the highest ideals of citizenship. They were devout in their observance of the religion of their day. They were honest, morally unimpeachable, noble in their thinking. Politics was a thing of highest honor. Rome's star shone like a beacon over a world of discouragement and defeatism. And the strong assurance and moral strength of Rome's citizens were reflected in Rome's armies, for her soldiers, living up to the high ideals of the home folks, were as fine as any warriors the ancient world ever knew.

Those soldiers brought Rome glory, and the greatest empire of antiquity. In their stalwart strength, resting upon a home base of sincere and noble citizens, they added to the Roman crown jewels such as Egypt, Carthage, Tunis, Tripoli, Spain, Syria, Judea, Galilee, Germany, Gaul, and Britain. Victory was sweet. Caesar, Pompey, Antony, and Brutus returned from battle to receive the plaudits of the Roman throngs. Rome was strong, and growing stronger every day. Ah, yes; but whom the gods would destroy, they first make mad with power.

And so it was with Rome. Victory and power did something to the Roman citizen. We see it first in the members of the Roman government, who became selfish, and jealous, and corrupt, and crude. But we see it soon enough in almost every citizen who tramped the Roman pavements. For the wine of national success and prestige intoxicated the soul of the everyday Roman. He neglected his gods. He forgot the arts, the good, the beautiful, the true. He buried his morals, personal, political, and international. He became a creature who did only one thing well, and that was to live off the bounty of the state. His chief delight came to be gladiatorial bloodshed. He loved every vice, and flaunted every virtue. Mad with power, the home base of the Roman armies became a great center of private and public corruption.

And the inevitable happened. The spirit of Rome's citizens invaded her armies. What was the use of fighting when no one any longer knew or cared what they were fighting for? Why obey discipline, when all discipline was dissipated at home? Discontent, disheartened because the foundation was cut out from under them back home, the Roman armies lost their fighting spirit. And so it was not long before Attila, the Hun, the scourge of the north from out the steppes of Russia, had cut the empire to ribbons, and the barbarian Goths had captured, sacked, and burned the very capitol of the Caesars, Rome, once the sapphire of antiquity. "Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad with power." When the citizens of a nation become intoxicated by the spirit of success and invincibility, the days of that nation are numbered.

I declare unto you today that it is time for Americans to do some serious thinking. You need only read history to see that in America history is repeating itself. Only a relatively few years ago the representatives of thirteen little colonies pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor to a venture of freedom. Because those men and the citizens they represented lived by their sacred honor, America became a great Nation. Her people were religious. They believed in Almighty God, and they tried to live it. Politics carried a heavy and an accepted responsibility. Men and women were concerned that their Government carry out their own high ideals. The cause of righteousness and decency inspired every fighting man from Bunker Hill to Iwo Jima. And America emerged from the Second World War the strongest Nation on the face of the earth.

In the few years which followed, America properly became the warehouse of those whom she had supported in battle. Britain, France, Turkey, Greece were able to remain free, and some of them able to survive, only because of the life lines from American fields and factories. America also became the blood bank, and again properly so, of her former enemies, as Japan, Italy, and Western Germany were given transfusions and set on their economic and political feet, and were taught for once the truths of simple decency which make for great nations.

Yet in those last few years, something was happening in America herself. Something which did not need to happen. Something which should not have happened. Something which has brought this Nation to a great crossroad. For the common citizens of this Nation drank the wine of military victory and economic plenty. Our people feasted on the meat of prestige. They imbibed the potions of wartime morality, and easy-money luxury. In short, Americans became mad with power. And it is still true, "Whom the gods would destroy, they first make mad with power." Oh, we have said, "That doesn't mean us. It can't happen to America." But it does mean us, and it is near enough to happening right now that we simply must be aware of what is going on.

The corruption of our society, of our integrity, and of our officialdom has not yet, thank God, cut the foundation out from under our forces fighting for righteousness and freedom. It was grand to hear 10 days ago from the general of the army that they are still fine in every way. But we here at home simply must face the facts which the last month has thrown flatly in our faces. The home country and the home people, people like you and me, have gone mad, and no army can long continue to fight for righteousness and freedom when righteousness and freedom are dead symbols in the heart of the common man and of his government.

Let us frankly face the picture we have seen of ourselves in recent weeks—and it will be our fault alone if we fail to see the picture, and therefore fail to learn its lessons, and if we therefore have to bear the consequences. The picture is not nice. Americans have come to be a dishonest people. We have read and heard and seen some of the events unearthed by the Kefauver investigation. If you paid any attention to those events at all, and you should have, you were shocked by the vice, the graft, the dishonesty, the immorality which extend from the czars of the underworld down not only into our colleges and universities—and you ask, "Why support Christian education?"—but which send their tentacles into every town and hamlet, including our town, and in many, many of our homes, including some of yours.

Yet we need not have been surprised by those revelations. We have known those things were happening on a local scale for years, and we never paid any attention. We never insisted that our officials act. We all did some of the same things ourselves. We tried our best to beat the rationing system during the war. We still seize every opportunity to get something for nothing. We are delighted when our pony wins, or when we can find a punchboard or slot machine, and it pays off. Our clubs raise their money by raffles, and we send our children out on the street to sell chances for the school, and we have made ourselves believe it is all right because, as we put it, "It's all for a good cause," which means almost any cause must be good. And some of us would even like to bring that sort of thing into the church. We all try to get to know somebody who knows somebody, so we can get our piece of the pie a little cheaper. And we have tried to justify ourselves by saying, "All of life's a gamble, so why not live like it?" Well, perhaps for you life is a gamble, and if so, I'm sorry—but it's true, life just can't be otherwise, unless, of course, you really believe in God. But the everyday honesty and integrity and sacred honor of the American people is dead. And the big-time gamblers didn't kill it. You did, and I did. We everyday Americans did. And if it wasn't for us the big shots would never have had their chance. The real blame for these horrible conditions rests on our town, and on our homes, and on our souls, and on us.

We could speak of morals. They are lousy, with everything which that crude word suggests. But again it was not the house of ill-fame, which get sometimes into our papers and are a must for every really popular novel, which sabotaged America's morals. It was the deeds done in the dark not only by America's boys and girls, but also by America's fathers and mothers. And when startling revelations of American immorality blow across the news, and when your children have difficulty finding decent magazines with decent pictures at the store, just remember where the blame really falls. It falls on your town, and on your street, and perhaps on your house, and on you.

The last weeks have also brought a terrific indictment against our Government. As I told you almost a year ago, at the very outset of the Korean war, if Christianity is to be preserved in our world, our Nation must preserve it, for no other country has either the power or the will to do so. It has just been made plain that our Government does not have the will to do so, either.

I do not pretend to know who is right in the current dispute over the Far East. The facts are too confused, and we have not been told enough of enough of them. But I do know we are in a war, and you people who have sons and husbands in training camps and in Korea know that we are in a war. And I also know that no army in the field can successfully wage war unless its government back home is sure of what it intends to do, and has sharp ideas as to how it is going to do it. It was proved by the Duke of Wellington, and by Marshall Foch, as well as by General MacArthur, that when the home government is unable to understand the situation with which it is faced, then the military commander is absolutely forced to make his own decisions—and if George Washington had waited for the Continental Congress to act, there never would have been an America in the first place. At least the Continental Congress remembered its sacred honor, and didn't act like a spoiled child.

Our present Government, and most other Americans, never have understood the seriousness of what has been going on in the world the last 20 and more years. It does not believe the truth history proves, and of which the Russians boast, that we are dealing with an enemy who is completely pagan, and who therefore will use, and is using, any means at all, including lies, double-talk, two-facedness, and atomic war to gain control of the whole world; an enemy who is keenly aware that if he conquers the United States he has conquered the one nation which is holding the rest of the free countries of the world together. In that ignorance, General Marshall delivered China deliberately to the Communists, in his report on China 2 years or so ago. In that ignorance, and in questionable innocence, Dean Acheson supported Alger Hiss. In that ignorance President Truman recalled the only man who, regardless of where he is right or where he is wrong, is the only American who both knows what is actually going on in the Far East, and whom the Russians definitely fear. In that ignorance we would follow our pink-tinged allies and appease the enemy still further by betraying unto him Formosa, and presenting him with still another seat in the United Nations from which more swiftly he may cut our throat. And appeasement is merely capitulation without a battle, and making oneself even weaker for the battle which is sure to come anyway. We should have learned about 13 years ago that we can't win wars with umbrellas.

But it is all too easy to blame the Government. We cannot blame the Government for not facing reality when we citizens, who actually are the Government, have persistently refused to face reality ourselves. We were the ones who didn't care to have our dreams shattered by reality. We screamed for disarmament in 1945–46, in spite of the warnings of Eisenhower and others. We urged the dismantling of our national defenses and the dismembering of our Armed Forces. We were the ones who did not want to pay taxes, and who scoffed at the idea that anyone would dare oppose us. We were the ones who enjoyed ourselves in the postwar world, and who spent recklessly, and who lived recklessly, and who refused to be serious about anything. We were the ones who took the goings-on in Moscow and Washington as a joke. Instead of standing in our watchtower looking out to protect our freedoms, we exploited and abused them. We have been mad with our power. Corruption, immorality, dishonesty, the will to appease and the unwillingness to meet reality have reached up from almost every home on every street of every town, and that's how they got into the Capitol of the land. And whom the gods of history would destroy, they first make mad. Rome lives again, here. The forces among the citizenry which undermined Rome's armies and efforts are all too surely present in the hearts and lives of our own people. And the power of the godless barbarian from the north is already quivering to be unleashed. And until and unless we Americans in our homes and in our hearts get back to the sacred honor of Americans, no power on earth can stop that pagan horde.

I wonder how we came to be this way? James tells us in his old Epistle. He said long, long ago, "Be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves." There is how we came to be so dishonest, so immoral, so uncaring, so mad. We were content to be hearers, not just our officials, for they would have to do, if we did. But you, and I, and millions like us all over America have come to our churches on Sunday mornings—yes, 1 hour a week was all we could give to it—and we have heard God's word, on which our Nation and our souls are founded, and then we have gone out and promptly forgotten about it and lived in our lives as if neither God nor His word existed. James even tells us just how we have done it: Like a man seeing his face in a mirror, seeing the promise reflected there, the fine character, the noble features, and concluding therefore he was successful and fine and noble, yet only deceiving himself, because he went out into life and forgot the promise, the character, and the nobility to live like a scum. Just so, we have heard God's words of life. God has told us how to live alertly, cleanly, purely, honestly, truly, eternally. But merely having heard, we have thought we had already accomplished God's requests, and thereby we deceived ourselves. For having heard, we have forgotten all, and become mad with the spirit of our time. Well, we have had our warning. "Whom the gods would destroy, they first make mad."

But far more important to us is this question: How do we escape from this situation, before our moral and spiritual disease infects our Army, as it has our Government; before, in our intoxication we, like Rome, fall before the pagan from the north? Do not snort at that question. Those who laugh at reality live only to die in their folly. We stand today at a crossroad in eternity. Either we give ourselves to be used by God as His instruments for the preservation of freedom, of decency, of Christianity, or else God will let us die in our insanity and raise up in some other land another people to be His servants. How do we find the right road? How do we escape from our current madness?

James tells us. It is all in God's Word, you see, if we will only hear, and do. James says, "Who so looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and lives in it, and is not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, this man shall be blessed." Now the law of liberty is merely the law of God, the Gospel of Jesus Christ. James is right. If we will look for once earnestly into that law, and accept its truth; if we will not just hear and forget it, but hear it and live it, in honesty, in strictness, in purity, in alertness, beginning with the little things of everyday life, if we will be doers who actually live the law of God, we shall be blessed. We shall be blessed because God never forsakes those who give their hearts and lives to Him. He who is on the Lord's side, by the power of the God within him is victorious.

The desperate situation in which we stand today won't be solved by seeking a complicated solution. The right road to the kindom of God on earth won't be found in the halls of legislative debate and investigation. The situation will be solved and the road to the kingdom found first of all by you, in your church pew, in your heart, in your life, in your home, in your city, and at last in your country as you become a doer of God's Word, and actually begin to live in God's purity and alertness and honesty and truth. And the solution can be found and the road to the kingdom chosen no other way.

We have had our warning. God has given it to us, perhaps for the last time, in March and April 1951. This is no word of doom. It is a word of challenge. We are on the verge of dissipating it in the mere madness of hero worship. Heroes do fade away. They even die. God never does. Only those die who hear His Word and forget it. But those, even at the very crossroad, who look again to God's perfect law of liberty and live in it, and are not forgetful hearers, but doers of God's work, they and their Nation shall be blessed. The way to the right roads to peace, security, and eternity begins with the most simple thing in all the world—obedience to the Word of God. In our current madness it will be difficult for us to take the simple road. But it is the only road which doesn't lead to obliteration. The decision must be made and made today. Tomorrow may be too late. The decision is America's to make, and you, my people, are America. The making of the decision begins with you. Be ye doers of God's Word.

Non-Russian People of Soviet Union Our Potent Ally in the Overthrow of the Stalin Regime

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHARLES J. KERSTEN

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, about half the people in the Soviet Union are non-Russian. They include 40,000,000 Ukrainians, 10,000,000 Byelorussians, and more than 50,000,000 other peoples—such as Lithuanians, Latvians, Estonians, Georgians, Tartars, Armenians, and Turkestanians.

Both the Russian and the non-Russian people in the Soviet Union suffer from the Communist terrorism, but in addition the non-Russian peoples suffer as minority groups trod upon by the aggressive and imperialistic policies of the Communists in the Kremlin.

The underground Ukrainian, Lithuanian, Georgian, and other resistance groups are already an active force against the Communists. Other groups are most eager to strike a blow for freedom when the time is opportune. It is these groups that can be in the vanguard of the fight against imperialistic Soviet communism.

The American people have always been ready to assist the downtrodden and oppressed. To set forth more clearly these feelings of the American people and in order to give a new direction to our foreign policy, I introduced into the House on April 17, 1951, House Concurrent Resolution 94—a resolution to assist the non-Russian peoples of the Soviet Union in their struggle for liberation from their present Communist enslavement.

The resolution expresses the friendship of the American people with the non-Russian peoples of the Soviet Union, and their conviction as to the rights of these peoples to their basic freedoms and to self-determination. The resolution expresses the hopes of the American people for the early liberation of the non-Russian peoples and requests the President to make no further agreements with the present Soviet regime which in any way strengthens or maintains its power and to explore methods whereby the American people and the United States Government can assist the non-Russian people in their struggle for liberation.

If the United States properly takes advantage of this basic Soviet weakness by strongly encouraging these nationalities in opposition to the Communist imperialist regime, we may well be able to avert world war III.

If, nonetheless, total war should be precipitated by Communist recklessness, our victory may depend on the support of these non-Russian peoples living along the vulnerable edges of the Soviet empire.

In formulating a practical program of assistance to these oppressed peoples, America is in a potentially fortunate position since we already have within our borders various American political groups which can offer advice and assistance, such as the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America, the Lithuanian-American Council, The American Latvian Association, The Estonian World Alliance, and the National Committee of the Byelorussians, Georgians, and others.

In formulating this resolution, I have been greatly assisted by Dr. Lev E. Dobriansky of Georgetown University, who is president of the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America, and executive vice president of the Federation of Americans of Central and East European Descent.

The text of House Concurrent Resolution 94, which was referred to the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, is as follows:

Whereas the American people have long accepted the basic principles set forth in the American Declaration of Independence of 1776 in the following words: "* * * that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty, and the pursuit of Happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men—deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, that whenever any form of Government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the Right of the People to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new Government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their Safety and Happiness"; and

Whereas the American people believe these principles are universal and apply to all men everywhere, at all times, and under all forms of government; and

Whereas these principles flow from certain essential truths, among which are—

That the Creator is the Author of every human being and the Source of his rights and that neither the state nor any other human agency has jurisdiction to exploit any human being or violate his rights;

That the state is a servant to mankind and not its master and may not pervert its administrative and police powers so as to make of them a weapon to violate human rights or to terrorize the people;

That there is a brotherhood of all men but only under the Fatherhood of God; and

Whereas communism wears a humanitarian cloak and poses as the messiah of social justice but in reality has given rise to the most reactionary regime of our time based on barbarism and slavery as a result of its immoral doctrine founded in malice setting man against man, class against class, and all men against God; and

Whereas communism thrusts itself beyond civil government and political philosophy, claiming the whole man, denying all spiritual values, denying his inalienable rights, and seeking to transform all human beings created by God in His Image into soulless biological units, to be fitted into a military and economic machine designed for world revolution; and

Whereas communism, although not native to Russia, was adopted by a small, ruthless Bolshevik minority which by treachery, deceit, brutal force, and terror subverted and destroyed the freedom gained by the Russian people in their democratic revolution of February 1917; and

Whereas imperialist communism, from the base of its dictatorship in Russia proper, did later occupy by brutal military aggression the proclaimed Democratic National Republics of the independent Ukrainian, Byelorussian, Kuban Cossack, Georgian, Armenian, Azerbaijanian, North Caucasian, Finno-Karelian, Tatar, and Turkestanian peoples; and

Whereas imperialist communism has in crass disregard of the wills of these peoples enforced on them the unnatural structure of the Soviet Union, as later on the Lithuanian, Latvian, Estonian, Moldavian, West and Carpatho-Ukrainian peoples, and tyrannizes all of the afore-mentioned peoples, together with the Bashkirs, Uzbeks, Kirgizes, Buryat Mongols, Chuvashes, Dagestans, Kabardinians, Komis, Maris, Mordovians, North Osetians, Tatars (Volga), Udmurts, Yakuts, Abkhazes, and Kara-Kalpaks, under a regime of colonialism and inhuman exploitation; and

Whereas imperialist communism, during and after World War II, applied genocide on the peoples rebelling against its dictatorship and annihilated the Volga German Republic, the Crimean Tatar Republic, the Chechen Republic, and the autonomous region of Karachev, scattering their population over the Asiatic Arctic; and

Whereas imperialist communism is systematically applying to all the non-Russian nationalities, both within the Soviet Union and without the Soviet Union, Stalin's Russification program, aiming at the destruction of all national organisms and their cultural peculiarities by creating one Soviet nationality, with one Soviet language and one Soviet culture; and

Whereas communism after consolidating its imperialist gains succeeded until recently by means of false propaganda, deceit, police-state methods, and hermetically sealed frontiers, in keeping the non-Soviet world largely ignorant of the plight of these non-Russian peoples within the Soviet Union and, in turn, keeping the peoples within the Soviet Union in ignorance of the true nature of conditions existing outside its borders and particularly of conditions in the democratic world; and

Whereas communism has taken the lives of tens of millions of human beings in the Soviet Union (notably the liquidation of about five million Ukrainian peasants in 1932–33 and the Lidice-like massacre of Ukrainians in Vinnitsia in 1937–38) including a vast number of the members of its own armed forces (other than in the late war), and has enslaved the peoples—

By robbing them of their farms and transforming them into landless agricultural robots;

By chaining workers to their factories and transforming them into homeless industrial robots;

By depriving intellectuals of freedom of creative work and thought and transforming them into voiceless ideological robots;

By submitting vast numbers from all classes, both men and women, old and young workers (industrial and white collar), peasants, and intellectuals, to the subhuman conditions of concentration camps in uninhabitable areas and transforming them into a nameless host of more than fifteen million state slaves;

By the uprooting and dispersal of minority groups;

By practicing genocide upon national groups, including the Jewish population, within the Soviet Union and making the Soviet Union a burial ground of nations; and

Whereas communism is in the process of destroying the institution of the family in the Soviet Union by an enforced collective way of life, by inordinate control and indoctrination of the children, and by setting members of the same family against one another through fear and terror; and

Whereas communism is in the process of destroying religion in the Soviet Union by fostering atheism, by ridiculing and persecuting the sincere religious expression of the people, by perverting religious instincts in the hearts of the young, by murdering the representatives of religion, by destruction of places of worship and the abolition of religious institutions (as the Ukrainian Orthodox Church in the 1920's and the Ukrainian Catholic Church in 1945), by tolerating only religious services subservient to the state, and by deifying the leader of the Red regime; and

Whereas imperialist communism has by force and deceit conscripted into the Soviet Army overwhelming numbers of peace-loving non-Russian peasants, workers, and intellectuals whose genuine anticommunist and anti-imperialist sentiments have been amply demonstrated by numerous acts of self-determination, revolts, and resistances (such as: 1918–20—the courageous defense of the independent Ukrainian National Republic against Trotsky's Red Army; 1926—the Georgian revolt for independence; 1928–30—the upsurge of Ukrainian "Titoism" led by Skripnik and others; 1937—the plan to overthrow the imperialist Communist regime led by Marshal Tukhachevsky, General Yakir, Colonels Prymakiv and Kryvoruchko; 1938—the spontaneous creation of the independent Carpatho-Ukraine; 1941—the heralded declarations of Ukrainian independence in both Lviv and Kiev at the outbreak of the Red-Nazi conflict; 1941–42—the willful mass surrender of over 2,000,000 Soviet Ukrainian troops to fight for the independence of their homeland; 1943–present—the extensive underground resistance of the Ukrainian Insurgent Army, cooperating with the Lithuanian, Slovak, and Polish undergrounds, against the Nazi invaders and now against the Communist imperialists, achieving a deep infiltration into the multinational Soviet Army); and

Whereas communism by making false and appealing promises, in an atmosphere of ideological black-out in the Soviet Union, perverts the patriotic fervor of a certain number of young idealists, who have a genuine desire to serve their respective peoples, and exploits it for an antihuman conspiracy; and

Whereas communism in order to extend still further its tyranny concentrates its efforts on promoting artificial hostile feelings between the friendly and peace-loving peoples within the Soviet Union and the people of the United States and of other free nations whose basic aspirations as human beings are identical, and who have no real conflicting interests; and

Whereas imperialist communism not satisfied with the early subjugation and exploitation of these millions of people in the Soviet Union has already forced Marxist-Stalinist tyranny on the more recently free and independent nations of Latvia, Lithuania, Estonia, Poland, Rumania, Bulgaria, Hungary, Albania, Czechoslovakia, and initially Yugoslavia which still follows the Communist ideology, and in the words of the United States Supreme Court Justice Jackson in the recent case of American Communications Association vs. Douds (339 U. S. at p. 429), "the international police state has crept over Eastern Europe by deception, coercion, coup d'état, and terrorism and assassination."; and communism has conquered China and is in the process of attempting to subjugate Korea, Tibet, Viet Nam, and Malaya, and seeks eventually to enslave free men everywhere with the openly professed aim of establishing the World Soviet Union; and

Whereas agreements made by any one or more of the free nations with the Communist regime that now enslaves the peoples within the Soviet Union strengthen materially and morally the position of said regime, weaken the resistance to Communist tyranny, and dim the hopes of these peoples for liberation; such agreements with said regime being used by it only to its advantage for the purposes of accumulating additional strength and to the disadvantage of every other country seeking honorably to compose differences with it; it being one of the prime techniques of communism to disregard truth and honor and to ignore agreements whenever opportune; and

Whereas, in contrast to the treacherous fifth columns that operate in the free countries of the world to enslave them to imperialistic communism, there exists among these non-Russian peoples, who constitute about one-half of the population of the Soviet Union, an active and extensive underground system led by the Ukranian Insurgent Army, which, if offered the encouragement and positive aid of the free peoples of the world, will enable them to liberate themselves and overthrow the imperialistic Communist tyranny and help place mankind on the path of peace instead of plunging it into the holocaust of a third world war; and

Whereas past tragic mistakes in the policies of certain of the free nations, including that of the United States, toward the Communist regime in the Soviet Union and a failure fully to understand the true nature, extent, and the enormity of its aggressive designs have substantially contributed toward placing said Communist regime in a position where it now is a clear and present danger to world peace and the free progress of mankind compelling the United States and other free nations again to undertake a vast program of armament expenditures; and

Whereas, while we rearm with reluctance and would prefer to devote our energies to peace, we are determined to defend our freedom; and

Whereas rearmament alone coupled with an attempt to compose differences with the Communist regime by treaties and agreements leaving undisturbed said regime and its present enormous conquests of aggression will, over a period of years, place a crushing burden of armaments upon the free world that eventually could well, of itself, destroy freedom; and such agreements and treaties would tend to stabilize said regime in its conquests and give a benediction to a way of life that has declared war on all human nature under its control; and

Whereas the world cannot long continue to exist half slave and half free: Now, therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States hereby reaffirms the historic friendship of the American people with the different peoples within the Soviet Union—the millions of Ukrainians, Byelorussians, Georgians, Lithuanians, Latvians, Estonians, and the other non-Russian peoples between whom and the American people there are innumerable ties of kinship, and concerning whose mutual aspirations for democracy, liberty, and justice there has always been an alliance; that the American motives for these aspirations and this alliance lie deep because the United States of America was founded and has been built largely by the oppressed peoples from all countries.

SEC. 2. The Congress of the United States, on behalf of the American people, solemnly pledges that the common struggle against imperialist communism in which this Nation, together with other free nations, is now engaged is not directed against those who have been misled by communism through no fault of their own but against those who have misled them; that those who have unwittingly served the small clique in control of the Communist regime or in countries captive to it should not fear vengeance, provided they break off with communism; and that the American people recognize the right of the non-Russian peoples within the Soviet Union and of the countries now held captive by said Communist regime to bring to justice their oppressors who are leading them into another world war that will mean destruction of many more millions of lives and of many cities, homes, and the countryside within the Soviet Union.

SEC. 3. (a) The Congress of the United States hereby expresses the firm conviction of the American people that the non-Russian peoples within the Soviet Union have the right of self-determination (including the right of any of the nations within the Soviet Union to determine its own form of government and also the right to form a free federation of whatever choosing), based on the free and effective expression of popular will, namely, that no nation can be deprived of territory by force and that no nation can keep territory by force, and, by free election, to be governed by their own consent.

(b) It is further expressed to be the firm conviction of the American people that these non-Russian peoples as well as the Russian people within the Soviet Union have the right to the basic freedoms for which they have long struggled and for which in World War II they together with other people, shed their blood, among which freedoms are—

(1) the right of peasants to their own land, to work it as they see fit, and to dispose of the fruits of their labor as they see fit;

(2) the right of workers to select freely the type and place of their employment, and to obtain equitable wages and decent working hours and conditions through the organization of their own truly independent trade unions;

(3) the right of intellectuals to freedom of scientific and artistic creation, to freedom of cultural intercourse with the whole world, and to the establishment of educational, scientific, and cultural institutions, independent of state control;

(4) the right of political prisoners of all classes to immediate liberation and aid in rehabilitation;

(5) the freedom of religion, of speech, of thought, and of the press, and freedom of each national group to use its own language and kind of alphabet;

(6) the right of the people peaceably to assemble, to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures;

(7) the right of the people to life, liberty, and private ownership of property; the right of an accused to a speedy and public trial in accordance with principles of law and justice;

(8) the freedom of movement within the country and of travel abroad and upon the high seas, together with the freedom to engage in commerce and pursuits of private enterprise and in all peaceful activities;

(9) the freedom of families from the Communist way of life and from undue state interference and control, and of parents in the education of their children;

(10) the freedom of the armed forces to defend the legitimate interests of the Ukrainian, Byelorussian, Georgian, Lithuanian, Latvian, Estonian, and other peoples within the Soviet Union, the right and obligation of the armed forces to protect the people from the Communist tyranny, and the freedom of the armed forces from being used and augmented by the Communist tyranny into an aggressive force both against its own people and against peaceful nations.

SEC. 4. To give meaning to their historic friendship for the multiple national peoples within the Soviet Union, the Congress of the United States hereby expresses the strong hope of the American people for an early liberation of the Ukrainian, Byelorussian, Georgian, Lithuanian, Latvian, Estonian, and other peoples within the Soviet Union from their Communist enslavement. To assist in bringing about that liberation at the earliest possible date, the President of the United States is hereby requested—

(1) to make no further agreement and no commitments to the present Soviet regime that would tend in any way to maintain, stabilize, or further extend its power over the enslaved peoples of the Soviet Union;

(2) to formulate a new and stronger foreign policy which, among other things, recognizes the essentially evil nature of the Communist regime bent on the destruction of the United States and of the free world and takes cognizance of the paramount imperialist character of said regime in its enslavement of over 80,000,000 non-Russian peoples occupying the broad peripheral area of the Soviet Union from the Baltic to the Black Sea to the Far East Pacific.

(3) to explore the methods whereby our representatives in the United Nations may urge that body to assist the Ukrainian, Byelorussian, and other peoples within the Soviet Union who resist serving as cannon fodder in the imperialist ventures of the Kremlin, to obtain liberation from their present enslavement and exchange for their present representation in the United Nations a true representation that can work for, rather than obstruct and undermine the efforts of all peoples of the world, for the first time in human history effectively to lay down a true foundation for lasting peace and the undisturbed permanent coexistence of peoples;

(4) to explore methods whereby the American people through their Government, and by private means with Government assistance and otherwise may offer material aid and moral support to active fighters now struggling for the liberation of the Ukrainian, Byelorussian, Georgian, Lithuanian, Latvian, Estonian, and other peoples within the Soviet Union and people in the Communist-dominated countries.

Letter From a Marine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, as part of my remarks I am including a copy of a letter received by a mother who has a son fighting with the marines in Korea. I have deliberately omitted the names for fear of reprisal.

Mr. Speaker, after reading this letter, Members of Congress will wonder how we can possibly justify the administration's policies in Korea today. MacArthur is right, but his voice is like one crying out in the wilderness, all at the expense of our boys who are dying in Korea:

"LIKE A HERD OF SHEEP BEING LED TO SLAUGHTER," MARINE WRITES

From the pen of a marine comes the best first-hand description of the Korean war the reporter sees. The young marine returned to the front April 13, according to the latest word from Korea, fully recovered from a leg wound suffered in earlier action.

Around Mason, Korea was, in early April, the prettiest John had ever seen it. Rice fields made it green, and cherry blossoms were in full bloom. But of the war he penned:

SAW MASSACRED CONVOY

"If you could see some of the massacres that have taken place over here. At one place, about 20 miles south of the thirty-eighth, I saw the remains of a whole convoy of American soldiers. Evidently attacked by overwhelming forces, they didn't have a chance. Many were killed in their trucks and jeeps. Such scenes are common in Korea, but the worst is yet to come.

"Our intelligence reports the North Koreans and Chinese have 63 divisions in North Korea, with an unlimited supply of replacements. How hopeless it all seems. Our forces are but a fraction of that.

"[The politicians] say the men are fighting and dying over here to prevent world war III. What in h—— do they think is going on right now?"

SACRIFICE IN VAIN?

"Every time I see a replacement come in, in my mind I compare them to a herd of sheep being led to the slaughter—or a truckload of hogs being taken to the stockyards. For a man to sacrifice his life for such a cause makes life itself seem quite in vain."

Earlier, while still aboard the hospital ship, he wrote:

"I am listening to hillbilly music. Eddie Arnold is singing Tomorrow Never Comes. Isn't it the truth? They'll send me back to the States tomorrow—but tomorrow is always just beyond reach.

"The situation here doesn't look too good. The Commies are preparing to pour everything within their reach into the spring offensive. Suppose by the time I get back up front it will be hell. Hope I get hit soon after I get up there. You see with two Purple Hearts (or a still one) we get back to the States. For my next wound I'd even settle for a loss of a leg. It would be worth it to get out of here.

"You know, mom, a person has many more lives than a cat. A cat has only nine; I died many, many times up in those mountains. For example: One afternon our squad was crossing a ledge. There was a sheer rock wall on one side of us, a 2,000-foot drop on the other. The enemy, on another mountain 200 yards away, opened up on us with machine guns. We had no place to go."

UNITED STATES MACHINE GUNNERS TOOK OVER

"Then, for about 5 minutes (until our own machine guns found them) they fired steadily at us. Shells chipped rock all around us. I remember how I turned my right side toward them, to give more protection to my heart. Some of the darndest things run through a mind. You tell yourself, 'This is it.' It's funny how a man prepares himself to die.

"On another afternoon mortar shells were hitting all around us. We all thought our numbers were up. I looked about to see how the rest were taking it. All were lying around. Some had their arms over their heads, as if that would protect them, but most were lying face down. I imagine each was praying in his own way, for we had no protection whatsoever.

"I said to myself, 'Well, John, this is the end of the line!' Suddenly I sat up, calm as hell, and pulled out some poems I had been working on, and read them over. It seemed to give me courage of some kind. I don't know what made me do it, but evidently a person will do strange things under such circumstances.

"I am reading a book, 'Return To Religion'—a very good book, in my opinion. You know, Mom, sometimes I get to feeling that I'll never get back home. I've been away so long and so many things have happened that it just seems as if God didn't intend I should come back.

"Life gets pretty dreary here aboard the hospital ship. Saw the sun yesterday, for the first time in 3 weeks. Spring is in the air. In the distance mountainsides, with their rice fields, are starting to get green. Makes me sort of homesick. Suppose fields back there are getting green, too. Won't be long before farmers will be working in the field.

"Will try to write the State Line Country Club. Have received their package. I think it was really nice of them. Seems the package followed me from the Philippines, to Japan, then on to Korea. I kept moving around so much it was a long time before it caught up to me.

"My Sharon Reporter is taking a long time to reach me. I am now receiving last December's issues. Even letters seem to take longer than they should. Yours are taking a month to get to me. Hope to be seeing you before Christmas."

Nurses Are Needed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Boston Daily Globe of May 7, 1951:

NURSES ARE NEEDED

In almost every occupation the law of supply and demand determines the income possibilities. If many persons are qualified to engage in it, the demand for their services slacks off. If, however, it is the other way, would-be employers crowd one another in the effort to engage someone who can carry out their wishes. Such a situation is likely to raise the compensation.

A condition of this sort is met with in boom times in most of the trades. When the number of carpenters is decidedly less than the demand, it is likely to cost more to build a house or even to repair a fence. The same is true of many other skilled trades. There are labor unions which limit sharply the number of young men admitted as apprentices.

In two of the learned professions, the law and medicine, it looks very much to the outsider as if those actively engaged are disposed to narrow admissions. There are many law schools in the country, but, when it comes to receiving graduates as members of the bar the way is straight and narrow and few there be who manage to get through it.

As for medicine, the number of schools, where young men or young women are trained to deal with the ills of the flesh, show small disposition to increase, although it is common knowledge that there are many persons in this country, rather close to half of them, beyond the reach of prompt and modern medical service. There are some few physicians who worry about this, but most of the profession seem undisturbed by the shortage.

It might be supposed that nurses would have an attitude similar to that of doctors of medicine, but that is not so. Instead, the organized trained nurses of the United States, and also of many other countries, are so deeply disturbed about the lack of competent members of their profession that they are seeking to commend their calling to others so that this shortage will be in the way of disappearing.

Here in Boston the National League of Nursing Education is holding its fifty-fifth assembly this year on the theme, Education for Nursing Service. Last November a committee representing six national nursing organizations reported a shortage of 65,000 professional nurses below the minimum requirements for civilian nursing service. In this estimate, no allowance was made for urgent military and civil defense needs.

During World War II there were at one time 65,216 nurses in military service. To meet all the needs and to take care of normal population growth 58,000 nurse students must be admitted annually to basic nursing schools. In the year 1950 only 44,200 new ones enrolled.

Meeting this week in Boston there are to be about 2,000 nurses, educators, and students, deeply concerned that this serious gap between supply and demand be closed. Of course they are eager about recruiting for their profession, but in addition they are bent on having good education for those interested in enrolling in schools where nursing is taught. They want both more nurses and better nurses.

One matter that interests them exceedingly is a measure now before Congress, the Bolton bill (H. R. 190). Like many other forms of training the cost of giving adequate nursing education has advanced decidedly. Endowments do not yield so much as formerly. Construction of new buildings and their proper equipment has become more expensive. Leaders of the profession are convinced that Federal aid is necessary to guard and maintain the health of the people of this country.

The measure was introduced by Representative FRANCES BOLTON of Ohio, who is herself the founder of a school of nursing and is now serving her sixth term in Congress. She has the confidence of the nursing organizations. Her plan would supplement existing income and the resources of nursing schools, to help with the cost of instruction and to build new schools. Scholarships for qualified students in need of assistance, to aid research and to promote recruitment, would be included. An annual appropriation of $5,000,000 is asked for construction and equipment. The amount for scholarships would be determined annually by Congress. There is more to the proposal, but the essential purpose is to begin to relieve the shortage in order that the rest of us may be properly cared for when our health needs it. Good nursing is quite as important as proper care by physicians.

St. Lawrence Seaway and Power Development

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARENCE E. KILBURN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. KILBURN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following article from the May 7, 1951, issue of Newsweek concerning the great St. Lawrence seaway and power development, entitled "Canada Wants Action":

SEAWAY—CANADA WANTS ACTION

Like spring, the long-delayed Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway project was busting out all over Canada last week. Unlike spring, it brought no smiles to Canadian faces.

In London, Ontario, former Ontario Premier Gordon Conant said it was time to put the seaway on an "or else" basis, that Canadian newsprint, nickel, iron, and defense cooperation should be horse-traded for United States approval of the seaway. In Winnipeg, United States Ambassador Stanley Woodward salved Canada's slow burn with assurances of congressional approval and an early start. In Toronto, Ontario, Hydro Commission Chairman Robert Saunders suggested Woodward was talking through his hat. He disclosed that he had received discouraging news indicating no approval from Congress until 1952 at least.

History: For almost 20 years now, United States congressional committees have annually dragged a bill providing for the deep waterway and power development from its pigeonhole, blown the dust off, and exposed it to the public eye and the attacks of Washington's powerful antiseaway lobby of eastern United States railroad, canal, barge, port, and shallow-draft shipping interests. The bill then goes back into the pigeonhole.

As the House Public Works Committee closed hearings on the seaway this week, history seemed ready to repeat itself, and Canadians, who have been talking the project for half a century, were fed to the teeth. The seaway now promised to be the biggest break in Canadian-American relations since the Smoot-Hawley tariff.

Proponents of the seaway call it essential both for power and navigation; opponents call it boondoggling. New York State, Ontario, and Quebec—the three largest industrial basins on the continent—face power shortages. In Ontario, demand is running a phenomenal 25 percent higher than last year. For it and New York, the 2,200,000-horsepower potential of the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence is the only block of undeveloped power left.

Ore route: As for navigation: The last war was fought off Lake Superior's Mesabi Range—iron ore moved from the open-pit mines along a submarine-free route into Pittsburgh. But the Mesabi is drying up. The nearest new source is Ungava in northern Quebec. Deepening the present 14-foot ship channels in the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence to 27 feet would see millions of tons of iron ore laid down cheaply in Pittsburgh within 5 years.

United States Commerce Secretary Charles Sawyer, Charles Wilson, Dean Acheson, George C. Marshall, and Interior Secretary Oscar Chapman paraded these facts before the House committee without visible effect. Seaway opponents were more impressed with a statement from Chapman that Canada was preparing to proceed with an all-Canadian route, for which the United States would pay in tolls. The antiseaway lobby countered that Canada was bluffing. Saunders flew to Washington last week to assure committee members this was not the case.

Naval Aviation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLAUDE I. BAKEWELL
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. BAKEWELL. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, May 8, marked the fortieth anniversary of the establishment of naval aviation.

On May 8, 1911, the Navy Department, at the direction of the then Secretary of the Navy George von L. Meyer, of Boston, placed an order for the Navy's first two aircraft with the Curtiss Co., Hammondsport, N. Y. The date of that significant event has been chosen as the official birthdate of naval aviation.

How unimpressive a start for so important an element of our national defense. During World War II Navy aircraft flying from our mobile, fast-moving carriers were hammering at the Japanese homeland while our ground troops were still many hundreds of miles away. Our fast carrier task forces were able to hit the enemy from one spot and hit him again within 24 hours from another spot 800 miles away.

During World War II naval aircraft accounted for more than 2,333,597 tons of enemy shipping, including 172 Jap combat vessels, 62 German subs, and 447 merchant vessels. Our naval aircraft destroyed 15,401 enemy aircraft.

Naval aviation has given new mobility and new potency to sea power. Along with radar, aircraft have become the "eyes" of the fleet as well as its Sunday punch.

Mr. Speaker, time does not allow me to enumerate the heroes of naval aviation. They are too numerous. Their deeds of technical achievement and heroism are well known to a grateful citizenry. I hope that we may never become unmindful of them.

Naval aviation has many facets. Perhaps the feats of Navy land-based operations and the operations of flying boats at sea are not so well known as the achievements of carrier-based aircraft. But all are important. On this day we honor all naval aviators—whether they fly single-engine or multiengine aircraft, whether they fly from the deck of a carrier, from a land strip, or from the surface of the ocean itself.

Because of the ever-increasing size of multiengine, long-range bombers, the role of the seaplane or flying boat becomes more important. In order for them to operate against the enemy's homeland or in an enemy's home waters, it is not necessary first to build long and costly landing strips at advance bases. Seven-tenths of the earth's surface is water. The flying boat operates from water.

Then, too, there is the all-important job of protecting our shores and our shipping from enemy submarines. This is one of the jobs of naval aviation—both carrier-based and shore-based.

To the credit of naval aviation is a long list of technical accomplishments in aircraft development, operating techniques, and mechanical research. The Nation is incomparably stronger and the aviation industry more efficient because of naval aviation. And yet there are those who would have scuttled naval aviation. It was not so long ago that steps which would ultimately have had that effect were initiated. Fortunately for our national safety they were never consummated.

Once again in Korea naval aviation has proved its versatility and indispensability. Many of our ground troops fighting there are alive today because of the advanced techniques of close ground support developed, perfected, and practiced by Navy and Marine Corps pilots flying from Navy carriers.

Of particular pride to the Navy today is the efficiency of the air group attached to the carrier U. S. S. Boxer in Korean waters, flying daily strikes against the enemy. This unique air group is composed entirely of Naval Reserve aviators who, only a few weeks ago, were civilians. Most of the men are veterans of World War II who, after discharge, retained flight proficiency while members of the Navy's famed Weekend Warriors, flying with Reserve squadrons near their homes. Thus, when the Navy again needed their services, it took but a short period of indoctrination and the entire carrier air group was ready for combat.

In one branch of national defense we are paramount. No potential enemy or combination of potential enemies can at present challenge us in this proven and indispensible element of modern warfare: Naval aviation. Russia has a larger army than we have. China has more manpower. The nations behind the iron curtain are alleged to have an air force which equals ours. But no nation on the face of the earth possesses the versatile, effective, and proven weapon which is ours in naval aviation and the fast carrier task force. Our security as a nation demands that we retain that superiority. To diminish or dissipate it would not only be foolhardy; it would be fatal to our national defense.

So, Mr. Speaker, I think it fitting that we pause briefly today to pay a much-deserved tribute to the men of naval aviation, to the aircraft they fly and maintain, and to the ships they sail. Their achievements are legion and their heroism and ability second to none. To them and to their service, I say: Well done. Good sailing and happy landings.

The Late Honorable Thomas J. Halsey

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. O. K. ARMSTRONG
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Speaker, may I call respectful attention of the House of Representatives to the passing from mortal life of a former Member of this body, the Honorable Thomas J. Halsey, who represented the Sixth District of Missouri in the Seventy-first Congress. Mr. Halsey departed this life on March 17 at the home of his son, Herbert Halsey, at Westfield, N. J.

I am sure that Members of this body with whom the late Mr. Halsey served, will remember him as an industrious, kindly man. He was particularly interested in the problem of the farmers, since he was reared on a farm southeast of Holden, Mo. For most of his active life he was a merchant and businessman in Holden. For about 25 years he was associated with the Holden Mill & Elevator Co.

Congressman Halsey, whether in his brief public service or as a private citizen, had the respect and esteem of all his neighbors, his friends, and the wide circle of citizens who knew him.

A Star Descends

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLEVELAND M. BAILEY
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Charleston (W. Va.) Gazette of May 6, 1951:

A STAR DESCENDS

The MacArthur debate has revealed a contradictory and confusing side of Senator ROBERT A. TAFT that neither his admirers nor detractors believed he possessed.

The Ohio Senator was riding a high tide of public and political esteem before the general's dismissal. In the early stages of the tumult about MacArthur everyone generally overlooked and discounted thoughtless remarks made in the heat of the event. This included the "impeachment" cries which went up from the Republicans who look to TAFT for leadership.

No doubt Senator TAFT would have been the choice of a good many anti-Truman Democrats in 1948 had the Republicans chosen to nominate him instead of Dewey. TAFT's firmness of position in the past, his outspoken but usually fair views and his unimpeachable personal reputation were the kind of solid things all thinking Americans admire.

We have the suspicion that many Democrats outside of his home State of Ohio were secretly hoping that he would win reelection to the Senate in 1950. It seems a great many Democrats inside the State held the same opinions and voted that way judging by his great victory margin in that election. This he accomplished against great opposition.

In view of his former record, it is doubly strange to witness Senator TAFT's performance in the past several weeks.

Senator TAFT baldly declared that he opposed the United States entrance into Korea. He made the statement before the United States Chamber of Commerce in Washington a little more than 10 days ago.

This is much in variance with what he publicly stated a few days after President Truman's decision to send aid to South Korea.

On June 30, 1950, the Associated Press reported that "Senator TAFT offered unqualified support for the President's move." TAFT's own words in the news report were: "Once you are into anything like this, you must go all the way."

What has caused TAFT to change his mind? The answer is obvious. Senator TAFT has clutched the publicity appeal of the MacArthur furor and is hanging on for the political popularity ascent which he thinks it will bring him. How unlike the TAFT of former days.

Another backfire hit the Senator when he attempted to single out Secretary of State Acheson for sole blame in the MacArthur removal. While swinging that cudgel, Senator TAFT took a swipe at General Bradley in the process, alleging that Bradley and the Joint Chiefs of Staff were stooges of Acheson but that the whole debate resolved itself into an Acheson versus MacArthur fuss.

General MacArthur chilled that one by telling the Senate hearing, "I have never attributed to him (Acheson) in the slightest degree the decision of the President to replace me."

As to the Bradley angle, we can see nothing wrong with the Joint Chiefs of Staff and Acheson being in agreement on their global military and political policies. It would be a sad state of affairs if they were not.

Senator TAFT advocates full support of all of MacArthur's policies, including the use of Chiang Kai-shek's troops. Yet, the Senator in floor debate last week brought out the point that the Communists found Chiang's armies as soft as mush when Red Chinese forces invaded. Is there any reason to believe that the same troops aren't still soft as mush?

But the most hopeless sidestepping and backfilling was TAFT's demand that the mobilization budget be cut by $20,000,000 and draft target lowered by 500,000, while at the same time embarking the United States on all-out aggressive tactics against China. These steps Senator TAFT advocates while maintaining that we cannot be deterred by "any possibility that the Russians might come in."

This kind of thinking and these public utterances force us to recall Senator TAFT's foresight on August 1, 1941. On that day he said:

"I cannot understand that the situation is more perilous today than it was a year ago."

Four months later we were in World War II.

Problems of Civil Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address that I made on the evening of May 7, 1951, at the Civil Defense Conference in Washington, D. C., relating to the multitude of problems facing governors and mayors relating to putting into operation adequate civil-defense programs.

At that time I pledged my wholehearted support for further legislation and appropriations designed to make civil defense a sound and strong copartner with our military defense effort, and that so far as legislation and appropriations are concerned, the Federal Government should take the lead.

In an interview with the representatives of the American Municipal Association I further said:

That while its success starts with the individual and thus through our local and State government up to the Federal level, the Governors of our States and mayors of our cities are justified in looking to the Congress for leadership in this important field of defense of our national security and that they should depend upon my support in the Congress of the United States for any further legislation and additional appropriations necessary to protect our citizens against possible atomic attack.

My address follows:

ADDRESS BY HON. JOHN W. MCCORMACK, MAJORITY LEADER, UNITED STATES HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, AT CIVIL DEFENSE CONFERENCE, WASHINGTON, D. C., MAY 7, 1951

Congress has paid close attention to the grave and complex problems of civil defense which confront us as individuals and as a Nation.

Early in 1950 the Congress began its series of intensive hearings to get to the heart of the civil-defense problem that America must face if it is to survive in the event of another war in which atomic, biological, and chemical weapons may be used against us. During the course of these extended hearings by both the House and the Senate, a great deal of testimony was heard from many sources. The mayors and the Governors of several States gave us the best of their thinking on the problem as they see it. Representatives of the general public, atomic scientists, military experts, and the working staff of the executive branch of the Government on civil defense each contributed their share of testimony.

Once the Congress had grasped the magnitude of the problem that faces us in civil defense, it drew up a comprehensive law to meet the situation and our present danger. At the close of the last session of Congress, the Federal Civil Defense Act of 1950 was passed by both Houses of the Congress with but a single dissenting vote. This act granted wide powers to the Federal Civil Defense Administrator and his agency and established a basic formula for civil-defense operation from the Federal to the State and finally to the local governments. The almost unanimous passage of that act was unusually significant. It was firm evidence that the Congress recognized the great challenge of civil defense and its place in our security structure. But that recognition must be carried into active effect.

This Congress and the one preceding it have voted wisely many billions of dollars for military-defense purposes, primarily to carry on the undeclared war that resulted from the acts of aggression in Korea.

Congress has met the challenge that faces us by passing laws which place a number of restrictions on the people of the country and our economy. There will probably be more. You can be certain that such action as authority for price control, rationing, stockpiling, higher taxes, and all the rest would never have been passed by Congress unless it recognized the serious need for these actions. In the main these actions are directed at building up our state of military preparedness.

I would like to emphasize that all such actions and the billions we are spending for military defense are not complete, in fact, will be seriously impaired, unless we have civil defense as a coequal partner of the military in the security program.

Primarily, civil defense as it is planned and operated today is the preparedness program of the home front and for the home front as a link with our military services. It is a necessary part of our national defense, and of the self-preservation of our people and of our Nation.

It must be painfully evident that it would be incomplete to have the finest Army, Navy, and Air Force in the world and no adequate civil-defense program.

Since our cities will be the primary targets in an atomic war, they must be protected to the limits of our ability. We could lose a war in a hurry if the home front crumbled under the weight of an atomic attack. In any event, a sudden successful attack would place us at a serious disadvantage.

We must face the fact that totalitarian governments carry out the surprise attack; democracies do not.

For these reasons civil defense must take its place quickly in the minds of all of us as a sound and strong copartner with our military defense effort. If that fails to happen, we can pay a sorry price for it should war come again.

The American people should realize that the price we pay for preparedness, heavy as it may be, is the premium we pay for defense and protection in the event of war. It could be the premium we pay to avert war and to bring about peace.

We should pray and hope for the best, but prepare for the worst.

The attack, as we hope, may never come, but who can tell. Only Stalin.

It therefore follows as a matter of logic and necessity that we should prepare ourselves now.

Keep the Record Straight

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend his remarks, the gentleman from California [Mr. WERDEL] has inserted in the RECORD untruths, which he could not make, and did not make, on the floor of the House. I would most certainly rise to a point of personal privilege except for the fact that to do so would take up the time of the House for a personal matter, thereby delaying for that long the important legislation now scheduled for consideration. His remarks might be libelous if made without the cloak of official privilege, and I defy him to waive that privilege.

He has taken parts of articles and even parts of sentences out of context, thus distorting them by omission and innuendo—a device frequently employed by those who have no regard for truth. The remarks he made on the floor were full of untruths, but by using the privilege of revising and extending his remarks, he avoided the objection that every Member would have felt had such added and changed remarks been made in the presence of Members.

I would move to expunge the remarks of the gentleman, if it were not for the fact that I believe that they should remain in the RECORD as evidence of his manner of thinking and of his tactics. These tactics are becoming all too prevalent. But I can assure the gentleman they will not deter me from fighting for what I concede to be right, or against what I concede to be wrong. During the many years that I have been one of the primary targets of the Communists and other subversive elements in California, I have become accustomed to the type of "smear" now being attempted by the gentleman from California, who has no doubt had expert assistance in drafting his personal attack on me.

Every Member will note the gentleman has even stooped to the belittling of my military record, which includes 2 years in New Guinea in the Philippines, although he himself entered a political office for the first time in 1943, when to do so provided him with an exemption from the draft and the privilege of devoting almost all of his time to the practice of law, which we all know was exceptionally profitable during the war years when so many of us who were lawyers had voluntarily entered the Armed Forces. This is the gentleman who now heaps abuse upon our military leaders and those of us who served honorably under them.

In 1939 and 1940, while I was heading the California Legislature's investigation into subversive activities, and while the Communists and Nazis and their cohorts were using their smear tactics against me, and even holding threatening mass demonstrations in front of my home, I would like to inquire of the gentleman just what he was doing to stop the subversive forces in California. Did he fight as hard then as he did when he fought our enemies during the war from his sanctuary in the California Legislature?

Mr. Speaker, I have neither the time nor inclination to devote my energies to an explanation of what I think of the gentleman, who has obviously devoted much time and energy in an effort to personally vilify me, because of my exposé of the tactics he employed against our military leaders and our proposed national security training program, which has since been approved by our Committee on Armed Services and a majority of the Members of this House. I will simply say that the gentleman has resorted to untruths, and to demonstrate my point, I am asking that we include in our RECORD parts of an official report on Communist activities, which I wrote and filed with the California Legislature in 1940. I was, of course, flattered, as I believe anyone under the circumstances would be, when the Republican controlled 1950 legislature ordered my report reprinted for redistribution. The report, which I wrote 11 years ago, is the best refutation I know of to the untruths spoken by the gentleman. I ask that the following excerpts be included at this point:

REPORT OF ASSEMBLY RELIEF INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE ON SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES, HON. SAMUEL WILLIAM YORTY, CHAIRMAN

Mr. Speaker, your committee authorized and empowered by House Resolutions 9 and 29 to investigate subversive activities in the State relief administration respectfully reports as follows:

SECTION I

Fifth columns

The world has recently been shocked by the deadly effectiveness of subversive organizations working within such nations as Czechoslovakia, Austria, Poland, Spain, Denmark, Norway, Holland, and Belgium. Organizations of foreign-directed termites, commonly called fifth columns have demonstrated their ability to paralyze the defenses of victimized nations while cooperating with outside aggressors. It is evident that a relatively small organized force can render a whole nation helpless by coordinating its activities with forces driving from the outside.

The great masses of the people are always completely unarmed and unorganized. When confronted with an organized and disciplined group, they find themselves helpless. The Communist, or Bolshevik Party, has already demonstrated the ability of a small organized group to overthrow a government when that government is in a state of crisis resulting from either internal conditions, or the necessity of defending itself against outside forces. It is difficult to realize that the Russian branch of the Communist Party had a membership that included only an infinitesimal part of the population of Russia, when it successfully captured control of the government of that country and commenced its dictatorial domination over millions of Russian people. Those who scoff at the dangers of Communist activity in this country unknowingly befriend persons engaged in a treasonable conspiracy, because such scoffing tends to lull the populace into a state of false security which hinders effective work calculated to stop the march of fifth columns.

Communism versus Americanism

The Communist Party is bent upon overthrowing the American Government in order to substitute a dictatorship for our democracy. These traitors probably do not have the power to accomplish this objective today without outside assistance. But they are preparing to strike whenever we face a crisis of sufficient gravity to weaken our resistance. As part of our national defense we must stop them before they are able to attain sufficient strength to accomplish their objectives.

Stalin and Hitler

Protected on the east by an alliance with Stalin, Hitler's hordes have been freed to concentrate on the destruction of once peaceful and independent republics. If Hitler and Stalin can destroy the democracies of Europe, there is grave danger that their lust for power may soon attempt to span the Atlantic. In this event, it is imperative that we face these hordes free from the treachery of traitorous Nazi and Communist termites who would not hesitate to stab us in the back and our defenses from the inside. The fate of nations like Norway and Denmark should teach us the necessity of curbing treasonable conspiracies existing within our country.

Duty of Americans

Those who believe in democracy have a right, and it is their duty, to defend that democracy from enemies both within and without. Those who believe in the Constitution of the United States have a right, and a duty, to see to it that subversive groups are not permitted to subvert constitutional rights, in order to bring about their destruction. The Communists and Nazis, who are today screaming for protection of their constitutional rights are at the same time completely ignoring the obligations which such rights entail; namely, the duty of protecting and upholding the Government provided for in the Constitution. Those who demand protection under the Constitution in good faith should be willing to support the entire Constitution, rather than to pick out and support only the provisions of which they approve, and under which they claim privileges.

In the SRA

Your committee has been amazed at the extent of Communist infiltration into the State relief administration. Under the cloak of this branch of State government, Communists have found their way into widely separated areas of the State. In these areas, they are engaged in carrying out a well-planned scheme to undermine State government. Some of the strategy employed by them is quite apparent. It follows very closely the pattern laid down by the founders of the Communist Party and it parallels to a great degree the strategy of the Communist Party in Russia—with allowances made for the differences in the problems faced by the party because of the differences in the two nations.

In the Communist Party Manual on Organization, hereafter referred to as the Manual, Comrade J. Peters said:

"As the leader and organizer of the proletariat, the Communist Party of the United States of America leads the working class in the fight for the revolutionary overthrow of capitalism, for the establishment of the dictatorship of the proletariat, for the establishment of a socialistic Soviet republic in the United States, for the complete abolition of classes, for the establishment of socialism, the first stage of the classless Communist society. * * * Our party realizes that certain conditions must exist before the outworn capitalistic system can be overthrown. What are the conditions? Comrade Lenin answers this question, '* * * for revolution it is essential, first, that a majority of the workers (or at least a majority of the class-conscious, thinking, politically active workers) should fully understand the necessity for revolution and be ready to sacrifice their lives for it; secondly, that the ruling classes be in a state of governmental crisis which draws even the most backward masses into politics, * * * weakens the government and makes it possible for the revolutionaries to overthrow it rapidly'."

Crisis awaited

The Communist Party is simply awaiting a crisis. Through its efforts in the State relief administration, it is endeavoring to aggravate the present conditions brought about by unemployment in California and in the Nation. It is attempting to do this by maliciously endeavoring to increase relief costs to such an extent that taxpayers will be unable to carry the burden, and all relief will thereby be jeopardized. Under the guise of aiding the needy, the Communists are actually carrying out this program calculated to eventually deny relief to the destitute. They want to cause unbearable suffering. Such suffering is useful to them in their revolutionary agitation.

Dominated by Russia

It is evident that the Communist Party is not endeavoring to engage merely in the advocacy of the theories of socialism or communism. It is rather determined to force its will upon a majority of the people of the United States, whether or not they are ever willing to accept it. Instead of being an advocate of mere theories, the Communist Party is part of an international organization dominated by Russia, and bound to carry on activity beneficial to that nation, irrespective of the effects such activity may have upon the nation in which the party members live, and to which they pretend to give allegiance.

The international character of the Communist Party is well outlined in a Communist Party membership book for the year 1933. The first paragraph in said book reads as follows:

"A member of the party can be every person from the age of 18 up who accepts the program and statutes of the Communist International and the Communist Party of the United States of America, who becomes a member of a basic organization of the party, who is active in this organization, who subordinates himself to all decisions of the Comintern and of the party, and regularly pays his membership dues."

This official party book demonstrates very well the fact that the Communist Party is not an ordinary political organization. It is, rather, a disciplined army of "termites." In describing the principles upon which the party is founded, the book says:

"Acceptance and carrying out of the decisions of the higher party committees by the lower, strict party discipline, and immediate and exact applications of the decisions of executive committee of the Communist International and of the central committee of the party. * * *

"After a decision has been adopted at the congress of the Comintern, the party convention, or by the leading party committee it must be carried out unconditionally, even if some of the members or some of the local organizations are not in agreement with the decision. * * *

"The strictest party discipline is the most solemn duty of all party members and all party organizations. * * *

"He who weakens, no matter how little, the iron discipline of the party of the proletariat (especially during the period of dictatorship), effectively helps the bourgeoisie against the proletariat" (Lenin).

In this same official book under the heading, "What is the Communist Party?" appears the following:

"It incorporates the whole body of experience of the proletarian struggle, basing itself upon the revolutionary theory of Marxism and representing the general and lasting interests of the whole of the working class, the party personifies the unity of proletarian principles, of proletarian will, and of proletarian revolutionary action." (From the program of the Communist International.)

An army on the march

The party manual referred to above also discusses discipline under the heading, "Why do the Communists attach so much importance to discipline?" It says:

"How can an army fight against the army of the enemy if every soldier in the army is allowed to question and even disobey orders of his superior officers? What would happen in a war if, for example, the general staff orders an attack and one section of the army decides to obey and goes into battle; another thinks it is wrong to attack the enemy at the time and stays away from the battle; and a third section decides to quit the trenches and retreat to another position instead of going forward?

"Let us take an example from the class struggle. The district committee decided that a demonstration should be held against police terror and gives directions to the sections to mobilize the whole membership to get the greatest possible number of workers to the demonstration. The date and place of the demonstration are set by the district committee. One section, after receiving the decisions, works out plans to mobilize the masses, and activizes the whole section to work for the demonstration. Another section does not think the issue is very important and neglects to mobilize the membership; a third section decides that the time set by the committee is not the best one and instructs its members to mobilize at a later hour; and a fourth section decides to come at an earlier hour. What kind of a demonstration would it be? What would workers think and say about such a party?

"Our party cannot lead the masses if there is not unity in action. Unity of will and action can be achieved only if all of the members of the party act as one—are disciplined. If each party member should decide which decision of the party he wanted to carry out; if each member would carry out only those decisions which he liked and ignored those with which he disagreed, it would be impossible to lead the masses in a struggle against capitalism. An army with that kind of leadership would be defeated."

Too much emphasis cannot be placed upon the fact that the Communist Party describes itself as a disciplined army bound to follow the program given to it by the Communist International irrespective of the nature of that program. This is completely unlike the American concept of political parties. It explains the meaning of the term "fifth column," which accurately describes the fact that the disciplined army working within a nation, is an integral part of that army of invasion, with whom it is bound to cooperate when directed to do so. This Communist discipline, when understood, explains the success of the Communist Party in organizing demonstrations such as that fostered by Labor's Non-Partisan League and the Workers Alliance in Sacramento on February 25, 1940.

Workers Alliance demonstration

There is no doubt that the so-called Workers Alliance march on the State capitol was, in reality, a Communist political demonstration, of the type used by the Communists, as part of the revolutionary training of the masses. Evidence adduced before the committee establishes the fact that letters directing Workers Alliance members to march on the capitol were sent out from the State office and signed by the State president of the Workers Alliance, Mr. Alex Noral, who not only admitted his membership in the Communist Party, but also exhibited his official membership book. This is only one concrete example of the disciplined activity of many similar Communist-organized and directed demonstrations, which have been prevalent in California in recent years. It is worthy of note here, that similar demonstrations were employed to protest lay-offs of unnecessary SRA personnel, by the Communist-controlled union to which many members of the relief staff belong.

Deception used

The Communist Party is today endeavoring to deceive the American people into believing that the party is not international in character, foreign directed, or planning to overthrow the American Government by force and violence. The Communists are afraid that legislation may be passed by the National Congress outlawing all political groups advocating force and violence as a means for bringing about changes in government. Therefore, the deceptive strategy of the Communist Party is aimed toward making it appear that the Communist Party does not fall within that classification.

Many fooled

Many people have been fooled by this Communist scheme because of their failure to realize that the party is a disciplined army of termites. This army, at any given time, may not advocate immediate revolution, because its whole strategy is directed toward building organizations from undercover until sufficient strength is attained, to make success of forcible action practically certain. The fundamental principles of the Communist Party are not always divulged to new recruits, unless they have responded to discipline and Communist education to such an extent, that they can be trusted to keep concealed the revolutionary intent of the Party. Your committee has heard the testimony of former Communists, some of whom were in the party only a short time, and never fully understood its true purposes. Others were heard who ranked high enough in the Party to be informed relative to its real, underlying, revolutionary character.

The whole history of the Communists proves that they would never hesitate to lie in stating their immediate or ultimate objectives, just as the termites in Denmark, Norway, Sweden, and Belgium pretended to give allegiance to their governments before the day for open betrayal arrived. Such termites in America are lying and hiding their real intent. They are awaiting an opportune moment to execute their nefarious schemes by sabotaging our defenses, or seizing control of our Government.

The "History of the Communist Party, of the Soviet Union (Bolsheviks)," edited by a Commission of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, and authorized by the Central Committee of the Communist Party, shows very clearly that the Bolsheviks have never hesitated to make use of illegal methods or any manner of deception. It should be remembered that the Communist Party is part of the same international group which called itself the Bolsheviks when plotting the Russian Revolution.

In the official history, the following quotation makes this point clear:

"Lenin proposed that the Party of the Bolsheviks should be called the Communist Party, which was the name given by Marx and Engels to their party. This name was scientifically correct, for it was the ultimate aim of the Bolshevik Party to achieve communism."

Even the present Communist Party constitution in which much deceptive working is employed to set forth the ostensible intent of the Communist Party reads as follows:

"That is, by the establishment of socialism according to the scientific principles enunciated by the greatest teachers of mankind, Marx, Engels, Lenin, and Stalin, embodied in the Communist International."

Some parts of this constitution can only be understood by one who has studied Communist strategy. For instance, in the constitution of the Communist Party, the preamble says:

"It is devoted to defense of the immediate interests of workers, farmers, and all toilers against capitalist exploitation and the preparation of the working class for its historic mission to unite and lead the American people to extend these democratic principles to their necessary and logical conclusions."

To understand this language one would have to know that the Communists teach that the historic mission of the working class is to lead a revolution for the purpose of establishing a dictatorship of the proletariat. Such dictatorship is to the Communists, "the necessary and logical conclusion."

Vigilance needed

During this period of world crisis, it is most important that the American people be not lulled into a tolerance of Communist organizations by their false claims of devotion to American democracy. America is a capitalist country in which citizens have a right to own their own homes and other property which they may acquire legally and hold subject to the right of Government to levy taxes upon such property, or to take it for public purposes by paying compensation therefor. The Communist Party advocates the destruction of all capitalist countries. In order to destroy capitalism, they feel justified in setting up a dictatorship and in ruthlessly stamping out all persons who disagree with them by murderous purges or otherwise.

Communist theory

The official history of the party referred to above and hereafter referred to as the official history, discusses the Communist attitude toward revolution in the following language:

"Marx and Engels discovered the laws of development of capitalist society and proved scientifically that the development of capitalist society and the class struggle going on within it, must inevitably lead to the fall of capitalism, to the victory of the proletariat, to the dictatorship of the proletariat.

"Marx and Engels taught that it was impossible to get rid of the power of capital and to convert capitalist property into public property by peaceful means and the working class could achieve this only by revolutionary violence against the bourgeoisie by a proletarian revolution, by establishing its own political rule—the dictatorship of the proletariat—which must crush the resistance of the exploiters and create a new, classless, Communist society."

This is the theory upon which the Russian dictatorship was established and upon which the Communists justify the total destruction of all rights of free speech, press, assemblage, and religion in Russia.

Would destroy Constitution

Today we find the Communist termites in America demanding the right to use privileges guaranteed by the American Constitution, in order to work for the destruction of our Constitution and the right that it gives all of us, to disagree at all times with our Government, so long as we express our disagreement in a manner within the framework of the Constitution. The Communists yell loudly for their constitutional rights. They completely ignore the fact that exercise of these rights necessarily places upon one the duty of defending the Constitution, and the American Government against its enemies—both within and without the Nation.

The Communists in Russia tolerate no difference of opinion and they would tolerate no difference here, if allowed to seize power. They justify such intolerance on the grounds that they know they are right. But our American form of government is based upon the tolerance of disagreements, that are expressed peaceably in campaigns calculated to win the support of a majority of the people. Those successful in attaining power in our Government are nevertheless bound to defend the rights of others to differ with them, so long as no forcible effort is made by those who disagree, to impose their will upon the majority in the manner advocated by the Communist Party.

In the official history, the following quotation illustrated the Communist attitude in Russia toward the liberties which they demand in America:

"In order to consolidate the Soviet power, the old, bourgeois state machine had to be shattered and destroyed and a new, Soviet state machine set up in its place. Further, it was necessary to destroy the survivals of this division of society into estates and the regime of national oppression, to abolish the privileges of the church, to suppress the counterrevolutionary press, and counterrevolutionary organizations of all kinds, legal and illegal, and to dissolve the bourgeois constituent assembly."

In the above quotation, the term "counterrevolutionary," referred to the activity of those who opposed the Bolshevik Revolution.

Under Communist government where the state is everything, and the individual nothing, government is not restrained by the necessity of collecting taxes from the population in order to carry on its activities. There is no balance between public and private ownership.

There is no right to strike under Communist government because strikes are considered acts against the government. This fact is completely ignored and concealed by the Communists who work within the American labor movement telling workers that a Communist government would be beneficial to them. Political demonstrations such as those organized by Communists in this country would not be tolerated by a Communist government. Such demonstrations would be classed as counterrevolutionary, and persons found engaging in them would be promptly and effectively liquidated.

Communist hypocrisy

These examples of the destruction of individual rights under the Communist government of Russia, are set forth here to direct attention to the hypocrisy of the Communists and their accomplices in this country, who set themselves up as the guardians of American civil liberties and constitutional rights. The framers of the Constitution never intended that it be interpreted, so as to grant a license to destroy the Government, to tools of foreign aggressors. The right to rely on the Constitution for protection should include the obligation to use the privileges granted by it in good faith—and good faith is something the Communists cannot honestly claim.

The sugar-coated program of progressive reforms openly advocated by the Communist Party is simply a flypaper calculated to win support from the unwary in order to lead them down the road of desecration and destruction which is communism. The same tactics were used in Russia by the Bolsheviks. Their official history says at one point:

"The petition was discussed at workers' meetings where amendments were made. Bolsheviks spoke at these meetings without openly announcing themselves as such. Under their influence, the petition was supplemented by demands for freedom of press, freedom of speech, freedom of association for workers * * * an 8-hour day."

Of course, these demands were made before the Communists seized control over the government and stamped out all of the rights of others which they had so vociferously demanded for themselves.

Fear of reprisals

Few persons who have left the Communist Party have had the courage to speak out against it. This results from fear of reprisals by the comrades who have no respect for laws. This results also, from the fact that persons who have left the Communist Party are often so ashamed of ever having been part of it, that they fear exposure. In this regard it is interesting to note that the Communists, themselves, hold the threat of exposure over their members at all times, as a matter of discipline. The Communist constitution says on this point, "or members whose actions are detrimental to the party and the working class, shall be summarily dismissed from positions of responsibility, expelled from the party and exposed before the general public."

Communists in the State relief administration have used as a smoke screen for their activities a CIO union called the State, County, and Municipal Workers of America. Such use of legal organizations is an old tactic of the Communist Party. By hiding behind what appears to be a labor organization, and by using as "fronts" non-Communists led into such an organization, they are able to screen their activities. The Communists then endeavor to make it appear that attacks on them are attacks on a labor union.

Communists control SCMWA

Your committee knows that the leadership of this SRA group is communistic. In order to deny this fact, when questioned before the committee, these leaders would have to perjure themselves. For this reason, they devised the strategy of hiring attorneys, in every case either Communists or known sympathizers, who in purporting to represent the best interests of all members of the so-called union, made it clear to all of them that they should not answer questions relative to communism. This meant that Communists and non-Communists alike, who were members of the so-called union, would refuse to answer questions relative to communism. This saved the Communists from the necessity of being the only ones forced to refuse to answer in order to escape exposure or possible prosecution for perjury. Non-Communists were thus used as a screen.

The record shows that your committee constantly advised members of this Communist-controlled organization, that if they were not Communists they should answer the questions frankly and not be dupes for Communist hoodlums. But the typical Communist discipline was already so well inculcated into the minds of the members of this organization, that only a few had the courage to defy their leaders by stating to the committee that they were not Communists, and they did not believe in communism. Those who did testify were dismissed from the union for so doing. In contrast to the attitude of the disciplined members of this so-called union were all of the other witnesses who came before the committee, in every case without attorneys, and in every case with a willingness to answer questions put by the committee relative to communism.

Communist infiltration

This analysis of the Communist tactics employed in Russia when their status was comparable to their current status in the United States, explains the presence of Communists in so many American legal organizations formed to foster progressive reforms. This shows, also, that the interest of the Communists in these organizations is not an honest interest in the things for which the organizations stand, but rather, a desire to use the opportunity afforded by work within such groups, to establish contacts helpful in the dissemination of agitational propaganda, used by the Communists in preparation for the overthrow of our Government.

In a further discussion of this tactic, the official history says:

"In this difficult period, the Bolsheviks set an example of how legal work should be combined with illegal work.

"It is evident that that example is being followed by the Communist gangsters in the United States today through their activities in the SCMWA and similar groups."

The official history said further:

"The Bolsheviks wanted to create a new party, a Bolshevist party, which would serve as a model for all who wanted to have a real revolutionary Marxist party."

It is also evident that this model is now being copied by the Stalinists in the United States. At another point in the official history in describing illegal activity the following appears:

"The conference noted that the most important rule of Bolshevik tactics in periods of retreat, namely, to combine illegal work with legal work within the various legally existing workers societies and unions, was being observed in all localities."

Communist newspaper

One of the important phases of Communist activity is the publication of a newspaper for purposes other than mere dissemination of news. The confidential Communist Party Guide issued from the State headquarters in California described the People's World as the Communist newspaper of California. The official history quotes Lenin as saying:

"A newspaper is not only a collective propagandist and collective agitator, but also a collective organizer."

In publishing the People's World the California Communists demonstrate once more the fact that they are simply following the pattern laid down by Lenin and others, and successfully followed by the Bolsheviks in Russia. As a matter of agitation the People's World often writes articles describing suicides by the unemployed. Of course, it always blames lack of work for these actions, whether or not the actual facts so indicate. Just as you would expect, the official history in describing the work of the Bolshevik paper, Pravda, said:

"Pravda often reported cases of suicide of unemployed and starving workers who had lost all hope of ever finding jobs again."

Another statement by the Communists in their official history showing the importance they attach to a newspaper and the uses they can make of it is very interesting:

"Pravda helped to organize the mass actions of the proletariat at the time of a big lock-out in St. Petersburg in the spring of 1914. When it was expedient to declare a mass strike, Pravda called upon the workers to resort to other forms of struggle such as mass meetings in the factories and demonstrations in the states. This could not be stated openly in the newspaper, but the cause was understood by class-conscious workers when they read an article by Lenin bearing the modest title, 'Forms of the Working Class Movement,' and stating at the given moment strikes should yield place to a higher form of working-class movement * * * which meant a call to organize meetings and demonstrations.

"In this way, the illegal revolutionary activities of the Bolsheviks were combined with legal forms of agitation and organization of the masses of the workers through Pravda. * * *

"Pravda stood in the center of the struggle for the party principle, for the building up of a mass working-class revolutionary party. Pravda rallied all the legally existing organizations around the illegal centers of the Bolshevik Party and directed the working-class movement toward one definite aim * * * preparation for revolution * * * in the Pravda editorial office was concentrated a large share of the organizational work of the party; here meetings were arranged with representatives from party nuclei; here reports were received of party work in the mills and factories; and from here were transmitted the instructions of the St. Petersburg committee and the central committee of the party."

Pravda of California

Evidence adduced before your committee together with an analysis of articles appearing in the People's World shows conclusively that this Communist propaganda organ is simply the Pravda of the California Communists. It is doing the identical work here that Pravda did in the preparation for the Russian revolution. Communist Party members are constantly admonished to support and obtain subscriptions for this Communist propaganda paper.

The People's World was much in evidence around the offices of the State relief administration investigated by your committee. Members of the SRA staff openly solicited subscriptions for it during working hours. It was posted on the bulletin board daily in some offices, and in others, copies were left on tables where they could be conveniently picked up by members of the staff.

During the hearings of your committee, this Communist paper printed scurrilous attacks upon members of the committee. It consistently distorted the facts and resorted to deliberate lies. The committee found that a large percentage of the members of the SRA Communist-controlled union subscribed to this paper. Some of them testified before the committee that they considered it the only truthful paper in California—and this in spite of the fact that the People's World acclaimed the Russian invasion of Finland. It clumsily changed its policy to pro-Hitlerism when the Stalin-Hitler alliance was made, although before the alliance it was loud in its condemnation of the Nazis.

Attack preparedness

The People's World has recently devoted much space to attacks on the American preparedness program and the work of J. Edgar Hoover. To find such a subversive newspaper openly and widely supported by members of the State relief administration staff affiliated with the SCMWA is shocking and disgusting. No one not sympathetic with the Communists could read this propaganda sheet without resenting the rank distortion to which it stoops. It is not a newspaper in the American sense at all. It is the central organ in California of the international gangsters in the Communist Party.

Subversive organizations have been greatly aided in carrying out their international conspiracy in this country by the laxity of our laws, designed to curb treason and foreign espionage. Law-enforcement agencies are the hated enemy of subversive groups. They constantly carry on a campaign for the purpose of discrediting all agencies of Government created to check on subversive groups.

The successful sabotage of European democracies by these international gangsters has caused our National Government to invoke the services of the G-men in the Department of Justice, in order to ascertain the extent of plans for sabotage or overthrow of the American Government. The FBI under Mr. J. Edgar Hoover is a department of which every American is proud. Nothing could be more reassuring to patriotic Americans than knowing that the G-men are on the trail of the international gangsters working here in America. On the other hand, nothing could strike more fear into the hearts of subversive elements than being cognizant of surveillance by Mr. Hoover's G-men. In view of these facts, it is not surprising that in recent months the Communists have embarked upon a scurrilous smear campaign, intended to discredit J. Edgar Hoover and the Department of Justice.

Smear methods

As is usual with these despicable vermin, they are not attacking Mr. Hoover on the grounds that he is checking on subversive activities, but rather they are pretending to see in his work an attack on labor unions. In other words, the subversive groups are once more attempting to hide behind American labor, once more proclaiming that their civil liberties are in jeopardy, once more screaming that constitutional rights are being violated, once more conducting a typical scheming, underhanded smear campaign, all of which is planned to do just one thing—that is to carry out the Communist program of smearing everyone, and every organization that conducts a fight against their subversive machinations.

Naturally the Communist-controlled SRA union has been called upon to do its part in the "smear Hoover" campaign. The fact that this campaign originated with the Communist Party is not open to doubt. Every piece of Communist literature published in recent months has carried analogous attacks on the FBI. For instance, a May Day pamphlet recently issued from the National Communist Party office in New York said:

"The Bill of Rights is being trampled under foot by the Dies Committee and FBI. Attempts are made to curb and cripple the trade unions. Antiwar fighters, especially the Communists, are being persecuted and jailed."

Another Communist May Day pamphlet written by Louis Budenz says:

"In Detroit the plug-uglies of J. Edgar Hoover—who learned his lessons from the strike-breaker and labor spy, William J. Burns—have shown their true, hideous faces."

* * * * *

False peace stand

In recent months, the Communists have endeavored to maintain connections with the masses by setting themselves up as the champions for peace. Any thinking person should easily see through this smoke screen. The Communists are yelling for peace because this offers a convenient method for carrying on propaganda against the Allies and in favor of the Hitler-Stalin Alliance.

They have hit upon a clever slogan, "The Yanks are not coming." This slogan is being publicized in practically all Communist literature just as is the attack on the FBI. Under the guise of a demand for peace, the Communists are fighting the American preparedness program which has the support of all informed and patriotic Americans. The subversive groups want to keep America weak. They would like to see us fall prey to the Hitler or Stalin war machines. They would like to see us unable to defend ourselves if attacked by their international gangster cohorts. They would like to keep us unable to prevent sabotage perpetrated from the inside. They would like to see America make the same mistake, that many nations of Europe made, when they sought peace through unpreparedness.

Unfortunately many Americans are today being fooled by the fake peace propaganda of the Communists. As part of their program the Communists are carrying on a vicious attack against President Roosevelt in which they condemn him for being more friendly to the Allies than to Hitler. As usual, the Communists pretend to see in the realistic and necessary American preparedness program, an attack on labor unions. In fact, this subversive group, which has reduced lying and deception to a fine art, can be expected to find an attack on labor unions in most anything. So the "Yanks are not coming" and "Stop Roosevelt's war policies" are being added to the current slogans of the international gangsters.

In the People's World handbill favoring the Patterson slate referred to above, among the charges against the New Deal are the following:

"Tremendous boost in war appropriations; sale of military secrets and airplanes to Allies; Roosevelt administration no longer neutral—assists Allies."

If Stalin and Hitler were being assisted they would not complain.

Cripple legitimate unions

An official Communist May Day circular offers a fine example of propaganda condemning American aid to Finland, and showing the utilization of the slogan, "The Yanks are not coming" by this group:

"Under the hypocritical slogans of neutrality and aid to the democracies by methods short of war, big business and the Roosevelt government have lifted the arms embargo, and turned America into an arms factory for the Allies, opposing the ending of war, and doing everything in their power to spread it. Through this and similar measures such as loans to Finland and the Scandinavian countries, through diplomatic intervention and other aid to the Finnish White Guards, American imperialism has already taken a long step toward dragging the American people into war. * * * Attempts are being made to curb and cripple the trade-unions. Antiwar fighters, especially the Communists, are being persecuted and jailed. * * * The workers organized in the CIO, AFL, and railroad brotherhoods, the young people through the American Youth Congress, the toiling farmers, and the Negro people through the militant organizations, are daily expressing their opposition to the war and hunger program. The slogan, 'The Yanks are not coming' has become the rallying cry of millions."

A strikingly similar combination of the slogan "The Yanks are not coming" with the anti-Finnish propaganda is contained in a SCMWA bulletin. This bulletin also contains the typical Communist propaganda against the Allies. It says:

"'The Yanks are not coming' was the slogan selected by the 117 official delegates from 53 counties. * * * Britain and France's encouragement of the invasions of China, Ethiopia, Albania, Czechoslovakia, and Poland, and their nonintervention in Spain, indicates that the ruling classes are not particularly interested in maintaining democracy. The recent great amount of propaganda about Finland and the contributions of Italy, England, and other nations, of planes and credits to that nation, did not stem from love of democracy but from the desire of capitalist nations to provoke a war against the Soviet Union, a Socialist nation."

SRA Communists

The Communist group in SRA has flooded the State offices with propaganda following the Communist Party line. In fact, the State relief administration has apparently become a spearhead of the entire Communist propaganda campaign in California. This phase of the so-called union's activity will be considered again below.

SECTION II

The chameleonic Communist Party line ofttimes results in a change of immediate policy, but the long time objective, namely, the setting up of a dictatorship, never changes. The necessity of making changes to coordinate with new policies of Soviet Russia is a great handicap to the Communist Party consistency. During the years when the Communists regarded the Nazis as enemies of Soviet Russia, they propagandized against the Nazis and organized groups such as the Hollywood Anti-Nazi League through which to carry on such activity. The People's World and other organs of the party during this period could not think of vile enough names to call Adolf Hitler. In an official Los Angeles County Communist publication issued in commemoration of the twentieth anniversary of the Los Angeles County Communist organization, and written before the Hitler-Stalin pact, the following statement appears:

"In the name of the Communist Party of the United States, Earl Browder and William C. Foster, general secretary and chairman, respectively, have written to President Roosevelt and to all Members of the Congress of the United States, pledging the party support of President Roosevelt's peace policies as approved by the majority of the American people."

At another point in the same publication, it says:

"In this period of war crisis, when Hitler and the Munichmen are spreading their hideous destruction, the military defense of our country becomes a key factor for national security."

The program of the Communists as set forth in this publication listed as its twelfth plank the following:

"Full official city and county support of President Roosevelt's peace policy of collective security, cooperation of all local law-enforcement bodies with Federal services for detection and prosecution of all agents and spies of Nazi, Japanese, and other Fascist governments in local aircraft and fishing industries."

The ink was hardly dry on this publication when the Hitler-Stalin pact was signed. During their campaign against the Nazis, the Communists had believed that Soviet Russia would conclude a pact with the Allies against Hitler. When the world was stunned by the agreement between Hitler and Stalin, the Communists fumbled for several days without knowing how to explain the unexpected turn of events calling for the formulation of an entirely new party line.

Stalin-Nazi switch

Stalin had given Hitler the assurance he needed against attacks from the east, in order to make it possible for him to start his campaign of destruction against the Scandinavian countries and the small republics to the west. In explaining their change of attitude toward the Nazis, after the pact was signed, the Communists reached the zenith of hypocrisy. The Russian Commissar of Foreign Affairs in addressing the supreme Soviet of the U. S. S. R., said:

"It is our duty to think of the interests of the Soviet people, the interests of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics * * *. Only when it became clear to us that the German Government desired to change its foreign policy so as to secure an improvement in the relations with the U. S. S. R. was the basis found for the conclusion of a Soviet-German nonaggressive pact. Everybody knows that during the last 6 years, ever since the Nationalist Socialists (Nazis) came into power, political relations between Germany and the U. S. S. R. have been strained * * *. Exposing the hullabaloo raised in the British, French, and American press about Germany's plans for the seizure of the Soviet Ukraine, Stalin said, 'It looks as if the purpose of this suspicious hullabaloo was to incense the Soviet Union against Germany, to poison the atmosphere and to provoke a conflict with Germany without any visible ground.' * * * We have always stood for amity between the peoples of U. S. S. R. and Germany for the growth and development of friendship between the peoples of the Soviet Union and the German people. * * * Is it really difficult to understand that the U. S. S. R. is pursuing and will continue to pursue its own independent policy, based upon the interests of the peoples of the U. S. S. R. and only their interests? * * * This pact not only eliminates the menace of a war with Germany, narrows down the zone of possible hostilities in Europe, and serves thereby the cause of universal peace; it must open to us new possibilities of increasing our strength."

No greater batch of lies was ever concocted by the Stalinists than those used in their attempt to justify the Hitler-Stalin pact, and the changes in their propaganda and policies, made necessary thereby. It is difficult to imagine such a brazen liar as was Stalin when he accused Americans of trying to provoke war between Russia and Germany. The fact of the matter was, that his gangsters in this country were busy conducting Nazi campaigns because they feared a possible plan of Adolf Hitler to drive to the east, which drive was described, by Hitler, in his book, Mein Kampf, and which was most certainly not an invention of the American press, as claimed by Stalin.

Molotov's lies

Hypocrisy, Communist style, bristles also in Molotov's claim that the Communists always stood for friendship between Germany and Russia. Molotov told the truth when he mentioned the previously existing strained relations between Russia and Germany. It was obviously these strained relations that caused the Stalinists in this country to carry on an anti-Nazi campaign in the interests of the Soviet Union. It was the end of these strained relations, and the Hitler-Stalin Pact, that caused the Stalinists in America to completely change their position by commencing attacks against American preparedness measures, and also by condemning as "unneutral," those who continued to denounce Hitler, just as the Stalinists did before the pact. This change of policy on their part was brought about solely in the interest of the Stalinist dictatorship even though such interest is directly adverse to the national safety of this country. Molotov lied again when he said the pact was in the interest of universal peace. He knew that the real purpose of the pact was to give Hitler the protection he needed in the east, to permit him to turn his destructive efforts in another direction.

The awkward change of the Communist policy in this country brought about by the Hitler-Stalin Pact is also exemplified in their change of heart relative to Federal investigation of Nazi and Fascist spies. Since the pact has made the Communist and Nazi termites in this country part of the same "fifth column," they now stand together in a campaign to smear the counterespionage work of the FBI which the Communists themselves advocated before the pact. All of these examples add to the abundance of evidence, showing that the allegiance of the Communist Party members is not to the United States. They demonstrate the danger and the foolishness involved in permitting such foreign directed agents to carry on their poison propaganda under the cloak of official positions in the State relief administration. They show the impossibility of relying upon their stated or pretended intentions in determining the real nature of their program.

Not long ago, the Communists carried on an extensive campaign in favor of lifting the embargo on the shipment of arms to Loyalist Spain, giving as their reason the fact that a small nation was being invaded by outside forces. But when the United States proposed to help Finland and to lift the embargo on shipments of arms to the Allies, the Communists scurried to form peace councils for the purpose of denouncing everyone as "unneutral" who advocated the same changes in the statutes which the Communists advocated before the Hitler-Stalin Pact.

Compulsory military training

Another example of Communist hypocrisy is their attitude toward compulsory military training in the United States. In the official history of the party, referred to above, describing some of the measures taken by the Bolsheviks in Russia after they seized power, the following appears:

"Therefore the Congress considered it the fundamental task of the party (Communist) to adopt the most energetic and resolute measures to strengthen the self-discipline and discipline of the workers and peasants, to prepare the masses for self-sacrificing defense of the Socialist country, to organize the Red army and to introduce universal military training."

It is quite apparent that the Communists advocate military training for Russians because they want Russia to be strong. They denounce military training in America because they want America to be weak.

The Communists are now condemning American foreign policy as imperialistic. The proposal of some United States Senators that we purchase certain islands near the Canal Zone is labeled "an imperialistic scheme" by the Stalinists. The sale of arms to the Allies is condemned as a program of the American imperialists. The United States is placed on their list of hated imperialistic nations. As an indication of what might be expected from Communists in this country in case we were compelled to defend ourselves against Stalin or his pal, Hitler, one needs only to turn again to the official history of the Communist Party for a statement of its attitude toward what it terms, "an imperialistic country." It should also be borne in mind that the United States is classed as a bourgeois nation in Communist terminology.

The official history says:

"In opposition to the Menshevik and Socialist revolutionary policy of defending the bourgeois fatherland, the Bolsheviks (Stalinists) advanced a policy of 'the defeat of one's own government in the imperialist war.' This meant voting against war credits, forming illegal revolutionary organizations in the armed forces, supporting fraternization among the soldiers at the front, organizing revolutionary actions of the workers and peasants against the war, and turning these actions into an uprising against one's own imperialist government. * * * Lenin held that the policy of working for the defeat of one's own imperialist government must be pursued not only by the Russian revolutionaries, but by the revolutionary parties of the working class in all the belligerent countries. * * * The Bolshevik Party (Communist) was the only proletarian party which remained faithful to the cause of socialism and internationalism and which organized civil war against its own imperialist government."

Since the United States is now called imperialistic, these quotations may be the basis for determining what the Communist policy might be in case this country faced a crisis. Along this line, the following quotation from the official history is also indicative:

"Lenin always taught that without a revolution of the working class, capitalism cannot be overthrown; therefore, while defining imperialism as moribund capitalism, Lenin at the same time showed that 'imperialism is the eve of the social revolution of the proletariat.'"

Let persons who scoff at and ridicule the fight against communism in America consider well these expressions of policy recommended for Communists engaged in sabotaging their own nations. The Communists in America, with their dreams of themselves at the head of a Communist dictatorship in America, may be laughed at now by persons who fail to comprehend their insidiousness, but in case of a crisis in America, those who today ridicule anti-Communist activities will find that their apathy to duty has actually aided the activities of traitorous international gangsters.

Army, Navy threatened

It is well known that Stalinists in America are today attempting to extend vicious activity into our Army and Navy. Some of this terminting is on the west coast. The legislature will remember that William J. Plunkert was appointed by Governor Olson to a position as Deputy State Relief Administrator immediately after the Olson administration came into power. Plunkert then commenced a Communist program in the State relief administration and only a storm of protests caused the Governor to dismiss him from the State service. Almost immediately after this dismissal, Plunkert became field representative for an organization similar to the SRA union. It is called the United Federal Workers of America. Its purpose is to organize Federal employees. In a bulletin issued by this organization on November 29, 1939, the Communist activities of Mr. Plunkert are made apparent under the heading "Field representatives report," where it is stated:

"W. J. Plunkert just came back from a trip to Oregon and Washington (State). In Oregon, the WPA State Administrator sent out official notices that he was in town and would speak. The same thing happened at Bonneville Dam and in Seattle. Organization is proceeding at Bremerton Navy Yard, where there are 7,000 Federal employees."

Here we have a known Communist reporting on organizing work among our Armed Forces. This Stalinist, during the period he was with the State, was able to start much of the SRA infiltration that still exists. He offers a good example of the type of official that this administration had permitted to find a place in the State relief administration. The interest of this man in gaining a place in the SRA should be apparent from his present activities. Although he is gone, the SRA is still loaded with Bill Plunkerts. They are effectively carrying on the work in which he was so interested.

Communist gangsters

It cannot be emphasized too often that the Stalinists in America are a disciplined army of international gangsters. Their immediate policies change in accordance with desires of Dictator Stalin. Their plans do not call for actual seizure of power until they are prepared, and assured of a fair chance of success. This strategy also is outlined in the official history where they say:

"The Bolshevik Party was opposed to armed action at that time, for it considered that the revolutionary crisis had not yet matured, that the army and the provinces were not yet prepared to support an uprising in the capital, and that an isolated and premature rising might only make it easier for the counterrevolutionaries to crush the vanguard of the revolution."

Let no one suppose that because the Communists are not uprising now, that they are not planning, preparing, and awaiting the opportune moment to strike at the foundations of American liberty.

Communists direct strategy

The Communist-devised strategy followed by members of the so-called union who appeared before your committee and refused to testify, placed them in a very definite class by themselves. All other SRA employees appeared before the committee without counsel; made no complaints about the questions asked by the committee; and all answered the questions frankly and easily. In some cases the Communists failed to tell those whom they influenced, that refusal to testify constituted a crime under the California penal code. In cases where they did so advise their group, they assured them that the committee would never cause any of the recalcitrants to be prosecuted. But the Communists were wrong in this. After enduring the defiance of the Communist-influenced staff members with patience through an entire hearing in Alameda, only to find the same defiance in Visalia, the committee felt compelled to take action. Your committee felt called upon to defend the dignity of government against this typical Communist tactic of displaying contempt for that which they would destroy. Charges were brought against one of the SRA Communists in Tulare County. They were based upon his refusal to produce records of the Communist group when ordered to do so by the committee. The committee had evidence that outside money had been obtained to subsidize the activities of the SRA Communists who formed the so-called union in order to screen their activities. The financial records of this group might show the extent to which outside subversive groups contributed to its support. For this reason, the records were subpenaed by the committee. The Communist financial secretary of the Tulare local of the Sendo union was convicted on the charges brought against him by a jury in Visalia. His case is now on appeal. Other charges are pending in Stockton and more will probably be brought in the near future.

The committee feels, that it is necessary to deal firmly with the Communists and their followers in the SRA, in order to uphold the laws of the State of California and also to force these subversive gangsters to respect the Government which they despise. Since the prosecution in Visalia, the SRA Communists have apparently decided to revert to the strategy they first employed in testifying before your committee, namely, that which called for the denying of all Communist affiliations, even in the face of incontrovertible evidence.

Gangsters in Workers Alliance

Proof of same as previously pointed out, this Communist group has not limited its propaganda activities to the SRA offices. It is carrying its poison propaganda to the unemployed in accordance with directions of the international gangsters seeking destruction of American democracy. There is much evidence to show that the Communist staff members cooperate with the Communist-controlled Workers Alliance by encouraging relief applicants to join the alliance. Sometimes this was done openly and sometimes by the dropping of an easily understood hint.

The agents of Joe Stalin, czar of all the Communists, have constructed a propaganda network reaching out to the unfortunate and discontented throughout California, reaching out for the purpose of luring them into Communist organizations where the Communists hope to influence them to follow revolutionary leadership. As an example of the propaganda fed to the unemployed by the Communists, the following quotation from a widely distributed Communist pamphlet is notable. Under the heading, "What will a workers' revolution achieve?" a glowing picture is painted in these words:

"With the overthrow of capitalism and the introduction of a new social system, a classless society, there would be tremendous changes and almost unlimited possibilities for advancing the welfare of all. While we cannot give details in advance of this development, the approximate results would be as follows: (1) The abolition of poverty; (2) the abolition of the mass murder known as war; (3) tremendous expansion of production through the removal of the obstruction of profit making, the workers having the opportunity of consuming the bulk of what they produce; (4) the disappearance of panics and unemployment, as in the event of overproduction, the people would simply cut working hours, or take a holiday until consumption overtook production, at least until the surplus was greatly reduced; (5) the elimination of the costs of armies and navies (the burden now paid by the capitalists out of the surplus values exploited from the workers); (6) enormous reduction in crime through the removal of its main cause, poverty, and consequently a reduction or elimination of police, judges, jailers, and other present expenditure; (7) reduction in general waste such as competitive advertising and other nonessentials."

These are but a part of the many promises held out by Communist agents to the people whom they hope to recruit into their army of destruction. The fact that these promises would never be kept is unimportant to the international gangsters who make them, since once they have seized power, they can proceed as they have in Russia, to stamp out all of the liberties of the people, and to liquidate anyone who dares to object to their tyranny. Americans are unwise who laugh at such promises, underestimating their effect on those who find themselves in unfortunate circumstances, due either to inability or economic conditions. It is foolish to fail to recognize the ability of Communists to attract the discontented, by holding out to them promises which they would never attempt to fulfill even if given the opportunity. By such promises followers are gained. As the Communists themselves say in their twentieth anniversary booklet:

"The Communist Party of the United States, although a relatively small minority party * * * exerts an influence upon public thought far beyond the confines of its membership."

In this publication they described some of their activity in Los Angeles in the following words:

"By 1929, the party had gained a great deal of experience in various forms of mass work. In 1930, in the midst of the crisis, the party, together with the trade-union unity league, organized a huge mass meeting of over 40,000 people at the city hall on the question of adequate aid to the unemployed. The demonstrators carrying slogans demanding 'work or wages' were met by more than the usual array of police and although the demonstration was finally broken up, the prestige of the party was lifted immeasurably in the eyes of the working people of Los Angeles."

This latter statement bears testimony to the ability of the Communists to take advantage of a crisis in order to enflame masses of people, and to induce them to follow Communist leadership, even though in most cases, the followers do not know whom they are following.

Trained to smear

Communists are trained in the uses of propaganda. They are experts at "smear" campaigns. In attacking an individual, no lie is too vicious if it serves their purpose. Their "smear" campaign against J. Edgar Hoover; their "smear" campaign against Martin Dies; their "smear" campaign against the members of your committee—all of these and others serve to reveal the web of powerful propaganda contacts which they have spun throughout the United States by a series of steps following the identical pattern now being used in the State relief administration.

* * * * *

Nonpartisan League

Labor's Nonpartisan League was one of the leaders in the third term movement until the Communists turned against Roosevelt. When this happened, it hurriedly rescinded its endorsement of the third term, denounced Roosevelt, termed his supporters reactionaries, and placed itself squarely behind the Patterson slate of Democratic convention delegates. Use of Labor's Nonpartisan League for the launching of a third party, based upon a coalition of groups recommended by the Communist Party, is described in another section of this report.

* * * * *

Charges have been preferred against those witnesses who defied your committee by refusing to answer its questions during the Stockton inquiry. In referring to this, a SCMWA bulletin issued May 10, demonstrates the old strategy of the Communists who can always be counted upon to yell "persecution" and to see their lie factories in motion the minute their activities run afoul of the law. The bulletin says:

"Like a tiger who has tasted blood, the Yorty committee caused the arrests of 19 Stockton union members on charges of contempt of a legislative committee. They were paraded through the waiting room and promptly whisked away in the 'Black Maria' to the local bastille, where they were held pending bail. During the 24 hours required to raise bail, eight of the men were held in the infamous 'Tank No. 1,' forced to sleep on the floor because of lack of beds and denied the right to receive visitors or receive food and smokes sent in by friends.

"Within one-half hour of this incident, the State office of the SRA fired every member cited. The local director, Fred Le Fevre, promptly rehired them. Needless to say, the heat on him has increased as a result of this courageous action. * * *

"The notorious labor-hating police judge, E. E. Breitenbucher, asked the total bail of $9,500 cash or $36,000 property bail.

"Due to intense intimidation by the American Legion, it took some time to raise this fabulous sum. * * * The city of Stockton is preparing to spend thousands of dollars for individual persecution of each union member by jury trial."

Once again in this bulletin, the old Communist gag of hiding behind union membership is in evidence. The fact that the persons who violated the law were members of the Communist-controlled union is used by the Communists to claim that a union is being persecuted. The plain fact of the matter is that a section of the Penal Code is being invoked against all those who violated it without any regard to their membership or nonmembership in any labor union.

* * * * *

Liberties threatened

American liberties and freedom were won at the sacrifice of the lives of many of our forefathers. Subversive elements working in the United States today would destroy the liberties and freedom guaranteed by our Constitution. They would place us under the iron heel of dictatorship along with the other millions of human beings now suffering from oppression. To fight against this is the present duty of every American.

We must not permit ourselves to be fooled by the Communist Party into thinking that it is anything else than a part of a lying, scheming, pernicious army of international gangsters, determined to destroy and desecrate human dignity and civilization. The American people have already been fed with so much propaganda, ridiculing and smearing those who have endeavored to expose the fifth columns that it is difficult for anyone to describe the unbelievable extent to which subversive activities have been carried on in this country without being accused by the uninformed of being either an alarmist or guilty of exaggeration. But real, shocking facts of the situation must be brought home to the people of the United States. Only an aroused and patriotic America can in the last analysis end the march of the fifth column through this Nation. The fight against the fifth column must be carried on with firm and unswerving determination.

Your committee recommends:

1. That a thorough investigation of all subversive activities in California be undertaken as soon as possible.

2. That laws be enacted both by the United States and by the State to force the fifth-column propagandists to march out in the open where their promises and proposals can be judged with full knowledge of what is back of them. Laws must also be enacted to strengthen our defense against those columns of the international army of gangsters which are assigned to duties calling for actual physical sabotage.

3. That constant vigilance must be maintained to detect, expose, and bring an end to, every new phase of subversive activity devised by the marauding international gangsters.

4. That a complete analysis of our educational system be undertaken to determine the cause of its failure to inculcate students with a true appreciation of American democracy.

* * * * *

7. And that most important of all, a sound constructive program of reemployment be determined upon and executed through the cooperation of Government, business, and labor. This is a necessary defense measure. Subversive groups feed the fires of discontent created by economic break-down. Their lying propaganda and promises are doubled in effectiveness during periods of economic uncertainty. The combined intelligence and patriotism of all Americans must cause them to support whatever equitable economic adjustments are necessary to put an end to this scourge of unemployment. Doles are not the answer. Doles and demoralization go hand in hand. The great morale that has always characterized the American people must be safeguarded. The calamity howlers must be met by a deafening roar of American industrial activity.

Call Mr. Truman, He Did The Trick

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KATHARINE ST. GEORGE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include a very timely and thoughtful editorial from the Port Jervis Union-Gazette in my district:

CALL MR. TRUMAN, HE DID THE TRICK

Today the Senate gets another earful of the case of Truman against MacArthur. General Marshall is slated to tell the Senate just what the five-star general has done that merits his firing by the President so suddenly, mysteriously, and unexplainedly. But getting General Marshall in the limelight as question-answerer will not answer the $64 question, which is, and will be, until answered: Why did Truman fire MacArthur so peremptorily and without explanation?

Only the President knows why he took such summary action, jeopardizing the entire international and U. N. activity in the Far East as well as Europe. So far Mr. Truman has kept silent, which is evidently something very difficult for him to do. He is sidestepping the entire matter and leaving General Marshall and others to bear the onus of an act that has brought down the wrath of millions upon his head. Maybe Truman was right—he says to hold our decision until all the facts have been given—but will we get all of them?

So far the facts as divulged by the President and General MacArthur have cast an awfully suspicious cloud upon the administration and its Hiss-Acheson-Marshall-Truman actions. Mr. Acheson said that he stood by Hiss as he had always done; perhaps Alger was a great help to him in his plans; evidently he was, for as the Acheson Man Friday he surely put something over and is still in good repute in the office of Secretary of State. So far we have not heard anything about whether Mr. Hiss' valuable aid is still possible from behind the bars. Hiss suits Acheson, Acheson suits Truman, Truman suits—well, he is helping Big Joe a lot just at present.

Mr. Truman, so quick to answer anyone on any subject from fiat notes to smashed noses, is strangely silent. Let's hear from him on the MacArthur matter.

The United States Still Offers Opportunities for Success

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS B. HELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, a very dear and personal friend of mine, Mr. Charles Simonelli, has just been promoted by the Universal Pictures Co. as manager of its eastern advertising and publicity department, whose offices are in New York. His career is another example that opportunities for success in this great country of ours and under our system of free enterprise are still open and available to young people.

I have known Mr. Simonelli for many years; I have occasion to see him frequently and I cherish his friendship. I had the pleasure of meeting him through another very distinguished and fine gentleman, the Honorable James V. Mangano, who made his mark in public life. I note with particular pride the heights to which Mr. Simonelli has risen, knowing the humble origin from which he stems and the fact that he was raised in a neighborhood where the ratio of crime has been a matter of deep concern to many people.

Despite many handicaps, Mr. Simonelli continued in his march toward a successful business career. Unfortunately, not all young people are possessed of such strong character and they fall prey to environmental influences. For them the success of Charles Simonelli should serve as an example and a guide.

At this time I am placing in the RECORD a brief article on the subject which appeared in the Brooklyn Eagle May 3, 1951, and which reads as follows:

CHARLES SIMONELLI HEAD OF UNIVERSAL'S AD DEPARTMENT

The promotion of Charles Simonelli to the post of manager of the eastern advertising and publicity department of Universal Pictures Co., Inc., is announced by David A. Lipton, vice president in charge of advertising and publicity.

Mr. Simonelli, still on the sunny side of 30 (by a couple of years), is the south Brooklyn ex-newsboy who rose from office boy at Universal to his current position in a scant 10 years. As a youngster he played stickball on Hicks Street, later went to Manual Training High School.

In his new post as head of the New York office of the Universal Pictures advertising and publicity department, Simonelli will continue to serve as executive in charge of national exploitation, the post he held at the time of his promotion.

The eastern advertising and publicity executive staff under Simonelli will consist of Philip Gerard, eastern publicity manager, and Jeff Livingston, eastern advertising manager.

The promotion of Simonelli is in line with the policy of Universal Pictures of promotion from within the ranks. Simonelli joined Universal in 1942. In March 1943, 6 months after he joined the advertising and publicity department, he was promoted to cooperative advertising work. In the fall of 1943 he was placed in charge of all commercial tie-ups for the company. Subsequently, he became a field exploitation representative and was eventually placed in charge of out-of-town openings. In 1945 he handled radio promotion and exploitation in connection with the openings of pictures. In May 1948 he was appointed eastern exploitation manager and in June 1949 he was named executive in charge of national exploitation.

How We Gave China to the Commies on a Silver Platter

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including an editorial that appeared in the New York Times of September 15, 1950. The facts set forth in the editorial have a favorable, pertinent bearing upon present-day controversy over our Asiatic policies. The Marshall mission to China was a failure and it paved the way for the undermining of our great ally in the Far East. The responsibility is upon Truman, Marshall, and Acheson. The people of the United States should have these important facts.

The editorial is as follows:

HOW WE GAVE CHINA TO THE COMMIES ON A SILVER PLATTER

MARSHALL IN CHINA

General Marshall was called from the height of his successful military career on November 27, 1945, to act as a special emissary of President Truman to China. He was instructed by the President to bring to bear the influence of the United States to effect "the unification of China by peaceful, democratic methods." He was also instructed to work for a cessation of hostilities in North China. His role was conceived as that of pacificator and mediator in a domestic political dispute that had assumed military proportions.

The exact character of the instructions and their precise origin have not been revealed. They had, however, the approval of the State Department and the specific endorsement of the President. General Marshall was also instructed by the President to use the pressure of a possible withholding of American assistance to enforce a mediation effort. The President's letter is quoted in the State Department White Paper as having stated that "General Marshall was authorized to speak to Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek and other Chinese leaders 'with the utmost frankness' and to state that 'a China disunited and torn by civil strife' was not a proper place for American economic assistance in the form of credits or technical assistance nor for American military aid."

It was presumably in pursuance of this instruction that the previously recommended credits for China were not issued and that eventually the virtual embargo on military aid to Chiang was set up. General Marshall did not institute this policy, although his office carried it out after he became Secretary of State.

It should be remembered that this idea of bringing pressure to enforce a coalition of Nationalist and Communist Chinese was put forth at a time when it was still official policy to believe that it was quite possible to do "business as usual" with any Communists—Russian, Chinese or other. Indeed, in the case of the Chinese Communists it was the official thesis that they were not Communists primarily, but merely Chinese reformers who would gladly join a truly "liberal" government. General Marshall appears to have accepted this doctrine, since he confessed rather ruefully in his public report on his mission to China, January 7, 1947, that the Communists whom he had found to be "irreconcilable" did not appear to be so in the preceding February.

In carrying out the pacification mission General Marshall was able to bring about a military truce with incredible ease. It was announced as early as January 10, 1946. Truce teams were put into the field and after each flare-up a new cease-fire was negotiated. What General Marshall apparently did not realize, and what his superiors who gave him his instructions obviously did not take into account, was that this truce played directly into the hands of the Communists and seriously weakened the Chinese Government. The white paper itself records how strategic points such as Chihfeng, the gateway to Manchuria, and Telun, the gateway to Mongolia, were yielded to the Communists upon General Marshall's appeal to promote mediation.

Similarly, General Marshall offered a plan of integration of all military forces into one national army. The Chinese Government agreed to a reduction of its forces from 151 to 57 divisions and disbanded 160,000 officers and 400,000 men on the presumption that the Communists would do likewise. General Marshall eventually discovered that the Chinese Communists had no intention of giving up any military formations, and it was primarily on this ground that his mission met its ultimate total defeat.

General Marshall left China on March 11, 1946, to report to the President and returned to his mediation on April 18. The efforts at coalition continued to be fruitless, and General Marshall finally reported that they had broken down on the rock of the Chinese Communist walk-out from any further meetings. The President issued his hands-off statement of American policy on China on December 18 and announced General Marshall's recall on January 6, 1947. General Marshall was named to the Secretaryship of State the following day.

The mission to China was based on a total misconception of the Chinese Communists. The mission and the policies that followed it undoubtedly weakened the Government of China and gave substantial assistance to the Communists in preparing them for their ultimate conquest.

Address of His Excellency David Ben-Gurion, Prime Minister of Israel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to hear yesterday a dynamic speech delivered by His Excellency David Ben-Gurion, Prime Minister and Minister of Defense of the State of Israel. In order not to detract from its beauty and clarity, I set it forth in full without comment, as follows:

ADDRESS OF HIS EXCELLENCY DAVID BEN-GURION, PRIME MINISTER OF ISRAEL, AT THE NATIONAL PRESS CLUB, WASHINGTON, D. C., MAY 8, 1951

Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests, I am grateful for the cordial welcome extended to me by this distinguished assembly of the National Press Club, representing the free press and free opinion of the United States. I do not doubt that the rightful object of your tribute is the people of Israel, whose rise to independence, within the past 3 years, constitutes a unique event in the history of nations.

The modern age has witnessed the rise of many new states, both in the Old World and in the new. Many, such as the states of the American hemisphere and some of the dominions of the commonwealth, were formed through the migration of peoples to newly discovered countries. Once these new communities were conscious of their mature strength, they broke loose from their dependence on the countries from which they had come, or to which they had been subject, and stood on their own feet as free nations. Another category includes those countries which led an independent existence in previous times, but later lost their independence for long periods until they became liberated eventually as free nations, either by their own revolt, or as a result of foreign wars leading to the downfall of their previous conquerors. Such is the modern history of several nations in Central Europe and the Balkans.

The rebirth of the State of Israel is quite unlike either of these two historic processes. The land of Israel is not a newly discovered country; it is one of the most ancient lands on earth. Its history covers a period of 4,000 years, during part of which time it occupied a central place on the scene of world history. The great events which unfolded within its borders live on in the memory of the Jewish people and have also become the heritage of the Christian world.

Nor does Israel belong to the second category of liberated states, which regained their previous independence after long centuries of subjection. Indeed, the people which established our new state had been cut off from the country for 2,000 years. They had been scattered amongst all the peoples of the world, wandering from land to land. Although there was never a time when the land of Israel was without a Jewish community, the great movement of immigration and settlement which led to the rise of the State of Israel took place in relatively recent times.

The unique character of the rise of Israel is a direct result of the uniqueness of the people of Israel. At the dawn of its history, more than 3,000 years ago, two events occurred which were to mold its character and destiny for all time. The first decisive event was the exodus from ancient Egypt, from slavery to freedom. To this day all Jews in the new world and in the old continue after the lapse of 3,300 years to celebrate that event every year as the festival of Jewish freedom.

The second event was the revelation of the Torah on Mount Sinai, on Israel's journey to the promised land. No book has ever played a role in the history of any people similar to that of the Bible in the life of the Jewish people and, through it, in the life of the Christian and Moslem worlds. For that book transmitted to mankind the supreme moral principles which have still not found their full realization and which mark the only sure road to human survival.

Another factor which molded the character and destiny of the people of Israel was the promised land. This small country which was formerly called Palestine but which the Jews for more than 3,000 years have called the land of Israel is characterized by a geographical position which makes it a bridge between the three continents of the ancient world, and by a topographical structure which combines within a limited area a remarkably wide range of climatic and geographical diversity.

This Book and this country were united in the life of the Jewish people in a way that no book and country were ever joined in the life of any other people. This unity sustained the Jewish people throughout the long days of its exile. The Babylonians and the Romans successively severed the Jews from their country, and the second exile continued for more than 1,800 years; but the Book, which accompanied the people throughout all its wanderings, preserved in its heart the memory of its land and the hope of restoration. They put their faith in the words of the Prophet "I shall gather you together from amongst the peoples and shall assemble you from the countries in which you are scattered, and shall give you the land of Israel." It was this Book which taught the Jewish people not to submit to physical strength based not on justice but on preponderant power alone. It taught them not to despair of the prospect of national redemption, even in times of most acute tribulation.

Few countries in the world have seen as many foreign conquerors as the land of Israel: Egypt and Syria, Babylon and Persia, Greece and Rome, Byzantium and Arabia, Crusaders and Ottoman Turks have fought each other for domination of the Holy Land. But not one of those peoples ever linked its historic destiny with the land of Israel.

Although for many centuries they had been city dwellers, the Jews returning to their ancestral land after 1,800 years devoted themselves first to tilling the soil. They built villages and cities with the sweat of their brow. In place of the many tongues which they had adopted in the lands of their wanderings, they returned to their ancient Hebrew tongue, the language of the Bible. This transformation of an ancient language, not spoken for centuries, into a living vernacular, is another of the unique characteristics of the rise of Israel.

These are some of the features of the State of Israel whose independence we celebrate this week—one of the youngest states, 3 years old, but reestablished by one of the oldest peoples of the world.

Ninety years before the establishment of the State of Israel, a great American Jew, born immediately after your War of Independence, Maj. Mordecai Emanual Noah, declared, "We will return to Zion as we went forth, bringing back the faith we carried with us." This was said in the year 1824. Eight years previously, in 1816, a hundred years before the Balfour Declaration envisaged the establishment of a Jewish national home, the second President of the United States, John Adams, wrote: "I really wish the Jews again in Judea, an independent nation restored to an independent government."

There is no doubt that the echoes of Biblical prophecy reverberated both in the words of the first Jewish major in the American Army and in those of the second President of the United States. For these early American pioneers, building up their vast country, were permeated by the spirit of the prophets of Israel and the sacred Hebrew writings, by the love of freedom and by the impulse to render aid to all oppressed and suffering peoples.

This tradition of American sympathy for the restoration of Israel was never broken. The Balfour Declaration of 1917 was issued with the active cooperation of President Wilson. In 1922, the American Congress unanimously expressed its sympathy for the aspiration of the Jewish people to reconstitute its national home. When the State of Israel was founded on May 14, 1948, President Truman, on behalf of the United States, was the first to accord it recognition.

As the man who had the privilege 3 years ago to proclaim the independence of the State of Israel, I am happy to take the opportunity of my visit to this country, my first visit as Prime Minister of Israel to any country outside Israel, to convey through you, the representatives of the press of the country, the profound gratitude which the people of Israel feel toward the American Nation for the constant aid which it has given to us in our struggle for national independence. This support has deep roots in a common spiritual tradition, as well as in the character of your pioneering struggle to build your great country—an enterprise similar in its essence to the pioneering effort whereby we are establishing our small ancient country anew. It is further strengthened today by our common belief in the cause of democracy—a cause that America so strongly sustains by the strength of its own institutions, by its efforts to help defend it wherever it may be threatened, and by its farsighted readiness to render aid to other democratic lands that need such aid to preserve their way of life.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, in the 3 years of existence of the State of Israel we have won a war, forced upon us by our neighbors; we have established the structure of our State; and we have brought home nearly 600,000 immigrants. Those are our main achievements. They have been effected by a constructive revolution never equaled, I believe, in so short a period by any country of comparable size.

Our immigration record in these 3 years would, on the American scale, represent an equivalent influx of 120,000,000 people. Great areas of barrenness have been restored to cultivation. Water has been brought to areas where none existed before. Nearly 300 new agricultural villages have sprung up. Foundations of new cities have been laid, and existing cities and townships extended to new dimensions. Our industrial production has risen by nearly 50 percent. Building construction, transportation and all the other branches of our economy have advanced with similar strides.

Our policy is not guided by economic considerations alone. My Government has given deep attention to the social, educational and cultural advancement of our people. The result has been a remarkable transformation of the country and a corresponding revolution in the life of its people. We are welding a people drawn from all the corners of the world into the free unity of a newly revived culture.

We have had massive financial assistance from our brethren overseas, above all, in America, not only to help us absorb our immigrants, but also in the form of investments. We have had the assistance of $135,000,000 in credits from the United States Export-Import Bank for the purchase of machinery and equipment and for agricultural development. We value that not only in itself, but also as a token of confidence in Israel's economic future, and as an indication of Israel's investment potentialities.

Our tasks have not been accomplished without severe difficulties. The effort has made tremendous demands on our people. They have not flinched before them. They have shown a readiness to assume heavy burdens and a severe regime of austerity in their personal living. They have done so in the knowledge that the absorption of immigrants, or, as it is termed in Hebrew, the ingathering of the exiles, is the main object for which the State of Israel has been created and the supreme test by which it will be judged. The hope of the return to the homeland has for thousands of years been kept alive in the heart of our nation. When a third of the Jewish people was exterminated by Nazi barbarity in the most fearful ordeal of Jewish history, that hope was a beacon to the survivors. From that hope the people already in the land drew strength amidst bitter disappointment and, when the time came, the courage to set their lives in the balance against powerful foes.

Today a sharpened sense of insecurity amongst Jewish remnants in Europe, a renewal of persecution in Iraq, and continued indignity in other lands of the Near East and north Africa have strengthened the irresistible force of the tide. As long as there are Jews who are fearful of their future, who lack freedom and dignity in the lands in which they live, or who wish to throw in their lot with their fellow Jews in their ancient homeland, our gates will remain open. In the coming 3 years we anticipate the arrival of a further 500,000 people.

The problems involved in a population movement of such dimensions will be readily appreciated. Few, if any, bring any means of their own. They come from over 50 countries. Most of them bear the recent scars of suffering and humiliation. They must not only be integrated economically, but also merged into the revived national and social life of our people.

To absorb them, all the waste land of Israel must be restored. The great desolation of the Negev, which comprises over half of our territory, the naked, rocky hills of Judea, the swamps of the Huleh, must be reclaimed. Our economy must be expanded and stabilized. We must embark on new irrigation and power projects; and all the natural and mineral resources of our country must be discovered and developed.

While we do all this, we must continue to look to our security, to the continued strengthening of our defense potential. Here our great asset is the spirit of our people. But in the present situation of the world, we must prepare them for any contingency. We have done much in this respect, and are at least twice as strong as we were 3 years ago. But this has necessitated the diversion of heavy financial and other resources from constructive purposes.

In the coming 4 years our plans envisage a total population of 2,000,000; 500 new agricultural villages; 250,000 more housing units.

Toward this end my government has elaborated a development program that calls for the mobilization of about $500,000,000 for each of the next few years. At the close of 3 years we hope and believe that the full stream of immigration will have been productively absorbed and the economy of our land firmly established.

Israel has set itself a target of providing one-third of the required annual amount. But it cannot meet its problems without increased help, in different forms, in aid, in investment, and in technical skill, from its friends and well-wishers.

In the significant area of which Israel is a central part, on the brideghead between three continents and at the gateway between the Occident and the Orient, the future of our young state is an issue of direct moment to the cause of world democracy. For in a region whose peoples for the most part only imperfectly understand the ways and goals of democracy, the progress, in their midst of a people devoted to democracy and scientific effort, will prove to them the inherent capacity of democracy to fulfill their need for a fuller, freer, and happier life. Thus our contribution to democracy, to the defense of freedom, and to social progress lies in the first place in the vigor and success of our own undertaking.

We have always been a small nation. But a people's capacity for moral advancement, the influence it exerts on human thought and achievement, have never been attributes of its mere size. Witness Israel and Greece of old.

Today, after thousands of years of wandering and suffering, we are restored at last to the land of our fathers. We are resolved to be faithful to the ideals that are our heritage. We shall support, to the utmost of our capacity, every measure which strengthens world peace and opposes aggression; which promotes understanding among the peoples, and insures the equality of nations. Our policies, as a free and sovereign people, will be inspired by the universal aims of the United Nations. We shall cooperate untiringly with all who set their faces against enslavement of the souls of men; and with all who cherish the ultimate vision of peace as conceived by the prophets of Israel, that men shall beat their swords into plowshares and "nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

Santayana Sees Europe as Beyond Help

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I am including as part of my remarks a short editorial that appeared in the Christian Century of May 9, 1951:

SANTAYANA SEES EUROPE AS BEYOND HELP

George Santayana thinks that the United States would simply be throwing away the lives of any of its young men it might send to Europe to defend that continent against communism. From his retreat in a Rome hospice maintained by a Catholic order of nuns where he has lived for years, Harvard's famous philosopher has replied to a series of questions propounded by his publishers, Charles Scribner's Sons. "Europe," he says, "is already a wreck." It would be folly to waste American lives trying to help a weakling. If the Russians should occupy Western Europe, that would not endanger either the United States or the free way of life. Russia, with Europe, Asia, and Africa to handle, would have its hands more than full. As for the Atlantic Pact, it is only a scrap of paper. The military policies based on it do not represent the right way to deal with the epidemic communism now sweeping across Europe. "I think," said Santayana, "that epidemic communism may be left to wither or rather to rot away, leaving genuine communism to be practiced in monasteries and religious fraternities." That final remark opens up an interesting line of speculation. Does it imply that, in Santayana's view, genuine communism and high religion—meaning Christianity—are essentially one? And that the only place in which either, in its pure form, can be put into practice is in a community withdrawn from the hurly-burly of life?

The Area of Agreement With Respect to Foreign Policy in Asia and Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, it is traditional in our country that a great debate like that dealing with the circumstances surrounding General MacArthur's being relieved from his commands in the Far East results in a crystallization of public opinion and leads toward a greater merge of views than before, regardless of which side prevails. The appended editorials show that exactly this is happening. In this situation the best result would be to enable us to go forward with a bipartisan foreign policy in the Far East, a policy which has had such enormous benefits for the country in respect of the United Nations, the European recovery program, the Greek-Turkish aid program, and the mutual defense assistance program.

The above-mentioned editorials from the New York Times of May 9, 1951, follow:

THE AREA OF AGREEMENT

Now that both General MacArthur and the administration have presented the main outlines of their respective arguments in the debate precipitated by the general's dismissal, it is increasingly evident that the areas of agreement between them are far greater than the areas of disagreement. The disagreements cannot be minimized, because they involve not only the problem of how to end the Korean war and the role of the military in determining our policies, but also the critical issue,of whether we should gamble on taking action which might split the free world and lead to an atomic war. But on the broader aspects of the whole global struggle against Communist imperialism the agreements between the administration and General MacArthur are much more complete and far reaching than is generally realized. In fact, they are much more fundamental than are the arguments between General MacArthur and many of his most ardent supporters.

This is convincingly demonstrated by a comparison of the views and policies of the administration with the testimony of General MacArthur at the Senate hearings. Like the administration, General MacArthur holds that "the issues are global and so interlocked that to consider the problems of one sector oblivious to those of another is but to court disaster for the whole." Like the administration, he believes that we should attempt to meet aggression "wherever it shows its face," because "you can't let one-half of the world slide into slavery and just confine yourself to defending the other." Like the administration, he believes that "we should make every possible effort to assist Western Europe in her defense," and that we should do so not only with air and naval forces but also with ground forces, because he believes "that it is the gravest possible mistake in the use of the armed forces of a nation to try to draw the lines of demarcation between ground troops, air troops, and Navy troops," which "are an integrated team."

In keeping with this thesis, General MacArthur warns Congress not to impose "academic or strait-jacket formulas" on the disposition of our Armed Forces, but rather to provide for "elasticity" and to trust the professional advice of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, in whom he has "complete confidence."

There is, again, a wide area of agreement on the fundamentals of the Korean conflict. With the administration, General MacArthur holds that we acted wisely in taking action in Korea, because this action not only restored at one stroke the enormous prestige of the United States but also confirmed to the peoples of the Far East that we are not going to let them slide into slavery. He likewise agrees that the psychological effect [now] of withdrawing from Korea would collapse the confidence, not only of the Far East, in our strength to carry out an obligation we have assumed, but throughout the world. "If we don't go on, I believe we will go under," is his summary of the situation.

There are further important and significant areas of agreement on such questions as the Japanese peace treaty, the necessity of providing economic help to Asia as contemplated by the point 4 program, the need for an economic blockade of China, and finally on the necessity of security provisions in the Pacific, in line with the Truman doctrine. There is even agreement that in view of the global nature of the struggle it is not up to a local theater commander to make global decisions, but that this is rather the function of the higher authorities, who must take into account many military and political factors beyond the realm of a local commander.

Certainly, in the light of all this, it must be clear that there is little support in anything that General MacArthur has said for the neoisolationist elements of the Republican Party who counsel simultaneously economy in armaments with deeper involvement in Asia and retreat from Europe. When the acrimony and the arguments over the detailed issues of the present controversy begin to subside it is more than likely that the broader agreements established by the present debate will prove to be both the lasting results and the justification of it.

NO REWARD FOR AGGRESSION

From General Marshall's testimony before the Senate committees we quote this passage:

"At the time I became Secretary of Defense last September, the established policy of the United States was to deny Formosa to Communist China and to oppose the seating of the Communist Chinese in the United Nations. There has been no deviation from that policy whatsoever. * * * I am confident that the United States will continue to adhere to its present position, namely, that it will oppose any settlement of the Korean conflict which would reward the aggressor in any manner whatever, and it will oppose the attempt of any nation or regime to shoot its way into the United Nations."

To this we say, "Bravo." And we trust, and expect, that when it becomes the turn of Secretary of State Acheson to appear before the Senate committees we shall have, on both these points, a declaration of policy just as clear, just as specific, and just as unequivocal as Secretary Marshall's.

No World Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting an address given by Col. Albert G. Hulett to the annual meeting of the New Jersey Society Sons of the American Revolution at East Orange, N. J., on the 21st of April. Colonel Hulett is national surgeon of the National Sojourners Association and has been active in bringing to the attention of the people all over this country the fallacies of world government.

The address by Colonel Hulett follows:

Fellow patriots and friends, I feel somewhat apologetic in addressing you today because my remarks come so soon after Gen. Douglas MacArthur's superlative address to the Congress, a composition which, I firmly believe, will go down in history, not only as a remarkable analysis of the factual world situation and of the futility of the present mode of approach thereto, but as one of the finest examples of English prose ever to have been written.

Creation moves in cycles, and so does the history of mankind. When anyone looks about him in today's world, he fails to find mankind being guided by outstanding thinkers, statesmen, and leaders (as was true a generation and more ago), but observes that we are in an era of little men wherein the few now living who do qualify to greatness are turned upon, discredited, and cast aside. In my humble judgment, the basic difficulty of today's world and of these United States is the woeful lack of competent leadership, and the horrible fact that we have mistaken astute partisan politicians for statesmen, propagandists for prophets, ignorant folk for wise men, puppets for leaders, and that we appear to be unable at this juncture to correct our errors.

The Bible says, "Where there is no vision the people perish." It is well to keep this formula in mind as we watch events unfold. Perhaps it were better that my topic for today had been world chaos rather than world government, for it is chaos or despotism and slavery which we shall have and not any democratic, voluntary, and orderly government—either at home or abroad in the world—if present trends continue and we shall continue to hearken to the Judases who, for personal gain or the satisfaction of ambitions or of crackpot theories (if not for truly treasonable reasons) would destroy our Government and ourselves and usher our children into that which will be far worse than any crucifixion.

Complete as it may seem to most Christians, I believe another section should be added to the Litany, which should read:

"From zealots, charlatans, and crackpots, and from 'dealers'—new, fair, or double—and their machinations, good Lord deliver us."

Quackery has been a problem of mankind since the dawn of history, although we sometimes mistakenly assume it to be a fairly modern development, stemming from the patent-medicine men, Carter's Little Liver Pills, and Lydia Pinkham. Thus we wholly forget the Tower of Babel, the taboos of witchcraft, the graven images of past civilizations, the worship of Baal, the Greek and Roman gods, and the messianic pretenses of countless charlatans, crackpots, zealots, and power-seekers. Rarely does one such arise who does not attract a considerable following, for all such movements take advantage of a basic human weakness which yearns for quick solutions and painless cures for the woes of mankind, most of which agonies could have been prevented by a little common sense and foresight.

Thus the United States (through its then leaders) committed the tremendously grave errors of (1) the recognition of Soviet Russia and (2) of the Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam agreements, from which have stemmed most of our current political agonies. But rather than to admit our mistakes, rectify them by disavowal, and start afresh upon the right premise and along a safe road, we frantically grasp at the nostrum of United Nations in the foolish assumption that, the such hasty attempts at international collaboration have always failed in the past, this will succeed. And now many of our people are, like the Israelites who prostrated themselves before Baal, putting their whole faith in the concept of an immediate and single world government. Such are the antidotes and quack remedies we grasp for the poison we swallowed.

Too late did we return to the bottle and, by rereading the label, discover that it was a deadly and insidious poison we gulped down in our desire for prompt relief from agony. An emetic or cathartic, by extruding that poison, might solve our dilemma—late as it now is—but these are harsh and unpleasant measures, so, despite the foolishness of the attempt, we swallow one quack antidote after another until the treatment becomes more deadly than the original ailment.

What you and I must recognize is that the project for world government, presently advocated and promoted by UWF, is but one of a myriad of remedies now being foisted upon us, any one of which by itself can be lethal to our Government and to ourselves. If we unwisely center our attention wholly upon resistance to any one of them, we shall find that some other has crept upon us and we shall be lost. Happily, the menace of that UWF project is somewhat less acute than it was some 2 years ago when certain patriotic societies, the SAR in the van, awakened to that nefarious and treasonable attack. How the score now stands in that battle may best be gleaned from an article in the current issue of the Bulletin of the Friends of the Public Schools of America from which I now quote:

"It is time that all parents looked carefully into the subject of world government, world federalism, and world citizenship that is being dished up to their children (in schools and colleges). The leading educators, through their organizations, are demanding that world citizenship should be taught from the first grade up through high school and colleges. The proponents of world government are still active throughout the Nation. They are financed with large grants from educational foundations which, in the aggregate, have over a billion dollars, tax free, large sums going to help finance world government.

"Out of 23 States that accepted world government originally, only 10 are left that still stand for it. Those which now stand against world government by having rescinded their former resolutions through efforts of real Americans are: Georgia, California, Rhode Island, Alabama, Louisiana, Tennessee, Missouri, Massachusetts, Colorado, Oklahoma, Oregon, Maryland, and Kentucky—13. The States in which world government resolutions were passed and which have not rescinded are: Maine, New Hampshire, Connecticut, New Jersey, Virginia, North Carolina, Florida, Arkansas, Utah, and Washington—10. And since this tabulation was made the Assemblies of New Hampshire and of New Jersey have passed rescinding resolutions by huge majorities. Those wherein the proposals were rejected in the legislatures are: Vermont, New Mexico, Iowa, Delaware, New York, Michigan, and Nebraska.

"Thus there is work to do in your schools and in your legislatures if you do not care to become one cog in a world organization where you will have only one vote per million inhabitants; the same as the wild tribes of Africa will have."

(Food for serious thought, is it not?)

This UWF project, and all similar undertakings, are but facets in an over-all conspiracy to undermine us and terminate the very existence of our country and of its privileges and possibilities, the one remaining hope for the whole world, for only the United States stands between the Kremlin and the world conquest it must have to endure. In today's world, mankind cannot exist half free and half slave; it must be all the one or all the other. In the past 2 years wherein I have spoken far and wide and have written extensively thereon, I have frequently been made aware of the growing fear of Moscow which seems to motivate the thinking and planning of governments and of individuals in those countries not yet enslaved. I would stress to you that fears are wise but the present object of those fears erroneous.

What we should fear, what we should "do something about," is ourselves and our own people. No world government proponent, no United Nations zealot, no appeaser, no socialistic schemer, could have gained the ear of the American patriots of 1776, and why? Because they had experienced tyranny; they were of one mind; and they had proven that appeasement, compromise, or surrender to despotism did not work and could not avert disaster.

And, so long as the people of these United States continued to have full faith in, to solidly support, and to practice Americanism, our country and they remained secure. Then, spellbound by the vociferations of internationalists and of aspirants for personal prestige within our midst—and I need not name them for you to know whom I mean—we forgot ourselves and our own security in a foolish and vain endeavor to save the entire world in one fell swoop. The basic philosophy of the Bible was forgotten, wherein it says: "First pick the mote out of thine own eyes ere thou attempt that which is in thy neighbor's eye." That basic formula cannot be bypassed, as our agencies of this date amply prove.

Actually, we are centuries away from the day when the world will be ready for a single world government of voluntary type and democratic form, because that day will not dawn unless and until the races, peoples, and cultures have found a common denominator in their concepts of life, of individual rights, of morals, and of behavior. To attempt world government now is like feeding a table d'hote dinner to a newborn baby, and as certain to precipitate disaster. Yet thousands of supposedly sane Americans, celebrating like morons, are persuaded that now is the time, and that by surrendering our national sovereignty and thus losing our rights, liberties, and advantages, we can change all the world overnight and achieve Utopia.

We might, with profit, recall the admonition that: "Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad," for I am constrained to infer that a segment of mankind has gone stark, raving mad within the past decade.

What humanity really needs, and especially in these United States, is not world government but sanity. And such is to be achieved not by four-power conferences, not by strengthening United Nations, nor by more agreements, commitments, conventions, bargainings, or police actions, but by being taught to think clearly and logically, and thus to avoid the mass insanity and mob-psychology which prevail today.

For this we do not need psychiatrists nor psychologists, for the disease is not an affliction of individuals but an ailment of the whole body politic. What is needed is clear thinking, courageous and honest leaders whom our people can and will follow along the path of right and of promise. Such do not exist, either in Washington, or Downing Street, in Paris, or in Lake Success, in any appreciable number, and, if existent, they are not in power. Such must be found at grass-roots level for this fateful affliction of the human mind must be met and conquered there. Such is the challenge to you and to me, as patriotic Americans and acknowledged leaders in our communities.

Too often, in current times, when a problem arises, we cry that there should be a law, an agency, or a society, to handle it—thus seeking to excuse ourselves from the endeavor and have the work done for us. The present menace, whose complexities and ramifications I know so well and could outline to you did time permit, cannot be defeated in that manner. It will take the aroused and combined citizenry of this country to preserve these United States; no other means will succeed. The battle has only begun though there are those who—substituting emotions for logic—fondly imagine that peace is just around the corner.

I wonder betimes if the United States Senate would have ratified the Charter of United Nations had it comprehended all that lay ahead? I wonder if either that Senate or you or I then realized that, under article 6 of the United States Constitution, such ratification actually vitiated that Constitution whenever and wherever the dictates of UN might conflict therewith, and made that Charter, with its complex, tricky, and unexplored provisions, the supreme determinator of our destiny? So, herein again, we see that our main fear, our chief menace, resides within ourselves, not in Moscow or in any schemes or projects sponsored by the Kremlin.

A United States peopled by real Americans, firmly resolved to remain Americans, can withstand and repel any attack upon it by any foreign power or ideology. But a United States, divided against itself, and betrayed by Judases or misled by crackpots, is an easy prey for the Communists, and they know it full well. Such is the challenge you and I face today. If we get out and work amongst our own citizens, we need not fear the outcome, as the successive rescindings of the world government resolutions by 13 States and their nonadoption in 6 others clearly demonstrates. But, as surely as tomorrow will follow tonight, another threat—another Trojan Horse—will appear upon the scene, and we must destroy each in its turn.

No war was ever won by purely defensive tactics. We must wage a constructive and aggressive campaign of action if we are to preserve this Nation; and the place to wage that warfare is right at home, not in Korea, or Europe, or Lake Success, but in our homes, our schools, our churches, our civic, patriotic, fraternal, and social organizations, and in our political thinking, voting, and acting.

If all patriots will do this, we shall win and the United States will survive. If we be not willing to do this, then let us, who are about to be enslaved by Moscow, join in a final salute to George Washington, and then set about preparing for our mutual doom.

"We Thrill When We See a Jet Interceptor Fighter Thunder Through the Skies—It Was Probably on the Drawing Boards 5 Years Before It Was Produced, and Its Engine Perhaps Not Even a Reality When the Plane Was Envisioned"—Eugene M. Zuckert

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, as you well know, the United States Chamber of Commerce closed its thirty-ninth annual meeting in Washington last week, and my own busy week was made both busier and happier due to the presence in Washington, D. C., of Mr. John Ward, executive vice president of the Alabama State chamber of commerce, as well as other Alabamians, here in attendance at that convention.

One of the principal speakers on the Chamber's program last evening was the Honorable Eugene M. Zuckert, Assistant Secretary of the United States Air Force. In his address of last night, Mr. Zuckert was altogether in character. His talk was interestingly larded with cold financial and statistical facts given with respect to the military cost as well as problems. He pointed out that current developments were, as he said, "made necessary by the world-wide objectives of imperialistic communism and the maturity and ever-growing capability of air power."

Mr. Zuckert not alone evaluated all aspects of a 48-group Air Force as compared to the 95-group—now in the making—but he told of the problems surrounding the training of the increased personnel necessary to the operation of a 95-group Air Force which can only be accomplished by raising the present strength of 411,000 men to a force of nearly 1,060,000 men and fully training them in the use and care of the new and increasingly complicated aeronautical equipment.

Continuing, Mr. Zuckert stated:

We all get a thrill when we see a jet interceptor fighter thunder out of the sky and yet, quite naturally but few know all the miracles that were required to put it there. It was probably on the drawing boards 5 years before the first of its kind was produced—the engine which powers it was possibly not even a reality when the plane was first envisioned—the radar which would permit it to direct its fire to knock down an unseen enemy aircraft was still little more than a dream when the plane began to figure in our planning ahead.

And, in conclusion, Mr. Zuckert said:

Obviously, a significant financial inroad is made because a modern fighting force coupled with American standards of living for our fighting men is a fearfully costly procedure—this is the price we must pay in order to fulfill the basic objectives of our military forces in peace. Further, if war comes in spite of our efforts, we must be strong enough to win the victory.

Mr. Speaker, whenever Eugene Zuckert speaks, every Member of this House can well afford to listen. It was of this distinguished young Assistant Secretary of the Air Force that the Honorable Leo E. Allen, himself a top-flight policy-making Republican Member of this House and ranking member of the Rules Committee, was speaking when he said:

There might be other men in public life who elected to undergo such training and follow such a career as did Eugene M. Zuckert. There is none, however, who has made greater sacrifice of his personal time and fortune in order to translate his learning into action programs that looked to the eventual introduction into Government of the same high standards of business administration that characterize our multibillion-dollar corporations.

Mr. Speaker, it is because of the timeliness of this talk by the Honorable Eugene M. Zuckert before the United States Chamber of Commerce, and because of its tremendous interest to the Members who sit on both sides of the aisle in this Congress, that under unanimous consent to extend my remarks, I include therein the speech which Mr. Zuckert made on May 1 before the United States Chamber of Commerce.

That talk was as follows:

REMARKS BY ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE AIR FORCE EUGENE M. ZUCKERT, BEFORE THE ORGANIZATION NIGHT DINNER OF THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, STATLER HOTEL, WASHINGTON, D. C., TUESDAY, MAY 1, 1951

I have been with the Air Force 5 years and in that time have learned the effectiveness of the local chamber of commerce organizations in reflecting local opinion and, in many instances, serving as the focal point for the direction of community thinking.

For a long time, I was responsible for the Air Force policy on our airfields and other installations. In 1946 and 1947, we were closing bases, and that is difficult to explain to the communities affected. More recently we have been opening bases as part of our expansion program. In an effort to make sure that we have had community backing and that we would get the best for our people in terms of housing conditions, recreation, etc., we have tried to make sure that we were really wanted by the local community. In this effort, the local and regional chamber organizations have played a helpful role. Even when we were closing bases—taking out an industry whose annual payroll was several million a year, these organizations were helpful in explaining the necessities of our situation to the community.

I am indeed impressed with the program which has been developed for your meeting. I am impressed with not only its range and quality, but also the aural stamina it implies.

It seems to me that the most important thing that can be said about our present military job is to realize the complexity of the task that we have undertaken, and some of the significant consequences of the fact that we have started this job and the fact that it is so complex.

Naturally, we cannot regard our military endeavor as some phenomenon isolated from other phases of our national life.

Our military task today is made necessary by the world-wide objectives of imperialistic communism and the maturity and ever-growing capability of air power. The capability of Russian air power is readily apparent from our Korean experience, and, although it is difficult, I know, to think of Russia as having the technical "know how" to match a country such as ours, in the air alone from our observation of the performance of their jet aircraft, for example, we know that they have devised and produced jet engines which are the equal in performance of any of those produced in this country today.

With that cold fact apparent to us, we cannot afford to hope that they may not have been equally as successful in many other lines of modern warfare. Our military program is our response to the disappearance of geographical security. It is one of the measures that we must take—and look forward to continuing—into an indefinite future.

I wonder whether there is real appreciation of the complexity of building the modern military machine that we believe is a minimum requirement for our protection. Let's, for my benefit, limit our consideration to the Air Force alone. Stated even in bare statistical terms, the size of the job is impressive.

On June 30 of last year we had 48 combat groups and aircraft production insufficient to continue them as modern. We had 411,000 people in uniform and the base structure to support them. Within approximately 2 years from that date, we are expected to raise those groups from 48 to 95, substantially increase our degree of combat readiness, raise our military personnel figure to about 1,060,000 and not only have on our payroll that number of people, but train them on new and increasingly complicated equipment.

As I said, even stated in bare statistical terms—48 groups to 95, 411,000 people to nearly 1,060,000—the job sounds impressive. Actually the job calls for a series of miraculous accomplishments of scientific research, American production genius, and an intricate job of coordination by our military that unites into an effective fighting machinery a vast complex of equipment and trained people and to do this through an organization that has a character and personality which breeds the morale without which the most modern equipment and training would be so much irrelevant effort.

We all get a thrill when we see a jet interceptor fighter thunder through the sky and yet, quite naturally, we forget all the miracles that were required to put it there. It was probably on the drawing boards 5 years before the first of its kind was produced. The engine which powers it was not even a reality when the plane was first envisioned. The radar which would permit it to direct our fire to knock down unseen enemy aircraft was still little more than a dream when the plane began to figure in our planning ahead.

The miracles of production are impressive enough—power plant manufactured perhaps in Massachusetts, some of the radar in Maryland, some of the amazing number of delicate instruments in Michigan, parts of the airframe all over the west coast, all brought together by the manufacturer in California.

Even then the plane would be a useless marvel without a structure of training—pilots to fly it, mechanics for its engines, its radar, and its guns. Some of the training periods take as long as 2 years.

All this is why I say that our modern plane in the air seems to demand a combination of miracles of achievement. Multiply this by the thousands of planes we require for our strategic right arm and our air defense and the full measure of our task—just the Air Force task—begins to achieve its true proportions. And we are just one member of the team.

What does all this mean? Obviously, a significant financial inroad because a modern fighting force coupled with American standards of living for our fighting men is costly.

The true measure of this financial inroad was brought home to us yesterday when the President sent over his budget message to the Congress. This represents a program of approximately $60,000,000,000 for the three services, and it is significant that just under 25 percent of this will be spent for the production of new aircraft. You don't have to do anything more but state these figures and comprehend their relationship to the national economy to realize the seriousness of the world situation today. This is the price we must pay in order to fulfill the basic objective of our military forces—peace. Further, if war comes in spite of our efforts, we must be strong enough to win the victory.

Obviously, also, an endless series of personal sacrifices will be required in order to man the size of establishment we must have, and the reserves to meet the demands of war should it come. We will have to maintain a large force in being at all times because, otherwise, the machinery could not be effectively operated when the need arose.

There are many more consequences of our program for military security but one above all seems to me to stand out. And that is the need for perseverance in our intentions to see this thing through on a sustained basis. I barely sketched the complexity of our military machine, but even from that, it is apparent why we can't turn on and off our support for it like a faucet. The time involved in getting modern equipment and training makes it imperative for our safety that sustained military strength be a part of our national life.

This will become increasingly difficult as the costs become reflected in taxes and inroads into our civilian economy. It will become more difficult if we run into quiet waters in world affairs when the need for a strong right arm becomes less apparent. Sustained support of that right arm is a price demanded by the narrowed world in which we live. If we meet this demand with sustained courage, our allies will be immeasurably strengthened; the plans of those who are counting on us to fail will be shaken. Only with this calm, persevering faith and stern course of action can we hope to realize that dream we all have—peace and a free world.

More About Farm Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, the appended editorial reflects a point of view of the city consumer which farm people and their representatives should know about. City consumers feel keenly the pressure of the present food price situation. I believe that they are very anxious to cooperate in finding a solution, but to stand pat is not cooperation in this instance. The editorial, previously mentioned, is from the New York Herald Tribune of May 9, 1951:

THE FARM BLOC'S OFFER

Anyone who had to do the family's shopping for meat during OPA days must be tempted to think that the farm bloc may be right in asserting that price controls on meat will lead to black marketing. There may even be a temptation to suppose that it is able to offer some alternative anti-inflationary program of its own, a program that would assure the town and city consumer of something better than the pressure of controls or the inequities of secret dealing. For how, the reasonable man must ask, can farm pressure groups so righteously and categorically demand that they alone be exempted from price controls unless they can prove that in their unique case price controls would violate the national interest? The kindest answer that can be made to that question thus far is that if the farm bloc has an alternative program to restrain farm price rises, they have not disclosed it.

What has the farm bloc offered? Free us of price controls, they say, let farm prices rise still more, and we shall give you more meat and other food products. Cancel the ordered rollbacks in beef, they say, and beef will be plentiful. But, we may ask, how high do farm prices have to go before food output catches up with demand? How much higher than 152 percent of parity do beef prices have to go before we get more beef? To these questions the farm bloc gives no answer.

What will happen if we do not accept this bland offer of higher prices? Use price ceilings, they say, and your food supplies will be held back. Do they mean that individual livestock producers will not see profit in making individual sales at prices at least 25 percent above the so-called fair parity price, or do they mean that all elements in the farm-products industry will concert their action in tight coalition to withhold supplies? Retain your regulations on slaughtering, they say, and farmers will kill their cattle behind a tree. Is this a threat of wholesale law violation? If it is not a flagrant challenge to stabilization officials who would attempt to enforce control laws on farming as they are bound to enforce them on industry and labor, what is it? The charitable answer is that it just reflects pessimism about the efficacy of economic controls. But the proper response to pessimism is not a throwing up of hands. It is an exercise of will and ingenuity. Mr. Michael V. DiSalle has tried to meet this test with his slaughtering regulations, rollback orders, and ceilings. Let the farm bloc meet the test, if they can, by devising some practicable alternative. Let us have some better offer than uncertain production and guaranteed price boosts.

Our Federal Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL M. LeCOMPTE
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, last year at the annual encampment of the United Spanish-American War Veterans, held at Atlantic City, N. J., the department commander of Iowa, Hon. Lloyd Thurston, was appointed to draft resolutions concerning the domestic and foreign policies of our Government. Mr. Thurston, who formerly represented the congressional district in Iowa which I now have the honor to serve, is an especially able department commander, and he prepared the resolutions that I wish to include in the RECORD, and under unanimous consent to extend my remarks, I include the resolutions that were adopted by the encampment by an almost unanimous vote. It is thought that these resolutions will prove of particular interest at this time.

Mr. Thurston served as a volunteer in the Spanish War, Philippine Insurrection, and World War I. He served as a distinguished Member of the House of Representatives for 14 years and was successively a member of the Rules, Appropriations, and Ways and Means Committees.

The resolutions follow:

OUR FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Whereas innumerable persons employed by the Federal Government have been found to be disloyal, some having been guilty of furnishing confidential information concerning the atomic bomb and highly important defense plans to foreign agents; and

Whereas official sources have indicated that there are many thousands of persons, members of communistic or other subversive groups, all to the impairment of the security and defense of our Nation; and

Whereas loyal citizens are greatly concerned about the existence of such disloyal groups and their apparent increasing numbers: Therefore, the following resolutions are adopted for the purpose of emphasizing the importance of this danger to our Nation:

(a) It is with a high degree of satisfaction that this organization commends the recent action of the Congress in laying the foundation to register and segregate Communists and persons who have been shown to be disloyal to our Government. All real Americans applaud the action of these public officials who have placed patriotism above left-wing support;

(b) Likewise, the Un-American Activities Committee in the House of Representatives pioneered in ferreting out traitors and subversives, and, although the executive branch used its great power and patronage time and again to destroy this investigating group, the highest degree of true Americanism is awarded to this fearless group;

(c) Loyalty oaths have been altered by many high officials in the different departments at Washington. Such persons should be dismissed from service. If the appointing power fails to act, the House of Representatives should give attention to this dereliction of duty;

(d) It is with a deep sense of pride that we endorse the courageous attitude of the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and American Veterans of World War II in their demand to have the Acheson-Hiss group removed from control of the Department of State. The betrayal at Yalta was and is a scourge to civilization. Giving control to the Russians of all the land around Berlin is another evidence of the perfidy or incompetence of those in charge of this branch of our Government;

(e) Impractical dreamers and radicals have reached such a position of power and influence in Washington that two members of the United States Supreme Court take the stand in behalf of persons who would aid our enemies, thereby disqualifying themselves to sit on appeal of that criminal case which involved disloyalty to our Government, a precedent which may have far-reaching implications and consequences in the many cases of this nature which will likely be presented to this high Court. We assert that the Congress and the American Bar Association should take appropriate action in matters of this character;

(f) The American people were amazed when they learned that the Commander in Chief of our Armed Forces asserted that the United States Marine Corps had a propaganda machine almost equal to that of Josef Stalin, probably the most despicable person in current world affairs. We hold that it is a prime duty of everyone having official connection with our Armed Forces to build up the morale and esprit de corps rather than to bring discord and disunity to those who have and who are now serving with distinction and pride to all loyal Americans. In contrast, no marine has ever used the phrase, "Dear old Uncle Joe."

SALUTE TO GENERAL MACARTHUR

Whereas the sudden and unprovoked attack upon South Korea, where our Government only had a small force with light equipment to meet 10 times their number supported by heavy tanks, it was evident that our troops would be obliged to retire until reinforcements could be brought from over the seas; and

Whereas the limited forces of this small army were so skillfully deployed, shifted from sector to sector, to hold back the hordes pouring in from three directions, so that finally the flood was stayed although only a small beachhead remained to prevent another Dunkerque: Therefore be it

Resolved by the national encampment of the United Spanish War Veterans in convention assembled at Atlantic City, N. J., September 24 to 28, 1950, That they salute that master of military strategy, Gen. Douglas MacArthur, and the gallant foot and air soldiers, the marines and sailors, who under such adverse conditions finally reestablished their lines, and then in true American military precision marched forward, and by their determination, their courage and valor, fully and completely upheld the finest traditions of the American soldier and sailor. Thus again the Republic of the United States and the free nations of the world have been reassured that American genius, civilian and military, when joined and coordinated, can be depended upon to prevent world slavery.

Personal Combat on Korean Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES B. BROWNSON
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. BROWNSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I would like to include a letter to the editor, printed in the Indianapolis Star on Saturday, May 5, 1951. This letter, it seems to me, uses the age-old method of telling a story effectively by parable, and points up the present discussion of the U. N. and the United States lack of policy in Korea:

PERSONAL COMBAT ON KOREAN PLAN

To the EDITOR OF THE STAR:

A few days ago Lum Lynne, a neighbor of mine, a big, flabby, awkward, overbearing scoundrel, made an unexpected and unprovoked attack on me. While he was slugging me furiously and rather effectively with both fists, I was doing very well with one hand—my right hand—behind my back. Once in a while I was even able to gain some ground, although I lost as often as I gained.

Finally Arthur, a meddlesome, insubordinate member of my household, shouted from the window, "Use both hands, Sam. If you do you'll win, and the fight will soon be over."

"Hold your tongue," I shot back. "I'm doing this. If I use both hands he'll get mad and we're liable to get into a fight." "You're already in a fight," shouted the voice from the window.

"Mind your own business," I retorted. "Can't you see it's only a half fight? That's the way I want to keep it. If I use both fists we're liable to get into a whole fight, an all-out fight, and somebody might get hurt. Besides, I don't need any of your advice."

RUSSELL E. TUCKER.

TERRE HAUTE.

P. S.—I did finally use both fists, and I won, but that wasn't in any way a concession to Arthur's advice or point of view, as I was already considering using this plan before he butted in with his asinine suggestion.

Let's Look at Their Records

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, a Pacific coast weekly, the Argonaut, published at San Francisco, in its April 20, 1951, issue made an interesting and appropriate presentation of the records of President Truman and General MacArthur, as follows:

LET'S LOOK AT THEIR RECORDS

(To avoid rash judgments born of hysteria, it is best to look at the records of the Commander in Chief of the United States Armed Forces and of the subordinate whom he fired. Conclusions reached after such a search are basically sound. With this in mind, we briefly review the careers of Harry S. Truman and Douglas MacArthur, setting their histories side by side so that they can be compared and weighed fairly.)

PRESIDENT HARRY S. TRUMAN, COMMANDER IN CHIEF OF THE UNITED STATES ARMED FORCES

Born April 8, 1884, Lamar, Mo.

Attended public schools in Independence, Mo. Worked for Kansas City Star, 1901; was a railroad timekeeper and bank clerk to 1905.

Rejected by West Point Military Academy for poor eyesight.

Worked on his father's farm from 1906 to 1917.

Entered field artillery school at Fort Sill, Okla., 1917; became a captain of Thirty-fifth Division, AEF, in World War I; discharged a major in 1919 and is now a colonel in the Field Artilley Reserve.

He went into the haberdashery business in Independence after the war. Failed.

He became judge of Jackson County court with the support of Boss Tom Pendergast; attended Kansas City School of Law, 1923–25 (then 39). Did not graduate.

Although still supported by Tom Pendergast machine, was defeated for reelection as judge.

Through the support of the notorious Pendergast machine, was elected United States Senator November 6, 1934; and through support of same Boss Pendergast, was reelected November 5, 1940. Was little heard of except during brief term as chairman of an investigating committee of war expenditures.

In 1944 he ran for Vice President with Franklin D. Roosevelt, being a substitute for Henry Wallace, and only after his name was screened by Sidney Hillman, labor leader.

As Vice President, flew to Kansas City to attend the funeral of Boss Tom Pendergast, ex-convict, in United States Army bomber, saying at the time, "He was my friend, and I stick by my friends."

Became President on the death of Franklin D. Roosevelt, April 12, 1945, and, among first official acts, attended meeting at Potsdam, where he charmed Joseph Stalin with his piano playing. On his return he was quoted as saying, "I like good old Joe (Stalin)."

February 1946, nominated Edwin Pauley, California oil man, for Under Secretary of Navy in part payment of a political debt, but nomination was defeated.

August 5, 1948, Truman denounced congressional investigation into Soviet spy ring as a "red herring," renewing his charge even after startling revelations of Whittaker Chambers of "pumpkin patch" files and Alger Hiss' treachery.

Reelected in November 1948, he nominated Dean Acheson in January 1949, a known appeaser of communism and friend of Alger Hiss, to succeed Gen. George C. Marshall as Secretary of State. Then appointed Louis A. Johnson as head of joint Armed Forces, who proceeded to scuttle plans for bigger Navy. But Truman's choice of Senator Mon Wallgren (a discredited, defeated Governor of Washington) as head of National Security Resources Board was rejected by the Senate.

May 9, 1949, remarked "There are too many Byrds" in Congress.

August 11, 1949, Albert Gross testified at Senate 5-percenter hearings that he had sent deep freeze to Truman's Independence home.

Called a Washington correspondent an s. o. b. for his revelations about his aide's (Gen. Harry Vaughan) dealings with 5-percenters.

Threatened to "punch a half dozen newspapermen in the nose" after his retirement.

Sent note to music critic threatening to kick him in a tender and unprintable spot for his criticism of Truman's daughter's singing.

Called Senator FULBRIGHT'S investigation of RFC loans "asinine."

Fired his subordinate, Gen. Douglas MacArthur, because he "failed to support the Government's [foreign] policy," which is a deep mystery to allies and foe alike.

GEN. DOUGLAS MAC ARTHUR

This is the man Commander in Chief Truman fired.

Born January 26, 1880, Arkansas. His father was Lt. Gen. Arthur MacArthur.

Entering West Point Military Academy, he graduated with highest honors in the school for 50 years in 1903, and since has received honorary degrees from the University of Maryland, University of Pittsburgh, University of Philippines, University of Wisconsin, Harvard, Seoul University of Korea, University of Hawaii, Columbia University, and University of Queensland (Australia) among others.

Starting as a second lieutenant in 1903, he climbed rapidly to the rank of brigadier general in June 1918, and to that of full general on November 21, 1930. In World War I he commanded the famous Rainbow Division (Forty-second).

During First World War he participated in the battles of Luneville, Baccarat, Champagne, Marne, Aisne-Marne, St. Mihiel, Essey, Meuse-Argonne, and Sedan. He was twice wounded in action in 1918, and was with the army of occupation in Germany from 1918 to 1919.

Returning to the United States, he was made Superintendent of the United States Military Academy at West Point.

Two years later he was sent to the Philippines.

He became Chief of Staff of the United States Army in 1930, remaining until 1935, when he became military adviser to the Commonwealth Government of the Philippines.

Retiring from active duty on December 31, 1937, he was brought back into service on July 26, 1941, when he was named commander of Armed Forces in the Far East with the rank of general.

Before Bataan fell, he was ordered to Australia, and managed to sneak through the net of Japanese warships to that country in a PT boat. It was upon landing in Australia that he made his famous promise "I will return" to the Philippines, something he subsequently did in a brilliant series of maneuvers which included island hopping.

In 1942, he was made supreme commander of all air, land, and sea forces of the Allies in the far Pacific.

As supreme Allied commander, he accepted the Japanese surrender on the battleship Missouri in August 1945, and he has remained in Japan as its administrator since that time.

Among the many honors he has received are the DSC (with two oak leaf clusters), DSM (three oak leaf clusters), Purple Heart, Silver Star, Navy Distinguished Service Medal, Bronze Star, Air Medal, Grand Officer of the Legion of Honor, Croix de Guerre with four palms, Legion of Honor, Commander Order of the Crown (Belgium); War Cross (Italy); Grand Cross Order of the White Lion (Czechoslovakia); Grand Cross Military Merit (Mexico); Distinguished Service Star (Philippines), and a host of other honors, enough, in fact, to fill this page.

As supreme commander of the Allied Powers in Japan, General MacArthur has hung up an amazing record. About the people, he said: "Of the Japanese people, I can pay no higher tribute than to repeat that they have fully and faithfully fulfilled their surrender commitments and have well earned the freedom and dignity and opportunity which alone can come with a restoration of a formal peace."

If the Japanese people have made this extraordinary progress, it is because of the sympathy and understanding and efficient administration of Gen. Douglas MacArthur. Little wonder that they shed tears upon hearing the tragic news of his dismissal.

Can Our Republic Live on a Doctrine of False Information?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend heretofore granted, I am inserting an article by David Lawrence which appeared in the Evening Star of May 9, 1951. The doctrine enunciated by Secretary of Defense Marshall in the first paragraph of the article, if it be true, is Russian policy and philosophy, not that of a representative republic such as our forebears established:

AS WAR OF ATTRITION DRAGS ON—MARSHALL ENUNCIATES DOCTRINE THAT THE MILITARY MUST BE LOYAL TO DEMOCRATIC ADMINISTRATION

(By David Lawrence)

Secretary of Defense George Marshall has enunciated in his testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee the astounding doctrine that the minority party in Congress is not entitled to full and truthful answers from officers in the armed services and that, in answering letters of inquiry, officers must be guided by their first loyalty to the Democratic administration, which he calls the "constituted authority."

Under such circumstances, it seems improbable that any testimony from the Joint Chiefs of Staff or any other military officers hereafter could contain a single word of information which could possibly reflect on the Democratic administration.

Senator BRIDGES, of New Hampshire, Republican, endeavored to pin Secretary Marshall down to whether an officer's first loyalty is to his country or to the administration in power, and the Secretary insisted that the only way an officer could express himself when he felt the interests of his country were at stake was to resign from the military service. A man must sacrifice his career if he wants to tell his views to Members of Congress. This will not be good news to men in the fighting services who thought that party politics was not to be considered in relations with their Government—and who had been taught to consider Congress a civilian branch of the Government, coordinate with the executive branch.

More significant, however, in Mr. Marshall's testimony was his revelation of what critics in Congress already are saying is the administration's appeasement plan in the Far East. The Secretary stated that the unification of North and South Korea has been set up as a political rather than a military objective of the U. N.

The same phrasing was used by Secretary of State Acheson in a speech a few days ago to the Chamber of Commerce of the United States and, by instruction of the State Department, the same wording also was uttered recently in an address by Warren Austin, American Ambassador to the U. N.

It means that while the United States Government will continue to oppose recognition of Red China and also the turning over of Formosa to Red China, the other members of the U. N. will have to decide the issue. The United States Government, through Secretary Acheson, has already made it clear that no veto power will be used and that America will abide by what the majority of other members of the United Nations wish to do. If they want to reward the aggressor and ease the sacrifices of American troops in Korea, the United States will accept the appeasement.

This means that the 38th parallel may again be the boundary between North and South Korea and that the U. N. will try by diplomacy to get unification but that, if Russia and China refuse to accept it, then, assuming a cease fire has occurred, the fighting will not be resumed. This is because the U. N. feels it is not committed to accomplish the objectives in Korea by military means.

The Marshall testimony has produced a wave of questioning and criticism in the Senate committee. He will be on the stand for several days. He has not yet satisfactorily explained how the administration intends to end the war in Korea or why it now sets up the bogey of Russian intervention in the war when it had no such fear last June at the time the orders went to General MacArthur to land forces in Korea.

President Truman, on the other hand, has, through his latest speech, notified Russia that America is so afraid of having its cities bombed that it will not take maximum steps to stop the aggression in the Far East. Mr. Truman says that, if the United States were to widen the conflict in Asia, "we might well have to go it alone."

Yet that's what has been happening, in effect, since last June. The United States alone—outside of the South Koreans—has been supplying virtually all the troops. The U. N. has refused to send reinforcements. The principal U. N. members have only token representation on the firing line. Instead of winning allies, America has, as a practical matter, been deserted already by its allies with respect to Korea.

The President's speech might be construed to mean that he has lost faith in the willingness of our allies to support our troops in the Far East. As a consequence, the question of withdrawing American troops from Korea is bound to be raised. For, as one Senator said, it doesn't help to point out how many Red Chinese are being killed—what's important is how many American boys are being killed and wounded while the so-called war of attrition drags on.

Pay of Postal Employees

REMARKS
OF
HON. LAURIE C. BATTLE
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. BATTLE. Mr. Speaker, I am very much concerned about the problem that is confronting the postal employees today. Since the start of the war in Korea on June 25, 1950, the cost of living has increased by some 14 points. This has created a very serious situation for employees on a fixed salary basis. Price Stabilization Director Michael DiSalle has pointed out that the cost of living will probably increase another five or six points before it is finally checked. The wholesale price index has increased 17.2 since the Korean war started. This is a very reliable index as to what will happen to the general price index.

Congressman GEORGE MILLER, of California, has introduced H. R. 244, and a number of our other colleagues in the House have introduced similar bills. I hope that the Post Office and Civil Service Committee will start hearings on these bills in the immediate future, and that we will be given an opportunity to take action on them without delay.

The mail I am receiving from my district from postal employees points up the harsh fact that their pay checks no longer cover the necessary living costs. This situation is particularly acute for employees in the lower salary grades. When Public Law 134 was passed in 1945, the five pay grades then in existence were increased to 11. While the employees then in the postal service were given a $400 increase, the entrance salary for those who entered after the effective date of that act remained at $1,700. Due to the many increases in the cost of living since that time, we have passed several other pay bills. The group of employees in the lower pay grades, however remain far behind in their struggle to maintain an adequate standard of living.

As my postal friends know, I have been working for some time to abolish inequities, particularly in the lower salary bracket, by eliminating the first four grades. We were able to get some of the objectives of my bill, H. R. 138, of the Eighty-first Congress, incorporated into Public Law 428, which eliminated the first two grades and allowed a much needed increase in salaries. This does not go far enough to solve the problem.

When Public Law 134 was passed, it was assumed that the recruiting of personnel in the postal service would come largely from youngsters just out of high school. Since World War II, the vast majority of employees entering the postal service have been veterans of World War II. They are men with family obligations. They cannot cope with present prices on the salaries they are now receiving. We must recognize the fact that employees with a fixed salary have suffered greatly. The postal employees are loyal citizens and efficient public servants.

I do hope that we will have an early opportunity to vote on this much needed upward adjustment in salaries for postal employees, particularly for those in the lower grades.

Salary of General Motors President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERMAN P. EBERHARTER
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Times of April 26, 1951:

GENERAL MOTORS PRESIDENT IS PAID $626,300 IN 1950, RAISE OF $40,200—WILSON'S REMUNERATION TOPS 62 DIRECTORS AND OFFICERS OF BIGGEST UNITED STATES AUTO CONCERN, PROXY STATEMENT TO STOCKHOLDERS SHOWS

Charles E. Wilson, president of the General Motors Corp., earned a total of $626,300 in salary, director's fees and bonus last year from the Nation's largest automotive company. This was $40,200 more than his compensation in 1949.

Mr. Wilson's compensation topped the remuneration list of sixty-two directors and officers of General Motors, which was shown in the proxy statement for the company's annual meeting mailed yesterday to more than 450,000 stockholders. The meeting will be held on May 25 in Wilmington, Del.

The aggregate salary, fees and bonus for the group of directors and officers last year was $11,748,172. This compares with $11,154,454 in 1949, when the group numbered sixty-one.

The 1950 remuneration for Mr. Wilson consisted of $201,300 salary and fees; 1,358 shares of the corporation's common stock at an award value of $45.07 a share, for a total of $61,205, and a cash bonus of $363,795. The bonus of the shares and cash is payable in five equal annual installments.

The remuneration last year for the 62 directors and officers, including Mr. Wilson, amounted to $3,643,672 in salaries and fees; 33,995 shares of common stock at an award value totaling $1,532,155 and $6,572,345 in cash bonuses. Their bonus awards also will be paid over a 5-year period.

According to the proxy statement, the first installment of the 1950 bonus awards was delivered on February 23, 1951, when the closing market price of the common stock on the New York Stock Exchange was $50 a share. The remaining four installments will be paid in the next four Januarys.

The salaries paid by General Motors to its 12 top directors last year ranged from $36,100 for Charles F. Kettering to the $201,300 paid to Mr. Wilson. The Internal Revenue Bureau requires payment of $17,060 in taxes on a net income of $36,100 and approximately $157,000 on an income of $201,300 for a single person with no dependents.

Other top-paid directors, their salaries and bonus awards, are:

Albert Bradley, $161,425 salary and $380,000 bonus; Francis Burke, $101,100 salary and $100,000 bonus; Marvin E. Coyle and Harlowe H. Curtice, each $151,000 salary and $375,000 bonus; Frederic G. Donner, $121,070 salary and $320,000 bonus; Ronald K. Evans, $126,825 and $320,000; Louis C. Goad, $121,000 and $320,000; Edward R. Godfrey, $101,300 and $245,000; John J. Schumann, Jr., $91,200 and $180,000; Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., $48,600. Mr. Sloan and Mr. Kettering get no bonus.

The proxy statement showed that a proposal will be submitted at the annual meeting to limit salaries and bonuses of each of the corporation's top executives to a total of not more than $200,000 a year. This proposal will be offered by three shareholders owning a total of 162 shares.

In recommending to the stockholders that they defeat this proposal, the General Motors board of directors said that good management is hard to find, and that able executives are entitled to sufficient recompense to offset higher Federal income taxes.

Another proposal to be submitted is that the place of the meeting be rotated among Wilmington, New York City, and Detroit. The board also indicated opposition to this proposal.

A Life Devoted to the Service of Others

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL T. DURHAM
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Durham (N. C.) Morning Herald of May 5, 1951:

A LIFE DEVOTED TO THE SERVICE OF OTHERS

Perhaps one of the hardest things a human being can do is to maintain over a long period of time a record of unselfish service to others. The light of the ideal is difficult to follow. But some do follow it, undeviatingly and gloriously to the rich benefit of those they serve.

Such a person is Dr. Mary Sloop, of Crossnore, Avery County, whose selection as American Mother of 1951 was announced in the papers Wednesday. For 40 years, now, she and her husband have devoted their lives to what was when they went to it an underprivileged area. She and her husband have brought healing in their medical practice to people who live in a remote area. They have lighted the lamp of learning in the now widely known Crossnore School. They have led in bringing about economic improvement, in finding vocational opportunities suited to the community, and in reforming farming practices.

Choice as American Mother of 1951 is deserved recognition of a devoted woman—devoted to the people for whom she has labored these four decades. Mrs. Sloop has a daughter, a physician who practices at Crossnore, and a son who maintains a dental clinic for the needy in Avery County. In her own life, and in the inspiration she has given others, may be found the qualities which make her indeed a mother to all that region.

One of the secrets of Dr. Sloop's success is revealed in her reaction to the news of this recognition. She is unconcerned about credit for herself—she finds others to whom she gives it for the achievements at Crossnore. In that unselfishness is the basis for cooperation which makes communities and nations great. An unselfish leader is the greatest of community and national assets. Dr. Mary Sloop is such a leader.

Don't Let It Fool You, Joe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT E. JONES, JR.
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following very fine and timely editorial, Don't Let It Fool You, Joe, from the Decatur Daily of May 6, 1951:

DON'T LET IT FOOL YOU, JOE

There are certainly two distinct classes of thought in the United States when it comes to the war in Korea. There are those who believe we are following the wise course in heading off the Communists in Korea. There are those who believe with equal sincerity that we have no purpose in Korea, that that ill-fated country is no place to stop the Communists. But don't let it fool you, Joe.

There are those who believe taxes should be raised so that preparedness can be paid for as we go. There are others who, with equal sincerity, think taxes are high enough and that more should not be piled upon the people regardless of the purpose. But don't let it fool you, Joe.

When it comes to Federal spending, there are great numbers who think the Federal Government could do a much better job of cutting down on expenses. There are those who are in favor of reducing Federal spending so long as it doesn't hit home, they would like to see the reduction made but prefer the reduction to be made in some other part of the country. But don't let it fool you, Joe.

Then this is the day in which everybody is a fair catch when it comes to investigations, anything from big time crime to the fellow who is "probed" to see if he paid the just amount of income tax. Many are in favor of investigations, so long as the investigations are made in the other fellow's safety deposit box. But don't let it fool you, Joe.

What a mighty debate you can get up over aid to Europe, or Asia, or anywhere else outside the country. Some folks have the idea that so long as aid is going in any direction overseas that the folks over there will sit around and wait for Uncle Sam to show up with a hand-out. Then there is the other side of the debating society, showing with equal clarity that the recovery of Europe is absolutely essential to American well-being. But don't let it fool you, Joe.

Louder than the MacArthur ruckus is the great debate about prices and wages. Every pot is calling the kettle black. It's like the old story, which came first, the chicken or the egg. Everybody is quite certain that his theory for controling inflation is correct, that wages went up first and caused the spiral. And there's the other crowd, certain that prices went up first and caused the tightening of the pocketbook. But don't let it fool you, Joe.

Republicans, Democrats, Dixiecrats, the din of debate is terrific, the front pages are loaded every day, for in this country, Joe, everybody has the privilege of shooting off his mouth. But don't let it fool you, Joe.

You see, you head a mysterious crowd of 200,000,000 more or less intelligent people. At least you have been credited with being a mysterious set, but you'll find, if you'll look hard enough, that you're dealing with a mysterious set. That is, mysterious to you and your way of doing things, Joe.

You should be a politician over here in this country for about a year, or a newspaper editor for a while, or a public servant in any capacity. You would find out just how mysterious are the ways of the American people. But until then, Joe, don't let it fool you.

For the American people enjoy fighting among themselves, they have been doing it a mighty long time for that is the democratic way of getting one thing settled in time to start on another. And when they start on you, Joe, they'll settle you, too. So don't let it fool you, Joe.

You may catch them unprepared in the sense that your ignorant millions are prepared, but Joe, the American people have been prepared ever since this Nation was founded. Their love of freedom prepares them to hold you off, and all your millions, and though they may not have as many guns as you have when the thing starts, they'll have more than you have when it ends and they'll beat your brains out because they love freedom and the right to investigate and debate and disagree with each other.

And if you ever take a punch at them, you'll find out that they have forgotten all about debating and investigating and whether the President is a Republican or a Democrat and whether he plays a piano or a bass horn, and that they have one purpose and for that purpose they will give their sons and daughters and all they possess, just to beat your brains out.

So, Joe Stalin, before it is too late, don't let it fool you, for if you do you and your people will regret it to the end of time, all time.

William H. Fitzpatrick Wins Pulitzer Award

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HALE BOGGS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, the Pulitzer prize is the highest award in journalism. It is particularly significant when it is awarded for editorial writing, because it is in this field where the journalist expresses the highest art of his calling and where the fourth estate interprets and analyzes events and happenings in the light of our republican institutions.

Louisiana was signally honored several days ago when Mr. William H. Fitzpatrick, the editor of the New Orleans States, was named as recipient of the Pulitzer prize of 1950 for editorial writing. Mr. Fitzpatrick was so honored because of a comprehensive series of editorials which he wrote on the so-called genocide convention.

In this series which among other things was incorporated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the editor of the States pointed out the far-reaching effect of such a convention upon our own great Bill of Rights and upon our domestic laws, as well as the division of power between our States and the Federal Government.

This series succinctly analyzes the effect of the proposed covenant and indicates that the editor had spent many hours on research and study; and, while Mr. Fitzpatrick is not a lawyer, he handled the subject with the clarity and the comprehension of one well versed in our constitutional processes.

Mr. Fitzpatrick thus takes his place with a long line of distinguished American writers.

I personally am very proud that he has received this award. Mr. Fitzpatrick is a young man. It was my privilege to attend Tulane University with him, and I am certain that all of his friends are not only proud of the award which has come to him but are equally gratified at the great service that he and the States have performed for our country.

Before I learned of his award, I was reading in the Times-Picayune for Sunday, May 6, his column entitled, "Rights and Lefts," in which he told about the visit to New Orleans of last week of Sir Oliver Franks, the British Ambassador. I was much impressed with his column and had intended to incorporate it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD then. I am doubly pleased to do it now, as one will understand upon reading it his clarity of writing, as well as his forcefulness of expression:

STATES RIGHTS AND LEFTS

(By W. H. Fitzpatrick)

Sir Oliver Franks, the tall, gentle, shy, friendly intellectual who is British Ambassador to the United States, last week put Britain's foreign policy—long range and short—in one clear sentence.

His speeches here in New Orleans were the most important and timely pronouncements any ambassador has made in relation to present-day world events.

And in one of them came this capsule definition of why Britain has suggested the return of Formosa to China and the admission of Red China to the UN:

"Britain recognized Red China because of a fact and not a value."

That, I believe, is the measure of all foreign policy in Britain; it has been the measure for centuries.

Values, moral, philosophical, ethical, must be considered, of course; but facts, the facts as they are and not as they ought to be, are the final decisive factor in the foreign policy of an important ally and friend.

It is necessary, the ambassador believes, that we differentiate between what he called the small sector of disagreement with Great Britain in the whole area of agreement, and in large measure it is talks here were a plea for understanding.

He spoke from his experience as ambassador, a professor of moral philosophy, and permanent secretary of the Ministry of Supply. He left the cloistered quiet of an educator's life to enter government service when World War II began. He knew intimately the charts of the shipping lanes when U-boats were slashing at England's jugular; he was there when lend-lease went in and Bundles for Britain, and when the British loan and the Marshall plan were enacted he was named British Ambassador, the most important gift in his country's giving.

Much of the professor of moral philosophy and much of the secretary of the ministry of supply was apparent in his speeches here. We can accept or reject the British foreign policy in the Far East, but what we cannot reject is his plea for understanding.

The British do not want a war now; it is not that they fear war, but only that they fear the ultimate effects of a war; they fear what it will do to them and to their country.

They know what World Wars I and II cost them: An empire.

The British Empire was a magnificent balance for peace and prosperity for more than two centuries. There was a time when their outposts were safe because the vast power of England was their guaranty. That is no longer the case. Singapore fell in a matter of weeks, and Hong Kong in days during World War II.

I guess it was in 1933 when I first became aware, in a sort of personal way, of the might and spread of England. As an ordinary seaman aboard the Steel Seafarer, I went around the world. And every strategic spot we passed, every tip of land that guarded the dropoff of a continent or the entry to a waterway, except the Panama Canal, was owned by or leased to or controlled by the British.

There was a very good reason for this. You can take three United Kingdoms and fit them into Texas and have room enough for Glen McCarthy too. With a kingdom this small, they had to depend upon trade. To keep trade going steadily, peace was necessary. To keep peace, strategic spots were necessary. England did rather successfully for 200 years what we are trying to do in Korea: Control trouble and keep it from spreading.

Britain has been criticized for Sir Oliver's note to our Government suggesting that Formosa be given to China, and that Red China be allowed a seat in the U. N. It has been suggested that England ought to offer Red China Hong Kong, but England needs Hong Kong. England knows she must have trade to survive.

More than 50 percent of its food and goods is imported. Trade is the United Kingdom's lifeblood and the source of its strength. That is a fact that we must realize in our attempts to compare facts with values.

The professor of moral philosophy may have had some qualms about the Formosa note, but the former minister of supply could not have, from the point of view of Great Britain. There is much talk about understanding our enemies; we had better try to understand our friends, too.

Food for India

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRAZIER REAMS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. REAMS. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein a special press release dated May 10, 1951, by the Government of India, Information Service. This is with reference to the proposed emergency assistance by the United States Government to India in the shape of food grains to relieve the famine victims. Since the report of this release in some of the newspapers omits pertinent parts of Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru's statement, I ask that it be printed in full:

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA,
INFORMATION SERVICES,
Washington, D. C., May 10, 1951.

Replying to a question in Indian Parliament, May 10, regarding the terms and conditions of the proposed United States food aid to India, Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru made the following statement:

"There are two United States bills to give emergency assistance in the shape of food grains to India; one was introduced in the Senate and the other in the House of Representatives. Both bills have undergone considerable change since they were originally introduced. One of these revised bills has been proposed by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations and the other by the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives.

"The Senate bill allots $95,000,000 for grain purchase in the current year, that is, the year ending June 30, 1951, and authorizes the appropriation of an additional sum of $95,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1952. This second part of the aid, however, shall not be made available until after further action by the Congress.

"Both parts are divided on a 50-50 basis, half being a grant and half on credit terms as provided in section III (c) (2) of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948 as amended.

"Assistance in terms of the bill will be available only after an agreement is entered into between India and the United States. It proposes that this agreement should contain certain undertakings insuring distribution of food without discrimination, publicity to the assistance furnished by the United States, and permission for persons designated by the United States to observe the distribution of supplies in India.

"The House committee bill provides emergency food relief on credit terms only in accordance with the provisions of section III (c) (2) of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948 as amended. It authorizes provision of a sum not exceeding $190,000,000 for the fiscal years 1951 and 1952. Repayment of this loan includes payment in goods under such terms and in such quantities as may be agreed to between the ECA Administrator and the Government of India. ECA loans are generally for a period of 33 to 35 years at an interest rate of 2½ percent on unpaid principal with semiannual interest payment. In the present case, it is proposed that the interest payment will begin on June 30, 1952, and the payment on principal some years later, which may be from 5 to 8 years.

"Such conditions as are attached to either of these bills are the usual terms embodied in the United States of America legislation providing for economic assistance to foreign countries. In the Senate bill there are certain conditions which do not find a place in the House bill and much would depend upon manner of implementation of these conditions.

"There is a reference to our supplying various kinds of materials to the United States of America in part payment for the grain supplied. We shall gladly supply such materials as are available in India and can be spared by us. But I should like to make it clear that it is a fundamental part of our foreign policy that such material as is particularly related to the production of atomic or like weapons should not be supplied by us to foreign countries.

"In our view there are no political or discriminatory conditions attached to these two bills and therefore there can be no objection on these grounds to our acceptance of either of them. While the form in which assistance is given to India is a matter for the United States of America to decide, we would prefer the terms embodied in the House bill which are simpler.

"I should like to express our gratitude to the Government of United States of America for the efforts they have made to send food grains to India. I should also like to express our deep appreciation of the messages as well as offers of material help unofficially received from many citizens of the United States."

Proposed Roll-Back on Price of Beef

REMARKS

OF

HON. BEN F. JENSEN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, the 10 percent roll-back which has been imposed on the packing houses in order to reduce the price of beef, and the proposals which we understand are about to be made to roll back beef prices another 9 percent before October 1, have brought about a condition among the cattle feeders of the Nation which does not warrant those people feeding cattle so long as this roll-back is in effect. Naturally, the production of beef will be reduced to a great degree and food prices, instead of being lessened, will be increased.

The following letters and telegrams will explain some of the reasons why:

RED OAK, IOWA, May 9, 1951.

Hon. BEN F. JENSEN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.:

Am taking 185 cattle off grain today. Unable to feed grain under controls considering present costs and crop conditions. Do something.

H. V. FELT.

NODAWAY, IOWA.

GRISWOLD, IOWA, May 8, 1951.

Hon. BEN F. JENSEN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.:

This price roll-back on beef has rolled me back $6,000 on 140 head of cattle. In order not getting rolled again I quit. It seems very unfair. Industry with their roll ahead and cutting quality is getting along very well. The beef producer cannot reduce quality. Demands are of this beef be loaded with corn.

B. F. ANDERSON.

FRED SIEVERS & SON,
Audubon, Iowa, May 5, 1951.

Hon. BEN F. JENSEN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. JENSEN: In view of the events which have occurred the past week, I feel that it is my duty, as well as my privilege, to write you as the Congressman from my district. When an order as severe and discriminatory as the price roll-back on beef is issued, it is bound to have opposition from the enormous industry it affects. Considering none of the other phases of beef production, with their added restrictions and problems, I'd like to present my side, as a cattle feeder whose only occupation and source of income is producing pounds of beef for the consumer. It is my opinion that this occupation involves considerable know-how and risk of investment and deserves just consideration.

It is difficult to understand how the CPS economists figure that any industry can stand a price roll-back of 18 percent, which is proposed for beef by October 1, without losing money. The beef producer has not been making excess profits, and unless his costs are reduced proportionately this will bankrupt him. For example, I just purchased, in March, 300 head of high-quality feeder steers at a cost of 36¼ cents per pound. These cattle will not be finished for market for 6 or 8 months, at least, at which time, under the present set-up, they will be worth about 33 cents top price. If I am forced to market them before this time to escape the lower roll-backs I will be cut down because of the lack of finish and consequently lose money there, too. Cattle of this type are fed for prime meat and are not profitable as short-feds. You can easily see how the many cattle feeders, such as myself, in Audubon County and elsewhere, will be affected. The feeders on every farm have been purchased at record prices, are being fed, and will continue to be fed at high cost.

It looks as if the only result can be a reduced incentive to produce and fatten beef and the marketing of light, unfinished cattle. This in turn means less meat for the consumer, possible rationing, and the return of the old black-market profiteering for some. This is exactly opposite to the purpose of the roll-back, which is more, lower-priced meat.

I shall appreciate your consideration of this matter, and I know you will act as you see fit.

Very respectively,

FRED SIEVERS, Jr.,

MASSENA, IOWA, May 6, 1951.

Congressman BEN F. JENSEN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. JENSEN: I am writing to you in regard to the price roll-back on cattle which means the difference between a fair price for our grain and labor and a loss at the roll-back price.

We operate 400 acres of good Iowa land and feed twice as much grain as we produce to cattle and hogs.

If we have to take a loss on these cattle that are in the feed lot, we will assure you that we will not replace them until the freeze is lifted.

We are reducing our corn acreage and our hired labor and plan to feed only what grain we raise which will greatly reduce our operating expenses.

This will produce about 40 percent the tonnage of meat we usually produce.

If a meat shortage occurs, we will not consider a subsidy payment to produce more.

Please use your influence to revoke this freeze order.

Yours very truly,

DANIEL E. BOWER.

P. S.—This roll-back in production also means a roll-back in the demand for manufactured goods.

SHENANDOAH, IOWA, May 8, 1951.

Congressman BEN JENSEN,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE CONGRESSMAN JENSEN: I feel it is my duty, as a citizen and taxpayer, to write you with reference to the Office of Price Stabilization's new directive, forcing a roll-back on prices of live cattle and dressed meats; also, proposed ceilings.

First, let me state, having spent a lifetime in the production, feeding, and marketing of livestock in a most extensive way, I believe I have acquired a far greater knowledge of the livestock industry than most of the politicians and bureaucrats in Washington. This program, outlined by Mr. DiSalle, will definitely sabotage the production of our livestock industry at a time when production is most essential. The facts are such an act is definitely unworkable and un-American.

Congressman JENSEN, I ask of you, as a Representative of the people of this district, to oppose the reenactment of article 4 of the Defense Production Act, which provides for price and wage control, as it is of the most vital importance that this Nation, the greatest on earth, shall continue to progress with free enterprise and not to have our welfare dictated by any one man or group of men who are seeking control of the entire Nation.

Yours very respectfully,

IOWA FEEDING CO
By F. L. KELLY.

LIVESTOCK FOUNDATION OF OMAHA,
Omaha, Nebr., May 8, 1951.

Congressman BEN JENSEN,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN JENSEN: In my work here at the Omaha market, I talk each day to 40 to 50 livestock growers and feeders—in the course of a year, to thousands.

In 11 years of this work, first at Sioux City and the past 4 years at Omaha, I have never seen so vast a majority of Midwestern farmers and feeders as resentful and embittered over a Government edict as they currently are over Price Administrator DiSalle's beef cattle and beef price order of April 30.

They are angry and alarmed. They've sent to market many animals not yet ready for slaughter and will send more unless the order is rescinded.

In its May 7 issue, Newsweek magazine carried an inaccurate story on the livestock and meat situation. Enclosed is copy of rebuttal I wired them.

Meanwhile, for the good of the industry and meat consumers as well, please do not renew President Truman's control powers come June 30. He has demonstrated the inability or an unwillingness to use them wisely.

Yours very truly,

HART JORGENSEN

RICHARD M. RUTTER,
Business News Editor,
Newsweek Magazine,
New York, N. Y.:

For a magazine that prides itself on accurate, informative reporting, and which features straight thinkers like Moley and Lindley, your piece on "Slicing the Meat Bill," (p. 63, May 7) is terrifically substandard.

It would appear the author thereof imbibed too deeply of an unlabeled jug containing OPS propaganda. Such as: The Nation's meat industry was in chaos (before the control order). Meat supplies heading for new low. Now a chance to thwart black market. End jag.

For a chaser, try these facts:

1. Prior to first controls on meat prices in January, no channels were short; distribution was normal. And cattle population and cattle-on-feed numbers were at near-record levels and headed higher.

2. Real confusion in the industry did not come till after DiSalle's order of April 28.

3. This week alone (week of April 30–May 4) thousands of unfinished cattle have been rushed to market. Consumers are out millions of pounds in future meat supplies. Packers and feeders alike up in arms over order and holding protest meetings (Washington and Omaha). Consumers not cheering, either, over chance to buy choice sirloin steak come May 20 at $1.14 that last week was advertised in Omaha World-Herald at 89 cents.

4. Shortages of meat, rationing, and black markets now a real prospect—thanks to DiSalle order.

Executive Director,
Livestock Foundation of Omaha.

Time Is Running Out

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.
OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following editorial which appeared in the Newark Evening News, Tuesday, May 8, 1951:

TIME IS RUNNING OUT

In the mass of discussion of how to wage war and how not to wage ware against communism, there is danger of losing sight of our prime national objective, which is not to wage war at all. It is to secure a firm international peace.

There is war in Korea, in defense of a principle, out of which, in some manner not now evident, it is hoped peace in that tortured region will emerge. There is the rearmament of Western Europe, part of the growing strength of the free world, designed to convince the Soviet Union that negotiation among equals is in the general interest.

"We are not engaged in a struggle without end. We are engaged in a struggle which has the definite goal of peace," said President Truman in an address last night on civil defense. That it will be a prolonged struggle is obvious. It is a struggle beset with hazards and hard choices, for example, whether or not to limit the war in the Far East to Korea and, if to limit it, then how to end it; whether the maintenance of a high level of armaments is not, of itself, dangerous to peace.

The answers to such questions as these, which affect the survival of the free world and the future of mankind, cannot be given sound, dogmatic expression. Yet peace is larger in scope than the contrivances erected to capture it. It has often been said since the end of World War II that what the world needs is some supreme act of imagination, of statesmanship, of faith that will tear the chains of war from men's feet and permit their best spirits once more to soar.

General MacArthur, a professional soldier, was never more impressive in his appearances before the Senate hearing than when, at the final session, he argued for the abolition of war. Amidst so much of immediate, current importance, the moving eloquence of what he said has escaped general attention.

Effective disarmament is not enough, said General MacArthur. If war is abolished, no armaments will be needed—nothing except arms for police in given geographical areas.

But let General MacArthur himself speak:

"There was great evidence of that in Japan. You spoke of Hiroshima and Nagasaki. The Japanese people, more than any other people in the world, understand what atomic warfare means. It wasn't academic with them. They counted their dead and they buried them.

"They, of their own volition, wrote into their constitution a provision outlawing war.

"When their Prime Minister, Mr. Shidehara, came to me he said, 'I have long contemplated and believed'—and he was a very wise old man; he died recently—'long contemplated and believed that the only solution to this problem is to do away with war.'

"He said: 'With great reluctance, I advanced the subject to you, as a military man, because I am convinced you would not accept it; but,' he said, 'I would like to endeavor, in the constitution we are drawing up, to put in such a provision.'

"I couldn't help getting up and shaking hands with the old man, and telling him that I thought that was one of the greatest constructive steps that possibly could be taken.

"I told him that it was quite possible that the world would mock him—this is a debunking age, a cynical age, as you know—that they would not accept it; that it would be an object of derision, which it was, that it would take great moral stamina to go through with it, and in the end they might not be able to hold the line, but I encouraged him, and the Japanese wrote that provision in.

"If there was any provision in that constitution which appealed to the popular sentiment of the people of Japan, it was that provision. There was a warrior tribe which, for centuries, had pursued war, and successful war; but the great concept, the losses, the great lessons the bomb had taught them, had been understood. They were trying to apply them.

"The world should have common sense enough, when it surveys the losses of two wars, to understand that war has become a method of suicide for modern civilization.

"I therefore believe that time is running out on us. I said at the end of the Second World War that we have had our last chance. I believe it and I believe that 99 percent of the people of the world believe it."

The mechanics of abolishing war, as General MacArthur well realizes, are difficult. Through the United Nations, or some other forum, General MacArthur would attempt to get an agreement. The great nations would set the norm for if the four or five great powers should agree to abolish war, it would be impossible for others to start one.

General MacArthur would have the United States exercise its moral leadership through a conditional legislative fiat to abolish war, challenging others to follow. Here is a project on which American opinion ought to express itself, for if war is ever to be abolished, the impulse must come from the hearts of the people. Given that kind of demand, perhaps statesmanship, in a supreme act of imagination, could penetrate even behind the iron curtain and into the darkest places in the world.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Evening Star of May 9, 1951:

JOHN KEE

In March 1949 when he succeeded the late Sol Bloom as chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Representative JOHN KEE, of West Virginia, was known to few Americans outside Congress or beyond the borders of his own State. And when death struck him down during yesterday's committee session he was still pretty much of a stranger to the public at large. Yet this quiet, self-effacing man—an excellent lawyer with a keen analytical mind and a gentle spirit that abhorred noisy headline-hunting—was one of the Nation's most devoted servants, a hard-working legislator whose contribution in the international field will surely live on after him as a kind of monument to his name.

For Mr. KEE—a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee throughout all of his 18 years in the House—was an American acutely aware of the dangerous nature of these times and of the problems that the United States had to meet to serve its own best interests. In a unique respect, therefore, he dedicated himself, with a sense of duty and urgency, to international matters. Wholly apart from what he did in the Seventy-ninth Congress to bring about a much-needed reorganization of the Foreign Service, he played a highly constructive wartime and postwar role in helping to persuade his colleagues to enact such historic measures as lend-lease, aid to Greece and Turkey, and the Marshall plan for European recovery.

Although he gave his attention to domestic issues on which he invariably voted in support of the administration, Mr. KEE's overriding and consuming interest was in the work of the Foreign Affairs Committee. Consistently, both before and after he became the committee's chairman, he strove diligently for united, bipartisan action, and he was in no small part responsible for the fact that it was achieved on some of the most far-reaching international legislation in the history of the United States. No fanfare ever marked his efforts, but he has left behind him a genuinely distinguished record in the service of his country.

Standard Oil Sets Record

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERMAN P. EBERHARTER
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Times of April 26, 1951:

STANDARD OIL SETS RECORD IN QUARTER—NEW JERSEY COMPANY EARNS NET OF $118,000,000, AGAINST $65,000,000 YEAR BEFORE—MEETING AGAIN AT LINDEN—TO TAKE PLACE JUNE 8—SHELL OIL SALES AT NEW PEAK IN PERIOD—OTHER CORPORATE REPORTS

The Standard Oil Co. (New Jersey) achieved a new high record in the first quarter, with estimated consolidated net earnings of $118,000,000 after taxes and all charges, according to the report announced yesterday.

In the preceding quarter, ended with December, the company showed earnings of $134,000,000, or $4.42 a share, while $65,000,000, or $2.15 a share, was made in the initial 3 months of last year.

The parent company's stockholders' annual meeting on June 8 will be held again in the boiler shop at the Bayway refinery of the Esso Standard Oil Co. in Linden, N. J. Formal notice of the meeting place was given in the proxy statement mailed yesterday to 220,000 Jersey Standard stockholders. The Bayway building first was used as a meeting place last year, when 1,600 stockholders attended. Shareholders will be invited to inspect the Esso research center, a short distance from the refinery. The latter facility was not yet fully in operation when last year's meeting was held.

Among the various proposals to be presented for action by stockholders at the meeting are a two-for-one stock split, previously announced, an inactive stock option plan whereby up to 300,000 shares could be sold to designated executives of the company and subsidiaries.

Shareholders also will be asked to vote on a proposal under which future meetings could be held either in New Jersey or in New York City. The proxy statement says the board does not contemplate at present any change in the practice of holding stockholder meetings in New Jersey, but merely seeks "greater flexibility."

Address of Hon. Y. T. Pyun, Minister of Foreign Affairs, Republic of Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM G. BRAY
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. BRAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered at the CARE fifth-anniversary luncheon by Y. T. Pyun, Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Korea, May 9, 1951:

You all know that Korea has been unfortunately caught in the global conflict between the world-conquest-dreaming communism and the survival-seeking democracy. She has been caught in the vortex of world disturbance of violence and destruction, quite helpless and unprepared—unprepared except in her indomitable spirit and unswerving determination to die fighting on the side of human freedom. Sometimes I quite dispassionately ask: Had there existed no Korea, would this conflict have been averted? It would have broken out somewhere else, say, in Iran or in Viet-nam or in Burma, or even in India. No matter where the aggression appeared, its nature would have been the same—of Communist global conquest. Any meaningful action on the part of the free world to counteract an aggression of this nature must, therefore, be designed on a global level. No matter where it appears, the aggression must be met firmly and thoroughly with the total weight of the free world. Nothing should stand in our way to a swift and complete military victory. All military half measures should be carefully eschewed, for they are bound to invite further aggression.

We Koreans do not pretend to understand the position so far taken either by England or by India. They look to us like a patient insisting on a "head first" treatment when his hand has been invaded by germs of a deadly disease. We are now fighting England's as well as India's battle in Korea. If we are defeated, the struggle will be carried to their own homes. If we come out victorious, they will have no war at home.

The Soviet Union has deliberately chosen Asia as its first object of conquest. Its very first stroke has been deliberately planted on Korea, a long-coveted strategic point, from which naval operations can be launched to tear up the Pacific traffic of the free world and which will prove an ideal watchtower to keep the whole Orient, including China and Japan, under the domineering glance of the Soviet Union.

To the cool, calculating mind of the Kremlin, the conquest of Western Europe is unthinkable until the vast resources of Asia are consolidated under its domination. The conquest of Asia alone will condition the Kremlin to launch an all-out global conquest. The formula of remedy should appear to be: Balk the Kremlin in the attainment of this prerequisite, and the dreaded thing will never come off. There is every reason that England, doing away with her local-mindedness, should send more troops to Korea now and that India, too, should start sending them. The weak-jointed dinosaur will recede before nothing but a drawn sword. In an indecision-vacuumed atmosphere alone, the Soviet balloon of threat will wax larger.

The level-headed Stalin knows that he lacks oil fuel, that he lacks such mobility as is known in the United States, and that he lacks even the loyalty of his own people and of those of his satellites. Above all, he is well aware that he will have to go without the American lend-lease this time, which played such a decisive role in his successful struggle against Germany. Nothing short of the fear of provoking the United States-led free world into a general war will stop the Stalinist aggression in Asia. That Iran is now confronted with very much the same situation as has developed in Korea may be said to be the direct result of the restricted and therefore indecisive military action in Korea.

Before I end this general survey of the world situation of which the present Korean war is a local manifestation, I should like to draw your attention to the fact that the one unchanging motive behind all the Soviet tactics of playing hot and cold, fast and loose, with the free world, getting it on crisis after crisis and letting it off as often at will is, through series of serious economic dislocations, to create within free nations situations where the Soviet Union can more easily take them over from within. My advice is, therefore, this: Don't you be let down this time; see that the international criminal does not get away unpunished this once, whatever happens.

Now I am coming to relief, at last. Except the few towns of considerable size, located in the area which, from the beginning of the war, has never been harried by the enemy, and which, in area, is not more than one-thirtieth of entire Korea, most of the towns in the bulk of South Korea and the entire North Korea have been taken and retaken by both contending forces and a large number of them have been completely laid waste beyond recognition. Because the United Nations forces have been forbidden to cross the Manchurian border and blow up enemy supply centers, all they have been doing is to pound away to smithereens all buildings and houses that are likely to give shelter to the enemy. Except the few millions who either have remained protected behind the U. N. defense line or have been fortunate enough to filter through it from beyond, the bulk of the Korean people, rendered homeless and uprooted, as it were, out of the soil, wander like clouds over areas made desolate by war and vanish like clouds, exposed to hunger, cold, and man-made demolition. Just think of a full-fledged modern war of hitherto unheard of power of destruction again and again sweeping over such a narrow strip of land like Korea for the last 10 months. Just think of scores of thousands of tons of high explosives smashing up nothing but Koreans. Neither Germany nor Japan, war-torn as they were, can approach the present Korea in stark devastation. The Korean case, in which her allies, in terms of practicalities, seem to have joined hands with her enemies in her own destruction, partly out of regard for her deadly foes, is something tragically unique and unparalleled in human history.

This bleak past lies unrelieved by any immediate bright future. The spring sowing season finds the bulk of agricultural soil untilled and unsowed for lack of work beasts or of farm laborers or of huts that shelter them, or even of seed.

The problems of relief thus posed by a Nation-wide destruction and by an entire nation turned refugees are overwhelming. The united command has been doing all that was humanly possible, but the number of refugees it reached and saved is a mere fraction of the masses who roam homeless and perish as they roam and who perish unseen and unsuccored in remote outlying places. The united command ought not to be expected to attempt relief to the extent of military insecurity. It cannot safely make an outlay sufficient to meet relief demands, either in personnel or in transportation or otherwise. The inexorable demands of military operations, to which the united command is duty bound to give priorities, are apt to make its hands too full for anything like adequate relief for civilians. The need has long been felt for fuller and more active cooperation of all available civilian relief agencies of the free world with the united command and of creation of a far wider opening admitting these civilian agencies more freely into Korea. It is indeed gratifying that CARE plans to make a Nation-wide appeal for Korean relief and spearhead civilian relief activities for the suffering millions in Korea.

In view of the overtaxed military transportation, overtaxed even for military purposes alone, Korean relief, in order to be extensive and Nation-widely penetrating, must be provided with a minimum transportation of its own, both land and sea. Under the circumstances, certain main arteries of land traffic and main harbor facilities are bound to remain exclusive to military purposes. But byways and small ports should be available for relief activities. The civilian relief personnel may need to be men of as much valor as combat teams, very probably of a higher order. They may be irked by the necessary screening exercised by the appropriate authorities. But I do not doubt that the American public once when roused to a very pressing need, will not fail, as it never did in the past, to rise to meet it like one man, sweeping every obstacle or inconvenience before it.

The Korean people are now undergoing a virtual genocide, which should not be unnecessarily complete. The present humanitarian movement you are now setting your hands to, if given momentum promptly enough, will save millions of Koreans who otherwise are doomed to perish. As the Foreign Minister of the Republic of Korea, I feel I must pay tribute also at this time to the American Red Cross, which so instantly responded to my President's plea for help soon after the invasion of June 1950. I am gratified to learn that the American Relief for Korea Committee is actively engaged in this humanitarian effort to relieve the suffering of the Korean people. I will always remember you in my prayers that God may speed your worthy efforts to instantaneous fruition.

I started out to give you a general view of the Korean situation, and it may not be out of place here to suggest to you the outstanding needs other than that of relief. I will briefly enumerate four more needs without troubling you as to their order in importance.

Korea is badly in need of financial aid, distinct from economic aid, that will go to stabilize her now fast-crumbling finance. It is true that she has a balanced budget, but balanced on paper only. All sound budgets are based on assured national revenues. Almost all the Korean sources of revenue lie shattered and disrupted by the war. A complete measure of rehabilitation alone will restore them, but that is not forthcoming under the circumstances. What was opportunely done for Greece to bolster its finance must be done now for Korea.

Another need for Korea is more arms for the pending military expansion program. We do not object to rearming Japan, so long as Japanese are not brought over to Korea to fight in our place. To say the least, it will help Korean Communists strut as patriots fighting the age-long Korean enemy, and, at the same time, dishearten the ROK forces so as to lower their fighting morale. Nor do we relish the idea of having the Chinese Nationalist troops among the U. N. forces now fighting in Korea, for we know that they can be more profitably used elsewhere, when the occasion arises. What we lack is arms, not manpower. It will be a grievance to Korea, if she is denied the chance of contributing more manpower to the cause of human freedom—the only contribution she can make as far as circumstances allow her now.

The fourth need is for technically training as many intelligent young Koreans as possible. In view of the fact that what scanty trained Korean personnel we had before have been mostly captured, killed, or incapacitated during the present war, any long-range plan for Korea cannot overlook the crying need of an extensive training program, without which any rehabilitation of an enduring nature is impossible. It is wrong to keep them all in Korea. There are not arms enough to go around. Nor are there any munition factories to absorb their energies and make them contribute to war efforts. I personally do not see the sense of letting them rot by slamming the door upon them that leads them abroad for qualifying them for services of no less value to the nation than fighting. Anyway, they cannot all fight.

Against the thousands of Japanese receiving technical training in this country, there are an ever-dwindling number of Korean youths given the same academic benefits, mere dozens for the year. Considering the disparity of technical attainment existing between the two peoples under discussion, the reverse of the ratio would seem fair. The training of Korean industrial personnel should be given more candid consideration. I regard it to be one of the obligations of the free world to train and conserve an adequate number of Korean young men in the industrial way.

Lastly, I call your attention to the peremptory need of perpetuating in the proposed Japanese peace treaty in clear terms the present high seas demarcation between Korea and Japan, known as the MacArthur line. The line was instituted for sound reasons which will grow sounder as Japan gets out of the occupation status. From the immemorial times up to the opening up of Korea for world trade, it was the Japanese fishing boats that incessantly harried and plundered hamlets and towns on the Korean coast, which eventually paved the way for the Hideyoshi invasion, the greatest national calamity known in our history. In future, Japanese fishing boats will probably find it advisable to refrain from downright vandalism, but, if allowed to come close enough to Korean territorial waters, they might easily turn into moving bases for smuggling so as to nip the viability of Korean economy in the bud.

I do personally know of cases where large Japanese fishing boats, infringing the MacArthur line, attempted to butt Korean naval patrols into the sea. It is the established practice with the small Korean fishing vessels to scurry away into safety whenever powerful Japanese ships are sighted on their side of the demarcation, for they know there is always the treacherous sea to bear the Japanese blame of foundering them unseen by law. The abolishment of the line would mean not only stymying the nascent Korean fishing enterprise but also placing entire Korean economy at the mercy of Japanese commercial aggression. While Korea is quite prepared to see Japan restored to its rightful place among the family of nations, she cannot afford to consent to any agreement or nonagreement, for that matter, that leaves open an avenue, through which Japan can dictate the very subsistence of Korea. Korea cannot be persuaded to forego the only and real safeguard she has against the possible Japanese economic aggression.

To sum up, penetrating relief, economic aid designed to bolster her finance, ample arms for her military expansion, candid training program for her industrial personnel and eternal high-seas safeguard stipulated in an international instrument will certainly help lay the foundation for peace in the Far East.

In Bataan, people from two different races fought their common foe, interlocked in comradeship and common ideals. In the world Bataan called Korea the brave sons of numerous free nations blend their honored ashes in an everlasting covenant of cooperation for one single end—the preservation of free ways of life—which, we fervently hope, will be strengthened with time. Remember that, in this case, there is no world Australia for a military comeback. The free world cannot afford a retreat from this world Bataan.

Korea is a unique exception. Of all small peoples, she is the only one that boldly threw her lot with the free nations, under most unimaginable circumstances of adversity. Proportionately in terms of sacrifice, she has contributed most of all to the cause of human freedom. It may be no more than the widow's mite. But it is also true that she has dedicated all to the cause which she can call her own.

Whether Korea was wise in putting up a heroic fight against communism, alias decivilization, or the now Soviet satellites were comparatively wiser in succumbing to communism unresisting will be eventually decided by the part played by the free world in the wartime relief as well as in the postwar rehabilitation of Korea. If the direction now being pointed to by CARE is persistently and intensively pursued, Korea, I am certain, will stand, not a battered tomb of freedom, but a proud monument enternally bearing witness to the triumph of free human will.

Address of Hon. Lewis Preston Collins

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WATKINS M. ABBITT
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. ABBITT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following excerpts from the address of Hon. Lewis Preston Collins, Lieutenant Governor of Virginia, at the Virginia Day Luncheon of the Women's National Democratic Club, Washington, D. C., April 5, 1951:

Madame President, Madame Toastmistress, and my friend Mrs. Killinger, you have been very gracious and kind to Mrs. Collins and me; and first, I should like to express our gratitude to you for the kindness and courtesy which you have shown us; and then to this club and to its guests, may I say that the invitation to speak to you today is an extremely flattering one and affords a privilege which I shall long remember, challenging as it is.

What is a Virginian to say on Virginia Day to the Woman's National Democratic Club in the city of Washington which would not be applauded by these, misunderstood and misinterpreted by those, or classed as immodest and egocentric by the others. It is a challenging privilege under such circumstances to be your guest speaker and the temerity with which to proceed arises only out of a consciousness of the broad mind, generous spirit, tolerance and good will of every true Democrat, especially the beautiful, attractive and tender individualistic feminine Democrat. Your speaker feels at home here in this detached part of Virginia, with the kindred democratic spirits assembled here, regardless of the varying and vacillating interpretations of our democratic tenets and of the political and economic philosophy of the party. Such, however, are permitted to Democrats under our unwritten rules and by tacit understanding, in proportion of the number of members comprising the Democratic Party. The privilege so to vary and vacillate and fully to discuss these variables and vacillations is one of the virtues of our party and may prove to be its salvation. It would be a wonderful renaissance if each of us here and now would simply accept the Jeffersonian interpretation of democracy which constitutes the basic concepts striven for in Virginia; pledge eternal allegiance thereto; support a Democratic Party movement to find a nationally prominent Democrat of kindred views—our Virginia views—make him our leader and win against our traditional rival in the conflict now brewing, and which lies just ahead. This would be in keeping with the Democratic way of leadership, its history, precedents, and tradition. Is this provincial egotism—or is it humorous—or is it the product of wisdom? The true evaluation lies with each of you as a Democrat.

A lady from my town moved to western Texas and had resided there for 32 years; finally at one of the clubs, she met a fellow townslady of 40 years' residence; said the Texas lady: "How long have you been here?" The Virginian replied: "For 32 years." The Texan related the 40-year duration of her residence, implying that such duration was required in this city in order socially to qualify for the finals—and flashed a well arched eyebrow for punctuation. The Texan daughter-in-law of the Virginian interposed: "Well, she is just visiting here." So, you see Virginians are expected to remain Virginians always; we can emigrate; and yet we must remain native; this is a congenital propensity, and is so accepted."

Someone has written a book titled "Virginia Is a State of Mind." It is just that. You must not judge us too harshly because we enjoy blackeyed peas and hog jowl on New Year's Day for it is really a splendid delicacy for regular diet and is growing in popularity, and then it augurs good luck as well; the very best is sometimes confusing for a long while and its significance misunderstood; but ultimately the crucible of time will assize truth; for this is the way under an ever-broadening capacity to participate in democratic government; truth is eternal, and so are blackeyed peas and hog jowl.

You should not get angry with us if we still insist that Robert E. Lee did not surrender at Appomattox on April 9, 1865; for we in Virginia yet believe that the individual and his progress and liberty are the supreme considerations of government, and must be protected against ultracentralization and the tyrannies which follow in its wake to destroy individual liberty and opportunity. In this relation we believe in a division of powers, as a fundamental and enduring counterpoise against tyranny, regardless of interruptions due to political and economic expediency, in liberty's eternal struggle to dignify the individual. We in Virginia flatter ourselves, not unduly I hope, in the belief that Jefferson, Madison, Washington, and other Virginians played a bit of a part in the establishment of our representative democracy under a constitution for a wise purpose. We believe that this purpose was and is the perpetuation of a government with which to insure the largest measure of opportunity and happiness to the individual, free from social, economic, political and religious tyranny. Tyranny has never failed in the long course of history to flow from all forms of government. Thus the founders devised safeguards, under a constitution of limitation and division of power, delegated authority and of insured basic liberties; these considerations are indigenous to Virginia and Virginia clings to these principles which are so much a part of her heritage—and thus a part of herself.

Yes, we in Virginia are old fashioned just like the Virginia lady way out in Texas; even a Texan knew she would ever remain Virginian; and while our Democratic Party may stray far from home for a political visit, we in Virginia have the faith to believe that our party—the party of each and every one of us—will come back home to imperishable, everlasting and immutable political truth, instead of pursuing the easy, expedient and politic way which deludes, deceives and insidiously destroys.

Each of us has the challenge as a Democrat within the Democratic Party itself to regenerate, rededicate and resuscitate the fundamental truths of the Democratic way. Republicans could not do this. Such truths not only constitute the basic philosophy of our Government but embody the yearning of the individual as well, regardless of his or her social, political, ethnological, economic or religious status.

In Virginia we believe in freedom from debt; we believe that government must be run as a private business is run; we believe in buying only that for which we can pay, however enticing the purchase may be. We believe in hard, not soft, dollars; we believe that the life, health and safety of the private individual are above the greed of either management or labor and that public utilities related to the life, health and safety of the individual should be required under State sovereignty to protect life, health and safety of the individual; we believe in honesty in government, and that public office is in fact a public trust demanding morality, personal honesty, ethics and legal responsibility.

The Democratic Party has forever been the party of leadership in the hours of national travail and international crisis; we have had in the past the capacity somehow to preserve the fundamentals of government and yet meet the economic and social trends and tensions which have threatened us. So, today we as a great national party have got to meet our challenge and make the decision whether or not we are going to lead down the road to socialism with destruction of the individual, private enterprise, and the capitalistic system in an effort to equalize material enjoyment under government; or are going to accept the basic philosophy—unchanging and enduring as it is, that the function of government is to guarantee to the individual and private business the fullest opportunity to evolve upward socially, financially and otherwise. This decision is ours to make as a great national party; and if our country is to survive and if we as a party are to survive and remain dominant, I believe in my heart that we shall have to go back to the faith of our fathers some of whom at least came from just south of the Potomac; and there perhaps a modern disciple of these fundamentals and a national leader within our party might be found who could lead us not only to victory but to a Jeffersonian renaissance as well. Thus we as Democrats can again lead in a sorely needed national regeneration.

The pendulum is swinging; and wise political decision and true statemanship indicate and demand our course as a great national party. Shall we accept the challenge?

Will We Forget Iran?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK E. SMITH
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, many of us are greatly disturbed about the apparent lack of any coordinated effort to prevent the Soviet from placing Iran inside the Communist curtain.

I am inserting, under unanimous consent, the following article from the Charlotte News and Observer on our Middle East policy:

THE POT BOILS OVER WHILE CHEFS WATCH OTHER COOKING

(By Joseph Alsop)

ATHENS.—It is easy to sum up the impression of American policy making that is left by a tour in the Middle East and eastern Mediterranean. Evidently the men who make our national policy are like distracted cooks confronting an enormous stove covered with dozens of different pots, all bubbling away simultaneously. The cooks only watch the most conspicuous pots—Western Europe, for example. The other pots get no attention until they either scorch or boil over.

Even from the perspective of Athens, it is all too clear that Iran must now be placed in the category of pots that have boiled over, like China in the past. When this reporter left Tehran, the American and British motto was that "time would cure all things, and that in time an agreed settlement of the oil nationalization issue could be arranged with the Iranian Government." Even then, it seemed that time was more likely to produce an explosion than a settlement, unless the Foreign Office and State Department could concert strong preventive measures.

The explosion has now occurred with the political triumph of the National Front leader, Dr. Mohammed Mussadegh, an aged extremist who lives in a private world of violent dreams. With Dr. Mussadegh as Prime Minister, it is pretty safe to predict that one of two things will have happened in Iran within the next few days. Either the British will have moved troops into southern Iran (presumably flying them from Suez) in order to protect their oil properties, or the Iranian extremists will have seized the British oil properties by main force.

In addition, there are signs that Dr. Mussadegh is contemplating a deal with the Soviet Union, and that the Shah, the only relatively stable element in Iranian politics, is again planning to flee. Certainly it is childishly unrealistic to talk about negotiating with Dr. Mussadegh, as Foreign Secretary Morrison has been talking. A minor disaster is the best result that can now be hoped for from the long-neglected Iranian situation; a major disaster, engulfing all the vital region of the Middle East, is all too possible.

Moreover, there is the crucial problem of the Mediterranean command. Until recently, it was thoroughly taken for granted that Admiral Robert Carney would be the Mediterranean commander of the future. Carney even journeyed to Ankara and Athens to discuss liaison arrangements. If Admiral Carney were given the Mediterranean command, he could easily tie in the NATO area in the Western Mediterranean with this area in the Eastern Mediterranean. A British commander, for various local reasons of prejudice and sentiment, cannot possibly wield the same authority.

But the American Chiefs of Staff with unparalleled short-sightedness, accepted the Atlantic command for Admiral William Fechteler. As the British Chiefs of Staff must have realized at the time, this made it inevitable that a British appointment would be regarded as only fair here in the Mediterranean. And it is also troublesome to disentangle this silly mess, and name a British commander in the Atlantic and an American commander in the Mediterranean.

Because of the search for an easy way out, the command problem is fumbled; the Turkish and Greek requests for guarantees are met with empty words; and the Yugoslavs are aided in driblets. Thus, the opportunity here is passing. If suspicion and disgust increase much further at Belgrade; if neutralism gains much more ground at Ankara, the opportunity will simply cease to exist.

On the surface, this sort of missed chance may not seem very grave. In fact, however, the Turks, Greeks, and Yugoslavs represent a potential of 70 fighting divisions. These divisions are in being, and are located on the most sensitive Soviet flank, the flank of the always distrusted satellites. With reasonable equipment and good air support the Turks, Greeks, and Yugoslavs could, in case of trouble, drive to the Danube, threatening the whole satellite area.

In short, throwing away this splendid opportunity in the Eastern Mediterranean will be like passively accepting a gigantic defeat in war. Equally, if the western world loses control of the vital oil resource and strategic positions in the Middle East, this will also amount to a staggering military defeat. And so improvidence, negligence, and the search for the easy way will lead us, by a succession of such defeats, over the brink of final disaster.

Post Office Problems

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE MEADER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. MEADER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter and statement:

MAY 7, 1951.

Hon. TOM MURRAY,
Chairman, House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CHAIRMAN MURRAY: I am transmitting for the information of the Committee a signed statement prepared for me by a group of Post Office employes in my District.

In addition to the statement and other communications I have received, I had a personal interview with a number of the letter carriers and clerks when I visited Jackson, Mich., recently. It certainly is clear that these postal employees are a very much aroused over conditions in the Post Office Department, both as it affects them personally in their livelihoods, and in the quality of the postal service at the present time, in which they seem to have a sincere and understandable interest.

As you will note, the authors pull no punches in the description of conditions, and I thought it might be useful to your Committee to have such a frank and forcefully-expressed commentary on the postal service from the point of view of the employees themselves.

Because it seems to me that this statement should have the attention of the entire Congress, I intend to ask leave to insert it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Sincerely,

GEORGE MEADER.

POST OFFICE CURTAILMENT

A drastic unnecessary step taken by the Postmaster General to blackjack Congress. A public poll on this uncalled-for reduction in service would find many people opposed to it. A service that the country, the Post Office Department, and the employees could well be proud of has deteriorated to the point where we the employees are ashamed of it. The public used to be able to set their watches by the regular approach of the mailman. Under the curtailment service one wouldn't be able to determine the day of the week. Magazines that used to be delivered on Thursday and Friday, are delivered at late as Monday and Tuesday of the following week. Circular advertisements of concerts, and so forth, occasionally delivered after the date the event took place. Political advertisements have been delivered a few days after the election was held. Ads for special sales delivered after the sale was over. Church, fraternal, lodge, and sales meeting announcements delivered after the meeting day had passed. A letter mailed Thursday p. m., in Detroit, delivered in Jackson at 1:30 the following Monday. Result—two people for Sunday dinner that weren't expected.

DIRECTORY SERVICE DISCONTINUED

Letters returned to the sender 1,000 miles away when directory service would have saved time and money. Also would have kept two taxpayers happy instead of disgruntled. A penny-wise and pound-foolish measure.

WINDOW SERVICE CURTAILED

The windows of the post office open at 8 a. m. and close at 5 p. m.—12 noon on Saturday—when do working people have an opportunity to mail their packages, buy money orders, or transact postal savings business?

SECOND-CLASS POSTAGE RATES

The large magazine companies have our school children selling their subscriptions (practically for free) and the Post Office Department delivering them almost for nothing. The amount they pay per pound probably wouldn't pay the transportation expense. On the other hand they have more than doubled the selling price of their magazines and raised the rates on advertisement space. Any mention of raising the postal rates is met by a howl of protest. The loads of magazines has increased to the extent that we aren't letter carriers any more—we are just two-legged pack mules. The public is buying magazines that they don't want and don't read simply to help some school child win a prize. The same public, as taxpayers, complain about the large postal deficit. Mail carriers are burdened down with a load that the public shouldn't have to pay a subsidy on. Let the publishers pay a legitimate rate of postage or deliver their own magazines.

SPECIAL BOOK RATE ON BOOKS THAT ARE NEITHER EDUCATIONAL OR ENTERTAINING

How low can this literature get and still be offered for sale and transported through the mails? Tax money for prisons to house sex degenerates that were inspired to commit rape or murder by this type of Government subsidized reading material

26 DAYS VACATION AND 15 DAYS SICK LEAVE

That amount for some Government employees, but 15 days vacation and 10 days sick leave for postal employees. The argument that the first group needs the additional time because they are working great distances from home doesn't hold water.

Many of these people working in their own home town receive the same as those working thousands of miles from their homes. Perhaps the extra 5 days sick leave are given so they may return home to be sick.

COST OF UNIFORMS

Letter carriers are the only uniformed Government employees that have to pay for their own uniforms. With the price of wool skyrocketing this is, indeed, quite an item on the letter carriers' budget. Letter carriers are the Government's only employee group that contacts all of the public, in fact they are the only contact for a portion of the population. Shabbily dressed, poorly paid, and discontented employees make poor representatives for the United States Government.

EMPLOYEE-MANAGEMENT BOARD

Representatives of the various employee organizations are only tolerated at the present time. Postmasters and top Government officials can cooperate or not as they see fit. A law should be passed that would create a compulsory employee-management board. Employee morale has been lowered to a great extent by politically appointed postmasters disregarding existing labor relations practices and seniority rules.

Substitute employees are classified Federal employees yet they are not granted the benefit of the 40-hour workweek law, neither do they receive pay for the eight legal holidays as the other employees. (The Government of the United States enforces the 40-hour workweek on private industry.) Our substiutes work as high as 16 hours a day and more than 100 hours a week and never get paid overtime rates.

Employees starting to learn the plumbing, carpenter, machinist, etc., trades have to work 4 years before they earn top wages. Postal employees have to work 23 years before they earn top wages. We are in favor of the three longevity or meritorious grades but feel that 23 years is too long a time to reach the top grade.

Revision of the wording and carrying out of directives in bulletins to the field service from Washington, D. C. Numerous items issued in the Official Bulletin aren't definite, or plainly worded, and the officials in the various offices interpret them differently.

On trip service under the curtailment order have worked herdships on the carrier force. Carriers used to return to the postoffice at noon, but now many of them eat their lunch on a street corner or in business places; some of them have to stop at a private home for toilet facilities. Occupational illnesses such as heart trouble and varicose veins have increased. Carriers comprise only 4 percent of the Government employees but they have 18 percent of disability cases. The amount of personnel turnover is reaching a new high in postal history.

POSTAL DEFICIT

The Post Office Department is a service organization and always has been. Out of 42,000 offices only about 6,000 pay their own way. Would anyone advocate closing the other 36,000 offices? Compare the final cost to the taxpayers of running the Post Office Department with some of the non-revenue-producing departments, such as: Agriculture, Commerce, Interior, and Labor. The postal deficit shouldn't enter into the picture when considering wage increases:

TRUCK INSURANCE

The Government does not carry liability insurance protecting the drivers. In case of an accident the carrier driving the truck can be sued. All the Government offers is legal assistance.

EMPLOYEE MORALE

Postmaster General Donaldson once stated that he would make working conditions so that the employees would look forward to each working day in a happy state of mind. He has accomplished just the opposite. Most postal employees face each new day with a gloomy outlook on things in general. Working conditions, under the curtailment order; poor service, causing the public to complain verbally; and an inadequate wage all combined are enough to keep one in an unfriendly mood. Good pay for an honest day's work—serving a satisfied public—under favorable working conditions will put a smile again on the face of the employees and restore the Post Office Department again to the top level as a truly great service organization.

Tribute to a Great Statesman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN D. DINGELL
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Philip Slomovitz, editor and publisher of the Detroit Jewish News, from the issue of April 20, 1951:

TRIBUTE TO A GREAT STATESMAN

(By Philip Slomovitz)

Arthur H. Vandenberg was one of the outstanding personalities of our time. Scholarly, well-informed, an excellent speaker, a brilliant organizer, he was held in high regard even by his severest critics. Few men in the United States Senate measured up to him in stature in the last 25 years. It is no wonder that as late as November 1948 President Truman was quoted as stating that he regarded him as the ablest Republican in the Senate.

From his background as a newspaper editor and publisher—a position to which he rose from the coveted beginning as a good reporter for his Grand Rapids paper—he acquired a passion for information on every subject with which he was deeply concerned. As a result, he never committed himself on any issue unless he possessed all available facts in order to be in position to speak with a measure of authority. He was a voluminous correspondent. He never failed to respond to communications—whether they were from critics or supporters.

More than one biography could be written of his life. Every issue he was involved in offers material for a study of his attitudes, his character, his ability to cope with situations. In most cases he rose to great heights in dealing with situations affecting our country.

This commentator knew him intimately and is in position to say that a full-length biography could be written to describe Senator Vandenberg's relationships with Jews and Jewish issues, with particular reference to Zionism, Palestine, and Israel. Our first acquaintance with him was at a meeting of the Men's Club of Temple Beth El at which he captured the hearts of his Detroit audience with his eloquence and forthright expressions on matters of state. It was in the late 1920's. A friendship began in 1930 when we first interested him in the Zionist cause. At that time the Pro-Palestine Federation of America was the active Christian philo-Zionist movement in this country which functioned under the brilliant leadership of the eminent socialist, the late Charles Edward Russell.

Out of the friendship for Zionism grew Senator Vandenberg's interest in other matters—his anti-Nazi stand, his aid in efforts to liberalize legislation for the admission of displaced persons, the leading role he played in securing the ratification of the appointment of David Lilienthal as head of the Atomic Energy Commission in opposition to forces which he believed were anti-Semitic, his help in individual cases involving people who sought refuge in this country, his sponsorship of a resolution in support of Jewish aspirations in Palestine.

In its entirety, the Vandenberg story vis-à-vis Zionism and Israel was not always rosy. There were times when we were impatient about his attitudes. Tense situations arose from time to time. Most of the time his hesitancy in acting in our behalf, as a member (later chairman) of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, were due to pressure from the White House, the State and War Departments. When President Truman gave speedy recognition to the Jewish state, he was the first to commend it as the logical and proper step to take.

It would take volumes to describe our experiences with the great Michigan Senator. For more than 15 years it was our duty, at time on an hour's notice, to go to Washington to consult him on Zionist matters. It became necessary for this commentator to keep in touch with him on the Palestinian issue at San Francisco, in 1945, during the formative stages of the international world organization whose charter he helped frame; to keep in touch with him when he represented the United States in Paris, at the sessions of the United Nations, in January of 1946, and constantly to keep him informed about the Jewish position in matters involving the future of our harrassed people in Europe and in Arabic countries and the development of the State of Israel.

The historian will be amazed at the mass of information that came to us from his desks, wherever he may have been—in Washington, in San Francisco, in Paris, in Grand Rapids. There is an especially interesting note describing his conference at his Washington office with David Ben-Gurion on November 21, 1946. Even Ben-Gurion was wrong in an important matter involving the Arabs at that time. There are messages describing his reactions to Zionist leaders. And there are reports about the progress of his efforts in behalf of a Jewish Palestine in the United States Senate. A wire dated December 12, 1945, informed us that the "Foreign Relations Committee this morning ordered favorable report on Palestine resolution which seems to be in satisfactory form," to which was appended the information that "only opposing vote was that of Chairman CONNALLY."

Since it is impossible, in one column, even to scratch the surface in commenting upon the brilliant career of Senator Vandenberg, with special reference to his Jewish attitudes, your commentator desires to make note of only one other matter, involving a local item:

Less than 2 years ago the Morris Schavers, desiring to bring to this country the sole survivor of an entire family, 5-year-old Itzhak, who now is their adopted son, met with obstacles. Itzhak could have been considered Polish-born. In that case he would have to wait 12 years to be admitted to this country from Canada, where he was brought by the Schavers. Senator Vandenberg promptly introduced a bill to declare Itzhak of French origin. Congressman JOHN D. DINGELL introduced a similar measure in the House of Representatives. Both bills were adopted by the two Houses of Congress and were signed by President Truman. That act is on record to the credit of Senator Vandenberg and Congressman DINGELL as an indication of their humanitarian interests.

The good acts of Senator Vandenberg were multiplied a thousand times by his kindly intercessions. He was, indeed, a conservative Republican, especially from the Democrats' point of view. But when he was faced with issues that called for human considerations he rose above party politics. In all the years that we conferred with him he never—not once—showed the slightest interest in this commentator's political preferences. We were concerned with grave matters involving the security of the Jewish people, and we stuck to this point. On this score he was unselfish and always honorable. If only for this reason alone—which is one of many—we honor his memory as we honored and respected him in his lifetime.

Letter of Col. S. L. A. Marshall

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN D. DINGELL
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in the RECORD a letter addressed to me by Col. S. L. A. Marshall, military analyst for the Detroit News. Colonel Marshall was formerly chief historian in the European theater during World War II, and more recently was attached to a special Army mission in Korea, from whence he has recently returned.

Colonel Marshall's letter to me is self-explanatory, and is intended to clarify the record as regards the attack upon the Army by the gentleman from California [Mr. WERDEL] as having a Prussianized general staff. In the interest of fairness I believe the RECORD should contain the viewpoint expressed by Colonel Marshall as directed to me in his letter of April 12, 1951.

APRIL 12, 1951.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN DINGELL: During a House discussion of aspects of our defense policy on April 3, 1951, Congressman WERDEL of California, attacked the Army for having a Prussianized general staff. He then extended his remarks in the RECORD, introducing certain exhibits not alluded to in his speech.

I have that report. I am taking the trouble to make a part way reply to it because, while I doubt that any Member of the House would out of sinister motive attempt to undermine confidence in any part of the Armed Forces, it is altogether possible that the effect might be produced through unsullied ignorance.

It is not my business to defend the Army or its General Staff system. However, in the course of his remarks Mr. WERDEL quoted "an Army officer, Col. S. L. A. Marshall" and turned my words against the Army and the General Staff, by using them out of their historical and written context. I, therefore, feel it a duty to say what I know.

That I am not an Army officer but a reservist is well known to you and could have been ascertained by anyone taking the trouble to examine the Army Register, or for that matter, Who's Who. That simple fact has some relation to the truth or falsity of Mr. WERDEL's general charge against the Army. It is hardly a mark of Prussianism in a General Staff that it will call a civilian colonel to temporary active duty for the express purpose of reviewing Army processes from the inside, saying where they might be modified or corrected toward more perfectly serving national policy and the common interest, and making specific recommendations toward these ends. To my mind, this self-critical attitude within the Army and its acute sensitiveness to the public weal in part answer whether Mr. WERDEL knows whereof he speaks.

The paper from which Mr. WERDEL quoted was classified "Confidential." I don't know how he got it. But being so classified, it cannot be quoted by me, though Mr. WERDEL put parts of it directly into the RECORD. The question of the ethics of his procedure aside, I would again ask about the validity of his judgment. He said with respect to it that the paper "was so startling to them (the General Staff) that they promptly had the report marked 'Confidential' and ordered it locked up." Nothing of the kind happened. I personally had the paper so stamped. Mr. WERDEL knows the nature of the paper; he himself says that he cannot quote it in full because its contents have international implications. Therefore classifying it "Confidential" was routine; I so classified it before others read it. Far from conspiring to suppress the paper, the General Staff gave it more than normal circulation, considering the classification. A second edition was published by the General Staff so that there would be more jogging of thought all down the line. Else, Mr. WERDEL would never have procured a copy. He says the handling of this paper is proof of the Staff's Prussianism; I submit that to any reasonable mind, it is proof of the exact opposite.

But further, Mr. WERDEL says that the paper is a criticism of "present Army doctrine," adding that it challenges the doctrine "as being defeatist in character." To use the most polite phrase which occurs, he is guilty of a terminological inexactitude. The paper was written in April 1948; nothing said by way of criticism within that paper applies to Army doctrine today. Moreover, had the whole paper been quoted by Mr. WERDEL, it would have been recognized not as an indictment of the Army but as an analysis of the extraordinary difficulty in which the whole Defense Establishment was then placed because of indecision elsewhere in the Nation. We then had the Marshall plan and the Truman doctrine. But we had made no move to league with Western Europe for mutual defense or to arm our friends or even to get our own military house in order. Rejecting isolationism, we had not yet accepted its only possible strategic alternative—collective security with strength suited to the need. True, I discussed the confusions in our military policy, but only as a reflection of the doubts and contradictions elsewhere in the national landscape which thwarted military planning on any grander scale than we had known in the past. It was argued that if military men could begin to ponder the national problem from its center to the circumference, informing themselves more fully on foreign policy, the better to fashion a military policy in harmony with it, they might assist the Nation to a sound course. The Army had about two divisions in being in this country at that writing. If Mr. WERDEL does not think there was good cause for it to be concerned about its position, his reasoning is not like mine. Again, if he believes that a plea for open-mindedness and sober thought is the mark of Prussianism within an army, his reasoning is not like mine; nor is his knowledge of the German general staff.

In what the press quoted of what Mr. WERDEL said about the Army, the emphasis was placed upon his statement relating to the circulating of a paper written by Gen. Heinz Guderian, of the German army. This is a paper called Unification or Coordination. Mr. WERDEL says that the prime motive behind the publication of this paper is to indoctrinate officers toward the day when the military can take over the control of this Republic; it is difficult to understand how any man can strain his imagination that far. The paper is a simple treatise on military organizational problems as experienced in Germany. It would read as that to anyone save perhaps the character Humpty-Dumpty, who used the word "glory" to mean a "nice, knock-down argument," saying, "When I use a word it means just what I choose it to mean." In seeking to prove perfidy where none exists, Mr. WERDEL says, "I am advised these studies by the German generals are basic references by those in the Pentagon who believe that the only thing wrong with the supreme Prussian staff was the people who ran it." It happens that, as chief historian of the European theater, I initiated the series of studies among the German generals, though I had nothing to do with the Guderian studies. The policy was promoted simply for the knowledge that it would produce. That is the main way for soldiers to further their education. For the same reasons, whatever we can learn about Russian methods in warfare, Japanese principles of command, or Chinese military indoctrination is to the advantage of the Army. To Mr. WERDEL it might seem better that we keep soldiers as ignorant as Parsifal. I would prefer to believe that the words of Mirabeau Lamar, "Cultivated mind is the guardian genius of democracy," apply to men in military suits, as well as to Congressmen.

No general staff is ever perfect; nor is any other group of individuals. In the Army, now and then, you will meet a potential man on horseback. Occasionally one may get onto the General Staff. But men of the same sort—driven by vainglory and inordinate appetite for power—also get to Congress occasionally. I know of no way under the sun that our society, or any important part thereof, can be purged of such people. The main question is whether thought and motivation are reasonably sound among the majority of those in control. Having had a long and intimate experience with our Army General Staff, I simply wish to add my witness that they are as deeply devoted to their country and as fully committed to the preservation of our fundamental liberties as any body of men in my experience.

Faithfully yours,

S. L. A. MARSHALL.

The MacArthur Case

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LISTER HILL
OF ALABAMA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, the Tuscaloosa, (Ala.) News carried in its issue of Saturday, May 5, 1951, a letter written by Dr. Clanton W. Williams, professor of history at the University of Alabama to his brother-in-law, Lt. Richard McDonald Payne, serving with the American forces in Korea. The letter is an exceptionally able, enlightening, and challenging statement on the world situation and the danger which faces our country. The Tuscaloosa News captions it "The MacArthur case in light of Marshall's grand strategy."

I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed in the RECORD. I strongly commend it to Senators, irrespective of what their views may be.

I am informed by the Public Printer that the letter will make approximately three pages of the RECORD at a cost of $246.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE MACARTHUR CASE IN LIGHT OF MARSHALL'S GRAND STRATEGY

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—Within recent weeks Dr. Clanton W. Williams, professor of history at the University of Alabama, has addressed several groups in Tuscaloosa and elsewhere, treating the general world war picture brought most directly into focus by the MacArthur dismissal. There has been much demand for the text of this address, by school officials, civic club members, and others. The Tuscaloosa News asked Dr. Williams to prepare a text, and he has done so, in the form of a letter to his 25-year-old brother-in-law, a lieutenant in Korea. As a public service, the News is printing this entire text herewith.)

UNIVERSITY, ALA.,
April 29, 1951.

Lt. RICHARD MCDONALD PAYNE,
Company E, Ninth RCT, APO 248,
San Francisco, Calif.

DEAR MAC: You asked in your last letter what people back here were thinking about Harry Truman's removal of General MacArthur. You said that it came as quite a surprise to you men in Korea. I think it came as a real shock to most of the people throughout the United States of America. Surely the deluge of anti-Truman-pro-MacArthur letters which flooded Washington during the first 2 weeks indicates that the people of the Nation as a whole were deeply disturbed and seemed to be convinced that a great man was being eliminated from a confused scene by a man of relatively small stature.

Deep resentment across the Nation greeted the news. One small indication of that was a poll of my first class (second half of English history) for a show of hands as to whether or not Truman had done right. Only 1 student said "yes"; 6 would not commit themselves; 36 were vehemently pro-MacArthur.

GENERAL RECEIVES WILD WELCOME

We listened to the radio broadcasts of the wild welcomes given the general in Hawaii and San Francisco. I was at Maxwell Field taking a physical examination (which I passed for recall June 1) when the general was making his speech to Congress, but I heard rebroadcasts far into the night. Then the general went on to New York, where 7,500,000 screaming humans cheered him to the skies. Chicago went wild; and last Friday Milwaukee followed suit.

It was extremely interesting to read the various comments about the whole affair, and also to note the inconsistency of the pro-isolationists in Congress whereby they had suddenly thrown all isolation to the winds in the emotional confusion of the hour. Republican DEWEY SHORT, after MacArthur's speech to Congress said, "We have just heard the voice of God." Former President Hoover, who has been advocating desertion of all our allies except Japan and "perhaps" Britain (but not appeasement) said that MacArthur was St. Paul reincarnate. Of course Senator MCCARTHY was given fresh ammunition for labeling as pro-Communists Dean Acheson and others who said MacArthur should have been removed. Senator DIRKSEN admitted in a TV interview that the Republicans were going to use this affair to the fullest. You can imagine how Fulton Lewis, Jr., and other Chicago Tribune people have been going to town. I don't know what a Gallup Poll would show right now, but it is reasonable to assume that Truman's stock is at its lowest. In fact, I doubt that any President since Andrew Jackson, has enjoyed such universal unpopularity as Truman did last week. You may have heard how he was "booed" at Griffith Field.

Regardless of what one may think of Truman and Acheson, surely any objective approach toward trying to evaluate the mess we are in must not stem from personal likes or dislikes or emotion. It must stem from several facts: Fact No. 1: the Communist crusade was going to proceed regardless of who were President and Secretary of State of the United States of America. Fact No. 2: At least 90 percent of the people of this country approved of our action on June 25, 1950, when the Russians sent the Korean Reds across the thirty-eighth parallel. Fact No. 3: Now that the Chinese Reds have made a new war out of the Korean affair, and we can't see where we are going, the Nation has become highly exasperated.

Fact No. 4: The natural reaction was to look for scapegoats. (Here the "outs" struck oil.) Fact No. 5: MacArthur, as any field commander with an immediate military problem before him would do, screams loud and long about the restrictions placed upon him. Fact No. 6: People like me who have loved ones like you caught on a firing line with no immediate goal in view, had a natural impulse to yell to Truman, "Give MacArthur everything he wants." Instead, (Fact No. 7) Truman tells MacArthur to "shut up"; MacArthur refuses and, trying to go over the heads of his military superiors, appeals to the people through the anti-Truman forces in Congress (whether they be isolationists, McCarthyites (Anglophobes, reactionary southern Democrats, or just office-hungry Republicans). Fact No. 8: Harry, whom no one may accuse of lacking guts, fires the General and gives him an opportunity to step forth into the blazing spotlight with all stops pulled. The General takes his cue and little Harry's stock sinks.

And now you face a renewed Communist drive.

OTHER DRAMAS ARE UNFOLDING

All the while there are other dramas being unfolded elsewhere. The MacArthur show is drama No. 1. Yours is drama No. 2. The others are:

Drama No. 3: In Paris Gromyko is stalling around at a conference which is a preliminary conference to a big conference to bring together the Big Four Foreign Ministers. They are supposed eventually to work out a peace treaty for Germany and otherwise settle issues in Europe. We are supposed to enter into a contract with the Russians—a contract which we westerners are expected by Moscow to accept in good faith (like Yalta and Potsdam), when we know that the Russians have no tradition for honoring contractual arrangements, indeed have damned contracts as a bourgeois institution. Still Gromyko has found that our Philip Jessup and the British and French deputies this time are not going to be bullied. They know full well what the Russian game is and they are not going to let the Communists take over the German military and technological potential through diplomatic default. And Gromyko isn't even making much propaganda capital out of this one. Our patient presence there is denying him this.

Drama No. 4: Also in Paris and across Western Europe, General Eisenhower is working feverishly to build a military machine capable of stopping the Russian hordes from taking Western Europe. Whether or not he will succeed is at this moment hanging in the balance. Several things are decidedly in his favor—giving him precious time. One is what you are doing in Asia (see below); another is the Russian knowledge of our growing stockpile of atom bombs and United States strategic air power. Still a third is the Russian hope that the Kremlin may yet take Western Europe by diplomacy and trickery.

Drama No. 5: Meantime, the Communists are busy elsewhere—still trying to sabotage the rearmament of Western Europe—still rattling the sword at Yugoslavia and the Mediterranean—working in Iran to deny the British their middle-eastern oil—working in Africa toward denying us the uranium deposits of the Congo—and continuing to build up their own military machine and those of the satellite countries, including the East German police.

Drama No. 6 lies in what we are doing at home. Despite all the bickering and emotional confusion of the moment, plus the usual amount of cheating and jockeying of certain tunnel-visioned Americans, this Nation is getting stronger by the hour. Given time, we shall have built enough matériel for ourselves, for Europe, and for Asiatics, and all other potential allies. Time is the great factor—time which you and your fellows are helping to provide—time to mobilize our manpower and that of Europe—time to give our scientists those last precious moments before the word is given: "Freeze models. Standardize. Proceed with mass production."

Drama No. 7 is offstage. It is being enacted in the field of atomic fission—the increasing plant capacity—the coming Eniwetok experiments with new A or maybe H bombs—and the continuing feverish research in university and Government labs.

You have to see all of these dramas at once to be able to appreciate fully the one in which you are a participant. And you must see them all against the backdrop of our day in history.

RECALLING A PROPHECY OF 1939

Mind if your old professor repeats some of what you learned in current world history? Do you remember the broadcast I made in December 1939 in which attention was called to the fact that there were three great ideologies abroad in the world: Democracy, communism, and fascism—each a deadly enemy of the other two? I had stuck my neck out then and had ventured to predict that:

"Before this Second World War is over fascism, unable to triumph over democracy, will turn on communism. Consequently, democracy and communism will be erstwhile allies, and shall destroy the power of fascism. Then arising out of the gore will be the remaining two ideologies staring at each other with eyes of suspicion and hatred. * * * Before this century has run its course, one or the other, the Communist International or international democracy, shall triumph. Whether or not it will be the latter will depend in large measure, perhaps wholly, upon whether or not the people of this great democracy shall in the immediate postwar period understand the complex issues it will face and whether or not it will seize its wonted position of intelligent and dynamic leadership in the building of a powerful world government—an international democracy, or return to the self-centered isolationism from which it has not yet emerged."

The only reason, Mac, for harping back to the way things seemed to be shaping up 11½ years ago is by way of getting a long-range view of where we stand as we are moving into the second half of the twentieth century. Some of the predictions then may have been quite presumptuous, but I do not believe it was presuming too much for a historian to express conviction that man would go right on fighting unless there were created a powerful world government (international democracy) with a powerful police force (of which, right now, you are a part).

And it was not presumptuous to accept at face value the pronouncements of intent in the Communist scriptures. You remember that Josef Stalin had written in his Vaprosy Leninisma (Problems of Leninism) in 1924:

"The struggle between these two systems will fill up the history of the development of the world revolution."

We could not afford to ignore Stalin's well-written, clear-cut, almost scholarly book (which was being written at the very time that Hitler was writing his rambling Mein Kampf). There in this new testament (Marx and Lenin had written the old testament), Stalin had set forth his doctrine and part of his program of action:

"The goal is (to use the Russian dictatorship of the proletariat) as the base for the overthrowal of imperialism (sic) in all countries. The epoch of world revolution has begun. The faster this country is transformed into a base for the further unfolding of world revolution, into a lever for the further disintegration of imperialism, the development of world revolution will be the more rapid and thorough. • • • The existence of the Soviet Republic side by side with the imperialist powers for a long time is unthinkable. In the end, one or the other will conquer; and until that end comes, a series of the most terrible collisions between the Soviet Republic and the bourgeois states is inevitable."

STALIN'S VOW TO LENIN'S MEMORY

I doubt that Franklin D. Roosevelt, or Cordell Hull, or Stettinius ever discovered that book, though Alger Hiss may have. I doubt that BOBBY TAFT or KENNETH WHERRY or BRICKER even now know of its existence and if they do, they may be able to shrug it off with some good McCormick statement. But the Great Vow of Fidelity taken by Stalin at the burial of Nicholai Lenin they must know. As late as 1947 it was set forth in bold-faced type in one of Stalin's books:

"In departing from us, Comrad Lenin bequeathed to us fidelity to the principles of the Communist international. We swear to you, Comrad Lenin, that we will not spare our lives in order to strengthen and expand the union of toilers of the whole world—the Communist international."

I can't leave this subject, Mac, without referring to two more quotations from the Communist new testament. The first is from Vaprosy Leninisma. It is the famous Doctrine of Ebb and Flow:

"The epoch of world revolution is a whole strategic period, embracing a whole series of years, and, I dare say, even a number of decades. In the course of this period there can be ebbings and flowings."

All of the above is at the highest echelon—the plane of doctrine and grand strategy.

It is in his second book, the History of the All Union Communist Party, 1936, that Stalin sets forth his tactics (direct and evasive). After discussing the role of the leading detachments (such as the Korean and Chinese Reds) he talks about the strategic reserves, the Red army of the U. S. S. R. itself. He says that he does not intend to throw in his reserves until absolutely required to do so—just when or where he could not then say. Then he adds this significant statement: "A great deal depends upon whether we (the U. S. S. R. itself) succeed in delaying war with the capitalistic countries which is inevitable." (There's that "inevitable" again.)

In this second book also Stalin stated that in the process of world revolution there must be brought under the Kremlin's dictates Germany, China, and India, but he could not then (1936) say in which order their acquisition should occur.

Well, I hardly need tell you what success Stalin has had to date—of how he took all of central Europe—of how in 34 years since 1917, some 750,000,000 humans have been dragged behind the iron curtain—of how well his leading detachments in Asia are doing.

This brings us sharply back to the present MacArthur controversy—back to the rampaging academic and emotional stew of the moment—back to the mess wherein partisan politics for politics' sake, tear-jerking theatricals, exasperation, and latent desire to drop the atom bomb on somebody—that most of us just can't or won't think this thing coolly.

It's something like a football team which through a large part of the game has been on the defensive—just can't move over to the offense. The other team is lining up for the next play and our side is in a defensive huddle, arguing and bickering with the quarterback and the captain. (Our ex-captain (Hoover) is yelling from the sidelines for us to pull back for a grand and glorious goal-line stand—that is, he was until St. Paul came back to us reincarnate.) Of course, though, this is too simple an analogy, for football teams can always look forward to next Saturday or next season. Democracy may have no next Saturday, for this is a game to the death in an atomic age.

CAPTAIN TRUMAN CANNOT INSPIRE

But I must make one more reference to the captain and quarterback analogy. Captain Truman is not an inspiring leader. That's his one big fault: he just cannot inspire the people to full unstinted action. Nevertheless, we did elect him and that's that. Dean Acheson is quarterback in name. He, too, is uninspiring to the masses and he can't handle himself in the rough and tumble of politics. I say he is quarterback in name. By that I mean that the real strategy maker—the coach, who is in position to see the whole game, is none other than George C. Marshall. For my part I have large trust in him and his judgment, and I thank God that he is there and that only a few brickbats are being hurled at him. Only the most partisan politician, only the mose vehement and academically unhonorable, dare to cast aspersions at him.

Secretary Marshall, a voracious reader, has proved himself fully appreciative of the conflict of ideologies—of the marriage of Russian nationalism and Marxist-Leninist-Stalinism. He thoroughly understands the objectives of Joseph Stalin and the Politburo. And Marshall has a well-organized mind, fully capable of seeing the trees fitting into the whole forest. We must remember that he was the leader of the Combined Chiefs of Staff and the Joint Chiefs of Staff during the time when communism and Democracy were "erstwhile allies." We must remember that he was Secretary of State when this Nation made its first real defensive moves. He set the grand strategy to which Dean Acheson fell heir. As our current Secretary of Defense he is not completely out of the line of fire of the McCarthyites and others, nevertheless as Captain Harry's and Quarterback Dean's coach he is in fact the nation's leader whose grand strategy is prevailing.

In his diagnosing the strategy and tactics of the Kremlin, one all important fact stands out in his mind. It is so simple in itself, so clear to anyone who can lift his head above the ground mist, that it is really amazing that everyone doesn't see it. It lies in the answers to these questions: "How can the Kremlin ever accomplish its World Revolution without defeating the United States?" "How can the technological power of the United States be matched and overwhelmed?" The answer: "Only by regimenting under communism the technological power of Germany and the rest of Western Europe." "And how can that be done before the threat of United States strategic air and a stockpile of atom bombs."

The Politburo right there reaches a quandary. Some of the Kremlin Bolsheviks must be arguing: "We must move now regardless of the consequences." But at that point they run into the Marxian-Lenin doctrine of "historical determinism" (just wait and the bourgeois institutions will inevitably fall because of their "contradictions.") And they remember Stalin's doctrine of Ebb and Flow; and his determination that Russia, the "base for the further unfolding of world revolution" shall not be endangered; and they perhaps still hear him warning that the Russian "strategic reserves" must not be committed until absolutly necessary. And so we have Dramas No. 3 and No. 5 above.

But suppose Stalin dies and hotter heads take over the World Revolution. Or suppose he decides that now is the time to take Western Europe? After all, hasn't he also said that war between the U. S. S. R. and the capitalistic nations is inevitable? Where does that leave the United States of America at this moment? Where would it leave the world if at the "inevitable" moment the United States of America finds its military strength bogged down in an Asiatic conflict from which it could not extricate itself for bigger things?

MARSHALL'S ADDRESS OF 1948

Do you remember Mr. Marshall's 1948 address at Berkeley, Calif.? There he made a most significant statement. Let me quote it for you. I dug it out of the New York Times files this afternoon. It's in the March 20 issue, page 4, columns 3 and 4:

"Our means are not unlimited—we must not spend our efforts unwisely.

"As a matter of fact, I find the present situation disturbingly similar to that with which I labored as Chief of Staff. • • • For several years I had to withstand heavy pressure from various theaters of operation in the world for assistance, support in the form of matériel, without regard to our then extremely limited resources available in the United States.

"Later, after our entry into the war, these pressures greatly increased in the demand for support to an extent which if met would have rendered us ineffective, I think, on almost every field of action (including) the Western Pacific.

"I find myself in virtually the same position today as I was during those war years and the decisions are just as difficult and equally important. Rich and powerful as we are, we cannot afford to disperse our efforts to a degree which would render all ineffective. Every region has its claims and its proponents and it is therefore necessary to decide on general strategy to be employed, having in mind the entire world situation."

This is the key to the whole confused situation right now. Too bad, I think that the whole American people can't reread that statement. It should clarify many minds and wipe away much of the emotional confusion now pervading the atmosphere. If Mr. Marshall were in position to do so—and he is not—he would repeat this and be even more specific He would tell of the exasperating story of how MacArthur kept up a continuous stream of cables to the Pentagon during 1942-44, wherein the Pacific commander was demanding every day more men, more planes, more ships. Marshall would doubtless admit that it was but natural for General MacArthur to want to get on with his own war. But he would have to say quietly, dispassionately, that it was the Chief of Staff's painful duty to continue to reply that the Pacific Ocean area would have to wait, for the European war held No. 1 priority. MacArthur's magnificent public-relations outfit did not prevail over Marshall and the grand strategy here was fully justified by the course of events.

THE CRISIS OF JANUARY 1947

When Marshall became Secretary of State in January 1947, he fell heir to a bad, bad situation. The Yalta and Potsdam contracts had been made and were already being cast aside as "dirty, bourgeois, capitalistic, imperialistic instruments." The United Nations (embryonic international Democracy) had been born crippled and was being used by the Soviet Union for one purpose—to prevent it from becoming an international police power and otherwise the Soviet policy was to divide and confuse the opponents of totalitarian tyranny. When Mr. Marshall became Secretary of State, Iran and Turkey and Greece stood on the verge of Communist conquest; and Italy and France seemed ready to capitulate. Nearly every nation in Western Europe lay economically destitute—begging for bread. The Communists were rubbing their hands in glee.

Well, I won't review all the facts relative to the Truman (really Marshall) doctrine; the Marshall plan and the wonderful work of ECA; of how the Berlin airlift saved Germany; or how Marshall succeeded in getting a reluctant Congress to make it possible to revitalize all of Western Europe and then to awaken a desire among those cultured peoples to live again and to march on toward freedom; of how the North Atlantic Treaty Organization was finally brought into existence, the United States of America becoming not only a vital part of it, but, through General Eisenhower, the real leader of it.

The vast difference between Europe of just 3 years ago—flat broke, starving, disconsolate, indigent, lying naked before the rapacious minions of Moscow—and the Europe of today since the Marshall strategy went into effect—back on its feet, unsteady still, but at last regaining its strength, becoming increasingly defiant of Moscow, now fired with hope and determination—the vast differences brought about in these years comprise a wonderful chapter in the history of international democracy in action. It is perhaps the proudest chapter in American history.

Given two more years of continued progress, Europe, with its mighty technological potential and still backed up by the young giant across the Atlantic, the new Europe will not fall into the Kremlin orbit and the world revolution shall not materalize; and perhaps—perhaps even yet—world war III shall not reach the full fury we can envisage.

But again, will the Politburo give the West those 2 years? No one now knows the answer—doubtless not even the Kremlin masters themselves. But they must know that without the technocracy of Europe regimented to their own ends, Marx' historical determinism will one day prove to have been a false doctrine.

And so history at this moment is hanging in the balance. Somehow—in some way—the Politburo must divert American attention and American military strength from the No. 1 priority.

Then, too, Russia as a nation has something else worrying her. The past 50 years have seen the giant China arising as a nation—a people with national ambitions. The one biggest problem the Chinese Nation faces is overpopulation. Eighty-five percent of the people live off the "Good Earth" and there is not enough of it for 450,000,000 unscientific people to eat well from its produce—and the population is growing at an increasing rate. China must some day expand. Where? In which direction? There is but one answer: Into sparsely settled and fertile Siberia.

Russia then must control the government of China. She must try to send China southward. And something else, if possible. What finer boon could befall Russia and communism than to have the United States of America locked for a long time in strength-sapping war with China?

MAC ARTHUR SAW OWN MILITARY PROBLEM

Whether or not MacArthur saw all of this, I do not know. He did see some of it. But he also saw his own military problem and that was absolutely paramount—that and the St. Paul reincarnate factor. And he is entitled to the deep sympathy and admiration of this Nation. And that he is surely getting.

And I would say to him "You should have your every demand fulfilled—but not now—not while there is an all-important No. 1 priority."

But you, Lieutenant, have been asking all through this long letter, the $64 question, "Where does all this leave us guys out here in Korea?" And that is what the Nation is asking of President Truman and Secretary Acheson; and they are not able to answer. I say "not able," not because of their uninspiring personalities, but because of the grand stategy involved, because of the possibility of giving away strategic information, because what they might say could be the very thing which would cause the Kremlin to throw in the strategic reserves—and we simply are not ready to meet that eventuality.

I think I can list a few things for you that might help a little to answer that question:

No. 1: The big conflict between international democracy and the Communist International required that somewhere at some place we had to use physical strength to deter the Communist crusade (or Russian territorial expansion, if you choose). Stalin had decreed it. Korea was it.

No. 2: The fate of the United Nations, the one positive good that came out of World War II in which 22,000,000 humans died—millions of them to win the peace—was hanging in the balance. Had it not acted positively in June 1950, it would quickly have gone the way of the League of Nations which had no police power; and international democracy would have made a terrible capitulation before the Communist International.

No. 3: The whole honor of this Nation was at stake. We had pledged our support to the embryonic democracy of Korea. The eyes of the various peoples, large and small, were fiercely focused upon Uncle Sam in June 1950. And they are still so focused. Would this one-time self-centered, irresponsible giant of the west who had become in recent years the epitome of all that nations aspired to—this arsenal of democracy, the one hope of mankind against an engulfing totalitarian tyranny—would the powerful United States of America act in the interest of morality and justice and freedom and, yes, even in its own long-range interest? Or would he prove indeed to be Uncle Shylock, a cowardly, money-mad, short-visioned egotist? The world got its answer—and it still has that answer. And you are giving that answer in person.

No. 4 is a tough one, but you are big enough to take it. I hate to have to write it, for in so doing I have to castigate my own American people as lacking in statesmanship. It lies in a historical fact: This country has to have its face physically slapped before it will bound into unified action. Woodrow Wilson was a great leader but it took a series of Lusitanias to end the great debate of 1914–17. F. D. R. was a great leader but it took a Pearl Harbor to end the great debate of 1939–41. The Korean war—the sacrifices of you guys out there now—is the prerequisite face-slapping we have to have.

MARSHALL'S GRAND STRATEGY PREVAILS

Has the great debate of 1946–51 come to a close? Yes, in fact it has, Mac. Not so decisively as those did in 1917 and 1941. The press is calling this MacArthur controversy the great debate; a month ago they were calling the four divisions to Europe the great debate; 2 years ago they were calling the North Atlantic Treaty controversy the great debate; and 3 years ago there was a great debate over the Marshall plan. But every time our Congress, after giving us a scare, has come through. But the big reason I say the great debate is over is because Marshall's grand strategy still prevails; Europe is still No. 1 priority; we did act decisively last June; we have no intention of appeasing the Asiatic Reds and welshing on our moral obligation to the Koreans and other little democracies; we finally did bolster the wavering United Nations even though our action was left-handed; our face—your face—is being slapped; Truman finally did declare a state of emergency; Congress has voted huge appropriations and is going to vote some sixty billions more soon; the military ranks are being filled as fast as matériel is being provided for them; and while most of that matériel is now going to you and replacements are on the way, we are moving into high gear on the production front.

Given time—time you are helping to provide in Korea—time provided by the Kremlin's indecision in the face of our atomic power—given time, we shall have manufactured the matériel for ourselves, for Europe, and for anti-Communists everywhere, even including the men on Formosa (whether under Chiang Kai-shek and his Kuomintang or some Third Movement—Democracy, I hope).

Let the Reds sing as loudly as they care, to their stirring strain, the Internationale:

> "'Tis the final conflict.
> Let each stand in his place.
> The International Party
> Shall be the human race."

What you are doing—you and your men—is in fact one grand reply: "Government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

Well, Mac, old boy, this has been a long epistle. I hope it hasn't confused you still more. Maybe, if you are now pulled back for another few days' rest, you can find time to glance over this again. I've written at such length to you, a college graduate, because I believe that you must require some academic reappraisal now and then against which your personal courage is braced—not that you haven't got all the fortitude traditional in Young America, plus pride in your world-famous fighting outfit.

You know that mother and Claudine and kids, and your gallant little wife and precious baby are hoping and praying with me that that long-looked-for rotation gets you back to us the same old Mac we love—and soon.

Your fond old brother-in-law,

CLANTON.

The Constitution in Our Everyday Life

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM G. STIGLER

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. STIGLER. Mr. Speaker, the American Legion of my State held an oratorical contest for Negroes. Elnora Sanders, a student of the Manual Training High School, Muskogee, Okla., was the winner.

The subject of her oration was The Constitution in our Everyday Life. Believing the oration worthy of perpetuation, I include it here as part of my remarks:

THE CONSTITUTION IN OUR EVERDAY LIFE

One hundred and sixty-four years ago, there emerged an idea and an ideal, from the minds, the hearts, and the souls of great men, striving to establish an even greater nation. One hundred and sixty-four years ago on May 25, 1787, 55 men of great wisdom and prudence met in Philadelphia, Pa., and drew up the document upon which rests the government of this, the greatest nation on earth today.

These great men of foresight threw out the outmoded Articles of Confederation and started anew. They provided for a legislative body to make the laws, a judicial group to interpret the laws, and an executive department to enforce the laws—three distinct branches of government, all equal in power and all working together, yet, so planned that no one of them could gain supremacy over the others.

These great men had faith and foresight. They had faith to believe that America and its Constitution would stand. They had foresight to see that as America grew and changed, its Constitution would have to be changed also. Thus, they provided that their charter might be amended. There have been amendments to this Constitution—22 to be exact—and there has been great progress mad under this document. At the time our Constitution was written, America was a small nation with an area of only 850,000 square miles; with a population of 3,500,000 people. America stands today a giant Nation of 4,000,000 square miles, and 150,000,000 people of all races, creeds, and colors, rich in every aspect by which a nation's wealth can be measured. But, my friends, all this has not been easily accomplished.

This great document has been tried and tested time and again—during periods of war, inflationary periods and periods of depression, and has inevitably remained the guiding beacon which has led us triumphantly through each crisis. The War of 1812 was one of the first tests of our Constitution. This war strengthened American independence in the eyes of the world. Then there was the War Between the States, the outcome of which proved that this Government, outlined by the Constitution, was far stronger than that of any one State. It made the United States an indestructible union of indestructible States. Later World War I, which was to have made the world safe for democracy, and of course World War II. Three times, since the War Between the States, we have demonstrated to the world that we are a united people and that there is no North nor South, no East nor West, whenever freedom and our beloved land is threatened by foreign forces. My friends, if these principles have proved themselves sound during our many great crises, does it not seem logical that they should be practiced in our daily life?

At no time in our Nation's history have we been so gravely challenged as we are today, to safeguard the principles of human freedom that have made our Nation great.

In a world that is far from settled, where peace is a hope, but not yet a reality, we must understand and renew our faith in our fundamental beliefs; make sure that in our daily living we do not adopt policies which violate these fundamental principles laid down to us in our constitution. What a much better place in which to live this land of ours would be if these same principles were practiced in our daily contact with our fellow men: No North nor South, no East nor West, but freedom and democracy for all. With unfaltering faith we look forward to the day when America's progress will no longer be obstructed by racial and religious prejudice and intolerance.

Our forefathers came to this country for social, economic, and religious freedom. They believed in life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness They believed in equality and justice of humanity. Those things came down to us from heaven and are inherent in us from birth. The framers of the Constitution realized these things and wove them into the fabric of our Government. As the Preamble states: "We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare and secure the blessing of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America." The flower of American manhood has died in all parts of the world to uphold the ideals of that Constitution.

Upon us, the living, falls the sacred duty to preserve them in our everyday life. Let us keep faith with those American boys of all colors who gave their lives that those principles might live. They would tell us in the words of Lieutenant Colonel McGrae, who died in France during World War I. He said:

"Take up our quarrel with the foe
To you from failing hands we throw the torch;
Be yours to hold it high.
If ye break faith with us who die,
We shall not sleep, though poppies grow
In Flanders Field."

Let us, in our everyday living and dealings with our fellow man, be able to give those heroes "The American's Answer" in the words of Rev. R. W. Lillard, who said:

"Fear not that ye have died for naught,
The torch he threw to us we caught,
Ten million hands will hold it high,
And freedom's light shall never die.
We've learned the lesson that ye taught,
In Flanders Field."

America stands today in dire need of men with dogged determinations who have courage to uphold those glorious ideals of our revered Constitution.

Democracy is not a completed thing. The key to democracy is the persistent struggle to keep alive this idea of freedom and justice, to uphold it and to expand it against every force which would seek to destroy or restrict it. That struggle has never ended, each rising generation of Americans must protect the hard-won gains of the past. We must also move forward by making freedom and justice vital realities in our every-day life. If America is to indoctrinate the rest of the world with democracy, it is only logical for America to indoctrinate itself first. Democracy must mean equal employment opportunities; opportunities to learn and use technical skills and to advance according to the mastery of them. Democracy must mean equal educational opportunities; it must mean justice in the courts of the land. Democracy must mean simply the opportunity for all Americans to share to the full extent of their capacities in the defense of America in war, and in the development of America in peace.

All of this can be accomplished only, if the mandates of our Constitution are enforced.

For it provides as now written, every guaranty of liberty and freedom and of civil rights that any American could desire.

American democracy must not be debased, ridiculed, and laughed to scorn in derision by the rest of the world. This Nation, "conceived in liberty," must rid itself of those infamous practices which are such blatant blemishes on our constitutional concepts of liberty.

The American Constitution is our heritage. It is ours to keep its spirit alive, to put teeth into its mandates, to uphold its ideals daily in our attitudes and all our acts; in all our contacts with our fellow men of all colors—all creeds; in the very thoughts we think, in the very sentiments we express, and in the very air we breathe. It is ours to cherish—ours to defend—ours to preserve in our everyday lives—the Constitution of the United States of America.

Threat to Our Free Press in Today's World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BLAIR MOODY
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. MOODY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a remarkable address on the threat to our free press in today's world, delivered by Columnist Marquis Childs, at the University of Missouri, Columbia, Mo., on May 4, last.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

You have honored me in asking me to speak on this occasion which in the long tradition of the School of Journalism has come to have such great significance. I know that in the past it has customarily been an occasion when you have fittingly marked the achievements of American journalism. For these achievements the school and Dean Mott and his predecessors and the men associated with him may take no small credit. With their dedication to the highest ideals of journalism they have contributed much.

But with your permission this evening, I shall make my assignment rather a different one than counting the triumphs of the free press in America today. The time has come when we must examine the base on which all the achievements and the triumphs of a free press inevitably rest. That base is the right of independent opinion for a newspaper, for an editor, and, yes, for the individual in our society who elects to stand alone.

That is at the heart of the concept of a free press. It is no stronger and no weaker than that right. And when it begins to go, when the views of the lowliest individual are suppressed or when he is silenced by intimidation, then all is in danger. If there is one thing we should have learned in the recent past, it is that freedom cannot be denied to some and preserved for others. Even the most powerful newspaper cannot save itself by merely acquiescing in the power of the suppressor.

The reaction of the United States to the death of La Prensa has been a healthy one. The death of that newspaper was like a lightning flash revealing that the sky over this hemisphere, too, was darkened by the menace to freedom that has spread so far across Europe and Asia. There has come the realization and the bell that tolled for La Prensa conveyed a deep and solemn warning for all of us. In John Donne's phrase, "Never ask for whom the bell tolls, it tolls for thee."

La Prensa was a great and free newspaper. Its destruction at the hands of the dictator, Juan Peron, diminishes by that much the heritage of freedom of all of us.

But, if I may say so, there was in some of the comment on the extinction of this great Argentine newspaper, the assumption that this was an isolated event; that this was the evil consequence of the wrong-doing of one man; an unhappy accident in a world otherwise virtuous. I think if we examine honestly the phenomena of La Prensa, we shall find that this is not in fact true. We shall find that it is part of an ominous pattern that goes a considerable way back into the past and that has now extended to this part of the world which had its origins in a desire to escape the tyrannies of the past and to build a new society dedicated to freedom.

It was in August of 1914 that Lord Edward Grey made that fatefully symbolic remark about the lights going out everywhere. Lord Grey was looking out of the windows of 10 Downing Street as London slowly darkened under the shadow of war; a shadow that was to grow deeper and darker even in the intervals when the illusion of peace lulled most of mankind.

We cannot deny here tonight as we look back that the light of freedom as reflected in the free press has grown steadily and consistently dimmer. Even in Russia before 1917 there were periods when sections of the press enjoyed freedom of a kind. And the control of that simpler and less efficient absolutism of the Czars often tolerated opinion that was comparatively independent of the interests of the state. Ironically enough it was through these small chinks that the conspirators were helped, in part at least, in plotting the downfall of that autocracy. These plotters brought into being a far more terrible and ruthless and efficient absolutism which, as we know so well today, compels every human expression to serve slavishly and totally the apparatus of tyranny.

We who have lived under the all too easy conviction coming out of the nineteenth century of inevitable progress extending to infinity through free research and free science can hardly conceive the extent to which the denial of these freedoms has gone. In Russia the tyranny blankets not merely genetics and biochemistry but music criticism, music itself, literature, philosophy. The totality of the human spirit has been bound to the wheel of Soviet communism in a kind of slavery hitherto undreamed of.

All this has been made painfully and frighteningly obvious in recent years. What has not been so obvious are the losses suffered on our side of the iron curtain. We mourned La Prensa, but I wonder if we remember the Frankfurter Zeitung. That too was a great and free newspaper. It, too, was murdered by a dictator far more savage and ruthless than the bumbling Peron.

There have been a whole series of such murders in our time. That is the pattern. It is a spreading darkness and while it may not yet be darkness at noon we can hardly afford any illusions here in the United States about what o'clock it is. For we are not immune from this spreading paralysis.

The potential threat to the freedom of the press at home is very real. And that is above all what I want to talk about tonight. The threat that we confront may not seem to be in the same ominous pattern that has now spread to the Western Hemisphere. But what we should remember is that murder is the final stage and we can see here at home the hatreds, frustrations, conflicts, and confusions that may lead to murder.

The threat to the freedom of our press seems to me to fall into three separate departments. First, there is the insidious and pervasive threat of inflation which has already cut so deeply into the economic base on which the press rests. It is not alone the press but all of our free institutions which may be undermined if the inflationary trend continues unchecked.

Here again history is useful in providing a dire warning. Germany's runaway inflation, wiping out the middle class, prepared the way for Hitler and the Nazis. A great artist, Thomas Mann, in a long short story called "Disorder and Early Sorrow" has shown as only an artist can show how the very foundations of stable existence were taken to pieces.

But the pressure of inflation in the field of politics and morals is shown with special sharpness in connection with the press. The squeeze of rapidly rising costs is being felt particularly by what are sometimes called marginal newspapers. More often than not, these are the newspapers that occasionally express unorthodox or unpopular views. They are the newspapers which may at times support unpopular political candidates. They may occasionally oppose powerful vested interests in the community or in the Nation. If too many of these marginal newspapers are forced out of existence, and we have seen that happen in this country in recent years for a variety of reasons, then we shall come that much closer to a conformist press; we shall come that much closer to a monolithic press resembling in some degree at least the monolithic press that we loathe in totalitarian Russia. The competition of ideas in a free market will be narrowed by that much greater a margin. The whole sense of representation of varying and conflicting views, which is one of the responsibilities of the press, will have been dwarfed.

There are other ways, of course, in which inflationary pressures work toward a narrowing conformism. Survival may be at the cost of surrender; surrendering, that is, independence of opinion in conformity with the fears, the desires, the prejudices, of one minority group or another.

If we are honest with ourselves, we must admit that we can see such forces at work today. There are individual newspapers that resist them and I do not need to name them to this audience. But there are other instances in which the pressure has been too great.

It should not be forgotten that the method used for the final destruction of La Prensa was the unreasonable and arbitrary demand of a labor union, a labor union entirely subverted to the purposes of a dictator. Here, too, is an ominous pattern. A press that succumbs to an oligarchy of labor or an oligarchy of industry is no longer a free press.

Let me add, at the risk of repeating what I have said before, that I am not here talking about the virtues of a particular point of view, "liberal," "conservative," or whatever. I am talking about a variety of opinion and its representation in the free press of America. I found myself rarely in agreement with the New York Sun which expressed the extreme conservative point of view. Yet when it went under, its loss was a loss to each and to all of us. As it was put at the time, a voice in the chorus had gone and therefore the chorus was thinner and weaker.

The second form that the threat to a free press takes in this country is more difficult to define and more difficult to discuss. Broadly it may be designated the political threat as compared to the economic threat. In concrete form, this threat has found comparatively little direct expression. Yet nevertheless there are signs beneath the surface that its potentiality is greater than most of us have realized.

Certain direct political attacks on the freedom of the press—on newspapers and on individuals in such a way as to show that the attack was in reality aimed at the concept of free.m itself—indicate the direction in which this danger lies.

* * * * *

This is an attitude that you are either for us or against us and if you are against us, then we do not believe in your right to survive. If this does indeed become a widespread attitude of politicians in this country the free press is gravely threatened. For it is directly contrary to the right of independent opinion.

There is another attitude current among politicians which is also unhealthy from the point of view of a free and independent press. That is the feeling that their views are not given fair representation in the metropolitan press. This, too, is an ancient complaint. But it seems to me to have taken a new and somewhat more active form.

Since the election in November of 1950, I have heard politicians from several States speak bitterly of what they call a "paper curtain." Their complaint is directed not at the editorial page but at the news columns of the newspaper. They maintain that they could get no expression whatsoever of their views, or scarcely any expression, into the news columns. By contrast favored candidates were treated with such generosity that their every word and every publicity release found space in one form or another. One candidate told me that he had counted 27 references to his opponent in one edition of a large metropolitan newspaper which did not refer to him in any way even though he was then actively campaigning for office.

Now I have not investigated these reports. They may reflect merely the disgruntlement and rancor of politicians. But if there is any real truth in them, then the press is in some instances failing in its function of giving fair representation to major political and social groups in the community. And insofar as it fails in this function, the way is opened for political reprisals.

The politician who has grounds for believing that a "paper curtain" was pulled down on him will think in terms of revenge. Or in any event he will scarcely be an eager defender of the rights of a free press. If such resentments grow and are multiplied, the ground is prepared psychologically for radical action that can undermine the relationship between the estates. After all, the fourth estate must exist in balance with the other three estates, each in terms of its own powers and responsibilities.

I do not believe that these are imaginary fears. In my opinion, they go to the root of the relationship of freedom on the one hand and responsibility on the other hand; between the privileges enjoyed by the press and the service to society which is inherent in the very nature of the franchise it enjoys.

This brings me to what I believe to be the third great threat to the existence of a free and independent press. It might be called the threat from within. It is the threat implied in the irresponsibility of a section of the press. Fortunately, this is a small section of the press, although from its vociferousness one would sometimes assume that it is larger than it actually is.

This irresponsibility takes many forms. News is deliberately falsified, distorted, and suppressed. Irresponsible emphasis is given in exaggerated headlines to crimes of violence. No effort is made to give representation to varying views in the community. Under editing that is technically skillful, and even brilliant, some such newspapers present a monolithic front not unlike the face that Pravda and Izvestia present to the world from their privileged sanctuary in Moscow.

Fortunately, as I have said, such irresponsibility is limited to a comparatively few newspapers. But I believe that in their arrogance and in their disregard for the broader interests of community and nation, they do great harm. They tend to feed a popular prejudice that newspaper control and ownership are beyond the restraints that apply to ordinary institutions and ordinary citizens. It contributes to what one hears from time to time about such newspapers to the effect that, "Oh, you can't believe what you see in the paper. It prints only what X or Y or Z wants it to print."

If we are candid we must admit that such prejudices are not uncommon. That kind of prejudice can grow. It can corrode the position in popular esteem of the responsible as well as the irresponsible press.

No institution wielding as great power as the American press wields can long exist if it does not accept responsibility at least somewhat commensurate with its power. It was popular at one time to point to the fact that 80 percent or more of all newspapers opposed the reelection of Franklin Roosevelt in several of his campaigns, and yet, in spite of that opposition, Roosevelt was elected to an unprecedented fourth term in the White House. From this it was deduced that the press of America had no power. This seemed to me then, as it seems to me now, to have been specious reasoning. Roosevelt was a unique phenomena in American politics. All rules went overboard where he was concerned.

The American press does have a very great power. To be sure that that power is used wisely and that it is not dissipated in a time of grave crisis when all our values seem to be crumbling away, it is in my opinion necessary for the press as a whole to take definite and positive steps for its own self-preservation. Let me say frankly that, in my opinion, if it does not do so, then we may see the freedom of an independent press abridged or submerged here in the United States as it has been abridged and destroyed elsewhere. I would like to talk in closing about three fields in which it seems to me most important for constructive action.

First, I believe that some sort of group action will be necessary if the press is to stand up to the political threats and intimidations that seem certain to grow. The moment that a politician sets out to destroy an independent newspaper, that should be the signal for a collective response from the press in America. That response should be overwhelming and forceful not alone on the defensive but also in the offensive. It should be made perfectly clear to the public, not in one community or in one State but in the Nation, that a threat to the freedom of all is intended. That has long been the way of the dictator—to single out individuals to be struck down alone. The example of the individual destroyed intimidates others into caution. In this way a chain reaction is started that means the death of freedom.

In my opinion, some form of group solidarity will be necessary to protect the independence not alone of individual newspapers but of individual newspapermen and women. There must be ever present vigilance to detect the signs of creeping paralysis in threat and reprisal. The press association reporter is told by the politician that he will find a way to link him to communism; that he will report him to his superiors; that he will get his job. So the news report that goes out across the Nation is softened and modified. And the picture of the predatory politician is not put in its proper perspective. That is happening today. If it is not apprehended and resisted by the American press banded together to protect and preserve freedom, freedom may be lost, if not by direct assault then by attrition.

Secondly, it seems to me that some sort of group action is necessary to meet the economic threat to at least a part of the press. Sources of newsprint are being absorbed and monopolized by the more powerful economic units. An independent newspaper suddenly finds that one-third or one-half of its supply has been arbitrarily cut off by the acquisition of the mill that had been a source of newsprint. If this process continues unchecked, we shall see a still further reduction in the number of newspapers and therefore, also, in the variety of viewpoints given expression. Whether any sort of group action can help to insure a more equitable distribution of the available supply of newsprint, I do not presume to say. But obviously if the inequities grow and continue, then the result is not merely a blow to individual newspapers, but to the institution of the press as well.

This matter of the availability of newsprint is, of course, only one of the economic problems which confront all newspapers and particularly those papers that are less prosperous than some. The vise of ever-rising fixed costs is working serious harm on the press today. It is impossible to see where the pressures will stop. But surely one could hope for added strength in meeting these pressures from cooperative action by the press itself.

A third field in which it seems to me essential for some kind of group action raises even more difficult and delicate problems. For many years we have heard discussion of codes of ethics and standards of conduct for newspapers and newspapermen. From time to time these have embodied the finest ideals of both the journalist and teacher of journalism. But they have remained in the realm of the ideal. Any effort to enforce such standards has always seemed to encroach on the fundamental concept of freedom of expression and the right of independent opinion. Perhaps this must always remain a matter for idealistic hope rather than for day to day practice. Yet so long as a section of the press is conspicuously and flagrantly irresponsible, to that degree will there be a grave and obvious weakness opening the way to reprisals directed against all the press by the enemies of freedom.

I have said little about the direct encroachments of Government on freedom of the press. That is not because these encroachments are not very real but because the press itself seems so thoroughly alert to this danger. It was emphasized in the recent meetings of both the American Society of Newspaper Editors and the American Newspaper Publishers Association. I have chosen to speak of other dangers that constitute at least as great a threat, in my opinion, not just to one section of the press or to a few newspapers, but to the institution itself.

To ignore the weaknesses that exist today, to pretend that freedom is license, to prefer anarchy over reasonable self-restraint, is to invite disaster. The role of Cassandra is not a happy one and I apologize to you for it. But I have tried to speak tonight out of a deep and heartfelt concern for an institution that has been one of the great bulwarks of free thought in America. It is inconceivable to me that free thought could continue to exist if this institution were to be undermined or destroyed. That is why I want to say once again that it seems to me we dare not ignore the present threat to this institution that we here tonight love.

I do not presume to know whether the press is today organized to carry out or to begin to carry out some of the steps which seem to me necessary to self-preservation. There are great and important organizations of newspaper publishers and newspaper editors. Perhaps within this framework, the requisite responsibility, the vital obligation, may be vested. But I say to you most earnestly that merely to ignore the signs of threat and intimidation, of decline and decay, is to ignore a peril that I believe to be both imminent and deadly.

Caesar Has Gone Mad

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN BELL WILLIAMS
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following sermon delivered by R. W. Jablonowski, Jr., minister, St. Stephen Presbyterian Church, Fort Worth, Tex., on April 15, 1951:

CAESAR HAS GONE MAD

In discussing the attitude which Christian people should bear toward their rulers, St. Paul admonished: "Render therefore to all men their dues. Tribute to whom tribute is due; custom to whom custom; fear to whom fear; honor to whom honor."[1]

That this has always been the custom in Presbyterianism no one can deny. In observing the belief that the separation of church and state is our time-honored way of life and should be preserved for the welfare of both these institutions, Presbyterian ministers learn early that their calling is to preach the Gospel from the pulpit, and to leave matters political alone. This does not mean that the individual Christian has no obligation to take his religious belief into the political arena, it rather means that he must use his religious conscience and knowledge in the exercise of the political franchise which is his as a citizen.

But the Church cannot afford to remain silent forever. There comes a time in the life of a nation when it is necessary to say with the poet: "There is a tide in the affairs of men, which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune; omitted, all the voyage of their life is bound in shallows and miseries."[2] In the sixteenth century, when it seemed that all progress in Scotland was destined to be lost in the various schemes and manipulations and crimes of Mary Stuart, John Knox did not hesitate to stand in the pulpit of St. Giles' and sound the warning to a confused and uncertain people, and throughout that long and historical controversy the nation reverberated with the voice of the Church speaking out against wrong and corruption in high places and low in the government. So must it be with the Church in our day.

Last Wednesday, and even Thursday, people seemed to be living in a state of suspended animation; existing in a state of mental shock. Something had happened which could not possibly occur. A man whose greatest success has been in machined politics—but whose success in that field has brought him the highest honor which this Nation can bestow, even though he is without question the most diminutive in presidential stature ever to occupy that exalted position—that man had sacrificed the greatest living American military commander to administrative spleen and stupidity. Those who could find voice to speak would say in despairing tone: "What can we do about it?" "Isn't there something we can do?" Somehow, there was little at the moment anyone could do. The man who had acted was completely within his legal rights, he violated no known statute, he had acted entirely in a constitutional capacity by removing from his position of command a general who refused to carry out orders to cease expressing opinions at variance with those held in Washington. The general was determined to act in what he considered the best interests of his country, regardless of the personal consequences involved, a proven statesman and administrator who had forgotten more knowledge about the area in which he was working that most people would ever know.

"O judgment, thou art fled to brutish beasts, and men have lost their reason."[3]

But, really, the American people have no cause for shock, or surprise, or alarm. No new pattern has been set by the action of this week. For a number of months, now, the basic blueprint has been in complete evidence: A government of passion, of intemperance, of instability and irresponsibility has wended its way through shoals that have wrecked many a lesser ship. For month after month, as the garbage of corrupt administration has been slowly brought to the outer air, people have laughed or lamented, denounced or evaded, condoned or lied. This paralysis of governmental morality which has gripped the Nation is a stench in the nostrils of right-thinking people, utterly repugnant to Christian men and women.

No one can say where it all began. Mink coats for White House secretaries, deep-freeze units for presidential aides; 5 percenters; Reconstruction Finance Corporation loans to bankrupt corporations on the urging of presidential secretaries; the disgraceful episode of the Australasian immigrant and Harry Vaughan, who, I am ashamed to say, is an ordained Presbyterian elder; domination of politics across the land by gambling interests gnawing at the vitals of the Nation in Miami, in New Orleans, in Los Angeles, in Chicago, in Cleveland, in New York—yes, and in Fort Worth; vile, vitriolic letters on White House stationery and in presidential handwriting directed to people who have exercised constitutional rights in expressing an opinion; epithets worthy of a roughneck hurled in all directions against critics. But these are only symptoms of the disease. They only throw spots of light in the darkness which has settled over the land to corrupt, to corrode, to coerce the moral fiber of a great Nation.

"But yesterday the word of Caesar might have stood against the world; now lies he there, and none so poor to do him reverence."[4]

Internationally, we are only beginning to reap the harvest which we have sown. Harken back if you will to the last days of Israel, a once-proud nation with all the world paying tribute at the feet of its rulers, those last days in which it was felt that any kind of alliance was justified in order to preserve its way of life. Israel made an alliance with Assyria, forgetting God in the interests of materialism and a vague, shadowy, uneasy peace—and an intercharge of ideas began to take place between the two nations. Imported into Israel were strange individuals who began to speak knowingly of the might of Assyria and the benefits which might be derived from the whole world being placed under her rule; new methods of dealing with their fellow Jews were adopted by Israel's people, contrary to the way they had done things since the days of Moses; their Lord God Jehovah was forgotten in the rush to the newer and more exciting Assyrian gods and goddesses; and even a few Jews were found in high places who would push the cause of Assyria to the detriment of the national interests of Israel. Ere many years had passed, Israel had been laid waste by the conquering Assyrian armies under Sennacherib, helped not a little by those same Jews who had been fostering the cause of Assyria in the councils of the government.

Our leaders felt that way, too, in fighting the Axis in World War II, so we spent many hours of radio time and many columns of journalistic lines informing the American people of the wonderful allies which we had acquired and the then President of the United States even told us that religious freedom really existed in Russia. The tragic results of that alliance are only too evident to men and women who have sons and brothers and friends in Korea. Now, in the great global conflict with the communism we fostered—and foster it we did; at Yalta we gave to Stalin territories in Asia which did not even belong to us to give, and rights of occupation over peoples who have been enslaved in the toils of the very communism we seek today to eradicate—now, we seek other allies. We appease Peron in Argentina, as evil a regime in the suppression of its people as Mussolini ever established. We woo Franco in Spain, the worst example of a clerical, reactionary dictatorship. These countries now receive the aid which the United States doles out to all whom it calls its allies in these days of peril, on the rather flimsy ground that any aid we can obtain in fighting Soviet Russia is justified. Now we are acting on the long-discredited principle, at least from the Christian point of view that "the end justifies the means." How long will it take for men to learn that wrong means always leads to a wrong end?

We seem to be traveling down the road to appeasement. We are told that the removal of Douglas MacArthur was to prevent world war III. There are some things worse than war, some things less preferable than death. Somehow, it is inconceivable that any man would still believe in 1951 that it is possible to make a real peace with the Communists, who has no intention of abiding by a treaty any longer than that treaty can serve his nefarious ends. It is certainly an admission of mental retrogression when we consider the China of Mao Tse-tung preferable to the China of Chiang Kai-shek, especially when any school child now knows that Mao's Communists no more represent the people of China than did the corrupt officials of Chiang's Kuomintang. Personally, I would much prefer to trust Chiang who professes Jesus Christ as Lord than a Mao whose god is Stalin.
